Sport has long occupied an important place in the India-Australia relationship. Australia is looking forward to participating in the Delhi 2010 Commonwealth Games and is supporting the preparations. The Australian Sports Outreach Program will be boosted to deliver more grass-roots sports-based activities to India's youth, women and people with a disability, in collaboration with Indian partners. Mr Rudd also launched Business Club Australia in India, which will use sporting events, especially the Commonwealth Games, to build business links between the two countries.

CHINA*439. Address by Secretary (ER) in the Ministry of External Affairs Hardip Singh Puri at Confederation of Indian Industry (CII) Conference on "India-China: Drivers of the Asian Century in a Post-Crisis World."*New Delhi, March 4, 2009.

Mr. Salil Singhal, Chairman, CII, Northern Region

His Excellency, Ambassador Zhang Yan

Mr. Chandrajit Banerjee, Director General, CII

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Thank you for inviting me to join you today at this conference on "India-China: Drivers of the Asian Century in a Post-Crisis World." The fact that we have already started to talk of a Post-Crisis scenario shows, at the very least, that we are optimistic and that we have begun to see light at the end of the tunnel. That would certainly appear to be the case in so far as the two economies, China and India are concerned. That, I believe, is also the thrust of the underlying message in the publication, "Getting China and India Right," which will be released today. I have gone through this publication and have drawn intellectual inspiration from this for our interaction today.

2. We meet at a particularly challenging time for the global economy. The fact that the US, Japan and parts of Western Europe are already in recession imparts an additional and alarming dimension to this crisis. While the crisis clearly bears a "Made in the US" label, the toxic assets that were produced through the sub-prime crisis were exported to Europe and the rest of world. Corporates all over the world have been adversely affected by the financial crisis. The IMF has projected that world economic growth is set to fall to just 0.5% this year, its lowest rate since World War II. And the International Labor Organization has estimated that 50 million jobs will be lost by end-2009 as a result of the fallout of the global economic recession.

3. Demand has plunged across the world particularly in key developed countries, with domino impact on exports and industrial production in developing economies. While a crisis of confidence has gripped consumers, banks and companies, revival of aggregate demand has become the key issue for recovery of the global economy. Policy makers and economists are of the opinion that greater global cooperation rather than a retreat from globalization, is the best approach for solving the current financial crisis. Governments, in concerted action, have slashed interest rates and are pumping in hundreds of billions of dollars into new spending programs.

4. In this scenario, it makes no sense to talk about "decoupling" in an era of globalization. Decoupling assumes a more-independent economic world, when in fact globalization, is more than likely creating a more-interdependent global economy, where business cycles are more synchronized, not less. Asia's direct exposure to sub-prime related structured financial products may be limited, and its financial institutions and markets may be better regulated than before, but the region is still tightly linked to the US by trade in services, final products and by financial market co-movements. The drastic fall in Western appetite for consumer goods has resulted in China losing 20 million jobs in the manufacturing sector, while it is reported that India's textile and allied sectors alone would witness a loss of 6 million jobs.

5. Governments of the two countries have a crucial role to play to address the systemic risks in the global financial system. A frank exchange of views between India and China on how both sides can cooperate to stabilize and re-launch the global economy would be a good beginning in this direction. As the Chinese Ambassador had earlier stated, India and China need to have and demonstrate confidence to handle the crisis in a manner which is appropriate to their national interests. In addition, they should focus on stimulus packages to rejuvenate their respective economies. Both countries need to express themselves firmly against trade protectionism. Finally, they should cooperate with each other in drawing up a new financial architecture and also enhance the role the two sides can play in the decision making process of the existing international financial system. In overall terms, they should together turn this crisis into an opportunity. I can agree and support each of these assertions.

6. We have for too long relied on unsustainable, out-dated systems. The international financial system as presently structured has to be rebuilt, partly as a means of limiting the contagion from problems arising in one country, but this does not mean any retreat from open globalization and basic market principles, although "not everything can be left to the market." New forms of international institutions are vital to tackle the problems of the future, and the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) have to change the current form of their operations.

7. I believe the current economic crisis is a perturbation on a larger global trend. The decline in housing prices, the sub-prime mortgage mess, and the overt speculation in the financial sector are all serious but they are merely short term symptoms of a bigger systemic change. Although it is difficult to predict when the current crisis will moderate, all indications point out that the current financial crisis, and economic downturn, is going to confirm, and possibly accelerate the shift in economic power to Asia, in particular to India and China. The ongoing metamorphosis of China and India from historic backwaters into economic powers will help reshape the world in the next few decades. The co-authors of the publication being released today succinctly bring out the following: Other than economic historians, few people know that as recently as 1820, China and India together accounted for almost 50% of the world's GDP. After a brief period of hiatus, both China and India are seeking their due place under the sun. The two Asian neighbors have transformed themselves into rapidly growing mega markets, platforms for global cost reduction and innovation and springboards for emergence of new fearsome competitors. And by 2025, it is highly probable that China-India economic ties through trade, investments and technology linkages may be among the five to ten most important bilateral relationships in the world.

Why will India be a driver of growth?

8. Over the last five years, India has witnessed high growth of 8.8%, driven by strong industry and services sector performances as well as high savings and investments. Despite the economic downturn, we expect India's GDP growth for the current year ending in March 2009 to remain around 7%, the 5.3% growth in the last quarter (Oct-Dec, 2008) notwithstanding. Domestic demand makes up three quarters of the Indian economy. Another Indian mainstay-agricultural growth-should remain steady this year, and the services sector, which now accounts for about 55 percent of India's GDP, is expected to be "more resilient" than manufacturing. Despite the financial crisis, the nation's IT sector managed to grow some 20 percent in 2008, according to India's National Association of Software and Services Companies, and IT firms have already extended 100,000 job offers for 2009.

9. India can sustain high growth rates by paying attention to growth fundamentals. Growth is driven by investment in physical, human and knowledge capital. India's growth acceleration has been associated with significantly higher rates of domestic saving and investment. Removing industrial controls, reforming the tax system and developing the domestic financial sector have all contributed to raising savings and investment. The good news is that there is enormous scope to realize further efficiencies in institutions for allocating capital, as well as in implementing capital projects. By continuing with financial sector reform and removing infrastructure constraints, India can boost growth even in the face of a global slowdown.

10. India has a high requirement for infrastructure across sectors such as power, roads, ports and airports, telecommunications, etc. It has been estimated that India can absorb investments of $500 billion in infrastructure sectors in the next five years. We also expect continued demand emanating from rural India, since over 60% of the workforce is dependent on agriculture for livelihood. While there is a huge under-penetration of most commodities and services in India's rural areas, there are enough people at the bottom experiencing an increase in income to sustain growth. The Government has been taking special measures by way of fiscal stimulus for the rural economy, including the farm loan waiver, rural employment guarantee scheme, rural infrastructure, and other social security spending. People in India under the age of 25 account for about 50% of the total population. Of the BRIC-Brazil, Russia, India and China-countries, India is projected to stay the youngest with its working-age population estimated to rise to 70 per cent of the total demographic by 2030 - the largest in the world. It is this section of the population that is expected to keep demand and India's GDP going up.

11. India and China have already unveiled huge stimulus packages to stimulate their domestic economies. Both sides could further enhance cooperation to tackle the crisis under the G-20 framework. Policymakers in both countries should institute reforms to strengthen domestic financial systems, better allocate resources for priority development needs, and bolster regional cooperation as means of building the foundations for enhanced financial stability across the region. India and China, can start a new wave of economic growth by investing in technologies, products and services directly meeting societal needs in eco-efficiency, healthcare, transportation and the empowerment of people. And, there is enough demand for goods and services in these sectors to offset declining consumer demand from US and Europe. Certainly, it is clear that an Asian-led effort within Asia will help the region recover much faster.

12. At the same time, we must not lose sight of the longer-term objectives of inclusive development and poverty reduction. In a region where nearly 600 million people still live on less than a $1 a day, any tempering of growth is a cause for concern. We should never lose sight of how financial stress affects the hundreds of millions of Asia's poor. Since 1990, half a billion people have moved out of poverty in our region. But let us not forget the millions who fell back into poverty in the immediate aftermath of the 1997 crisis. One of the most important lessons from the Asian financial crisis was that those least responsible for the crisis - or the region's poor - are usually the hardest hit and the least able to cope. We have also learned that during times of crisis, agenda like environment and climate change (which is a global agenda) are often forgotten or delayed that creates bigger burden for the future or with adverse impacts becoming irreversible. But we also know that crises provide the impetus for significant reforms and bold changes. I am sure the discussions over the coming days will help us gain a better understanding of the challenges we face and the ways in which we can nurture our financial systems to be more responsive and resilient.

13. The time for words is over; this is the time for implementation and action. If we come back in six months or a year and are still talking about the same things, we will have failed. And the social unrest we will have to deal with will be absolutely dramatic.

14. What we are currently experiencing with the financial crisis and its consequences is the birth of a new era - a wake-up call to overhaul our institutions, our systems and, above all, our thinking. It is a call to remind us of the need to adjust our values to the needs of a world that rightly expects a much higher degree of responsibility and accountability.

15. If we recognize this crisis as being really transformational we can lay the foundation for a more stable, more sustainable and even more prosperous world after the crisis. Let me conclude by reiterating that the crisis can and should be turned into an opportunity.

440. Press Release of the Ministry of Commerce on the "Need to strengthen Trade between India and China".

New Delhi, March 19, 2009.

Speaking at the India-China bilateral meeting here today, Shri G.K. Pillai, Commerce Secretary, has stated that in order to minimize the effects of global slowdown, both India and China need to strengthen the bilateral trade and economic relations and requested the Chinese side to explore the possibility of more diversified exports from India. "Given the immense potential the two countries have, in both production and the consumption capabilities, we need to work more closely to remove all the minor irritants that creep into our economic and trade relations", he added. The bilateral meeting was attended by the Chinese Vice Minister of Commerce Mr. Zhong Shan and senior officials from both the countries.

During the discussions, Shri Pillai informed the visiting Chinese Minister that two countries could gain a lot by providing faster market access to pharmaceuticals and drugs. The Commerce Secretary also requested the Chinese side for granting market access to 14 fruits and vegetable at the earliest, as it was pending since long. Both sides felt that there is a need for increasing bilateral investments between the two countries and the main sectors for investments could be petrochemicals, steel, healthcare, IT, automobiles, biotechnology, renewable energy and low-carbon technologies.

India-China bilateral trade during 2007-08 was to the tune of US $ 37.9 billion (exports - US $ 10.8 billion and imports US $ 27.1 billion). The major items of exports from India to China are ores, cotton yarn & fabric, organic & inorganic chemicals, precious stones & metals and machinery while the major items of imports from China to India are electrical machinery, organic chemicals, Iron & steel, fertilizers and mineral fuel.

During the seventh session of the Joint Study Group (JSG) held in New Delhi, it was recommended that the existing JEG (Joint Economic Group on Economic Relations and Trade, Science & Technology) mechanism be fully activated. The eighth session of India-China JEG is to be held in Beijing.

441. Press Release of the Embassy of India in China on the launching of the India Business Forum.

Beijing, April 16, 2009.

The growth in business and commercial ties between India and China has spurred an increasing number of Indian companies to invest in China, and has also seen the entry of many well-known Chinese companies into the Indian market. The growing engagement of Indian companies in the Chinese market has provided the setting for the establishment of a new body - the India Business Forum (IBF) - which was launched on the 15th April in the Chinese capital city of Beijing. The Forum is the initiative of the Confederation of Indian Industry (CII). The IBF in China is the fourth such body launched by the CII, the other three being in USA, South Africa and Singapore. The IBF was jointly launched by Her Excellency Mrs. Nirupama Rao, Ambassador of India to the People's Republic of China, Mr. Wang Jinzhen, Vice Chairman of the China Council for the Promotion of International Trade (CCPIT), Mr Chandrajit Banerjee, Director General of CII, and Mr J J Shrikhande, Country Head - China, Larsen and Toubro Limited, who is Chairman of the IBF.

The launch of the IBF in Beijing coincided with a day-long Conference on the "Impact of Global Economic Crisis: Challenges and opportunities for India and China", organized by CII in collaboration with the Embassy of India, Beijing.

The keynote address at this Conference was delivered by Ambassador Rao. In her address, she welcomed the launch of the India Business Forum. She highlighted the deepening economic and commercial engagement between India and China and how the business companies of both countries are contributing to the development of closer bilateral ties. While admittedly bilateral commercial engagement has been impacted due to the global economic crisis, this also presents an opportunity for the two sides to engage each other more creatively, to innovate and seize the opportunities. She also underlined the important role that India and China are playing through their cooperation and coordination in the G-20 framework to help mitigate the adverse effects of the global financial and economic crisis.

Mr. Wang Jinzhen, Vice Chairman of the CCPIT, gave an overview of China's economic development since the beginning of the economic reform process 30 years ago; outlined various steps including the stimulus package that the Chinese government has undertaken to counter the impact of the global crisis on the country's economy; and underlined the intent of the Chinese government and companies to promote business ties with India including investments.

Mr Chandrajit Banerjee, Director General of CII, while welcoming the participants said that the CII IBF in China would help in bringing the two countries' economies and industries together. He stressed that during these times of economic slowdown, it is very important to shift focus on to India and China. He added that a joint strategy can benefit both Indian and Chinese corporations.

Mr J J Shrikhande, Chairman of IBF also gave a brief overview of the various functions of the IBF. The IBF would provide a networking forum for its members to interact with Government officials, academicians and think-tanks on the macro-economic scenario and strategic business partnership between India and China; would help in building "brand India" and analysing sectoral business opportunities in China in coming years.

The Inaugural session was followed by three sessions of panel discussion, namely, "Responses to Global Recession by India & China in a Post Crisis World, India & China Participating in each other's Growth Story, and Emerging Business Opportunities in India".

The event was well attended by participants from the Chinese government, international financial institutions, Indian and Chinese Companies, academicians and the media.

442. Question in the Rajya Sabha: "China's Objection to ADB Projects in Arunachal Pradesh".

New Delhi, July 9, 2009.

Will the Minister of External Affairs be pleased to state:

- (a) whether China has objected to an Asian Development Bank (ADB) plan for India that includes projects in Arunachal Pradesh;
- (b) if so, the details thereof;
- (c) whether China has recently stated that the entire Arunachal Pradesh State is a disputed territory and called upon ADB not to provide funds for watershed projects; and
- (d) if so, the reaction of Government in this regard?

The Minister of External Affairs (Shri S. M. Krishna):

(a) to (d) China did not endorse the Country Partnership Strategy [CPS] 2009-12 for India in the Board of the Asian Development Bank [ADB] on the ground that the proposed India CPS involved technical assistance funding for the Flood and River Erosion Management Project in Arunachal Pradesh which China claims is its territory. Government has clearly conveyed to the Chinese side that Arunachal Pradesh is an integral part of India. Government has also told the ADB and all member countries of the ADB which have Executive Directors on its Board, including the US, Japan, Australia, Canada, Indonesia, Republic of Korea, Malaysia, Philippines, Germany and Italy that

- (i) the CPS is not a political document and it does not make any judgment as to the legal or other status of any territories; and
- (ii) China's objection on political grounds is a clear violation of the ADB's Charter which prohibits the Bank from evaluating any proposal on grounds other than economic.

India's CPS was discussed in the Meeting of the Board of Executive Directors of the ADB on 15 June 2009, and all member countries except China supported the document*.

* At the media briefing on September 19, on PM's visit to Pittsburg for the G-20 Conference, Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao was asked about this matter:

---

Question: I wanted a clarification on the ADB point. Is there a reference there to Arunachal as disputed?

Foreign Secretary: No, there is no reference to Arunachal Pradesh in the sense that you refer to. This is a Country Partnership Strategy looking at development assistance as a package.

Question: ....not audible

Foreign Secretary: That has nothing to do with the approval of the strategy. I think you are referring to something quite different. There is a Chinese position on the subject, what China has been saying on the issue of Arunachal Pradesh. But here, as far as the Country Partnership Strategy is concerned, it has been endorsed by the Asian Development Bank.

The question of the status of Arunachal Pradesh had come in for mention also in the context of the proposed visit to the State by the Dalai Lama in November and Chinese reported objection to it. The External Affairs minister S. M. Krishna had left no one in any doubt when he said: "Arunachal Pradesh is a part of India and Dalai Lama is free to go anywhere in India." The National Security Advisor M. K. Narayanan too in an interview to the CNN-IBN on September 20th said: "China has its own perception. India has a very clear perception about Arunachal Pradesh. And the integrity of India's sovereignty will certainly have to be respected." Pointing out that there were "issues and differences" between India and China over the boundary issue, he said there was a mechanism in place to address such matters. He hoped they would be settled amicably.

Phuket (Thailand), July 22, 2009.

The Indian External Affairs Minister and the Chinese Foreign Minister had their first bilateral meeting on the sidelines of the India - ASEAN Ministerial Conference held in Phuket on July 22, 2009. They resolved to further deepen their ties, especially in bilateral trade which has been set a target of $60 billion by the end of 2010.

The External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna responded positively to the Chinese counterpart's suggestion to be in close touch with each other on major issues such as climate change, the Doha round of trade talks and the global financial crisis. Pointing to the two countries' similarity of outlook on a number of issues, the Ministers referred to their approach to the financial crises, which was expected to be carried forward at the third G-20 summit on the global meltdown, to be held in Pittsburgh, United States.

Mr. Krishna said there was enough space for both China and India to grow without competing with each other. He described the meeting as "very useful," which saw "cordial and friendly exchange of views." He also conveyed India's desire to support mechanisms that would ensure lasting peace in the region.

Mr. Yang said China was looking forward to the visit by President Pratibha Patil. Mr. Krishna thanked him for renewing the invitation.

The Indian Officials later said the purpose of the "almost impromptu" meeting was fourfold: to get acquainted with each other; deepening the interaction; reviewing the growth of economic ties; and coordinating their action in this sphere on a global scale.

444. Press Release issued by the Indian Embassy in China on the expanding bilateral trade between India and China.

Beijing, August 4, 2009.

In recent weeks, there have been some articles in Chinese print media on protectionist measures adopted by countries including India against Chinese goods. In this regard, this Embassy would like to put forward the following points which may help in having a more comprehensive and balanced understanding of the issue:

- i) According to the figures provided by China Customs, India-China bilateral trade in 2008 totalled US$ 51.8 billion, which was an increase of 34% year-on-year. In 2008, Indian exports to China touched US$ 20.3 billion, rising by 39% over the figure for 2007. Chinese exports in the same period have expanded by 31% to reach US$ 31.5 billion. In the last five years, the total value of trade has increased almost seven fold from US$7.59 billion in 2003 to US$51.85 billion in 2008. This represents an increase of around 583%.
- ii) During the last five years, the Chinese exports to India increased from US$3.34 billion to US$ 31.51 billion which is nearly a tenfold increase. While the export from India to China has also increased, it has been a fivefold increase from US$4.25 billion in 2003 to US$20.34 billion in 2008. This would reinforce the fact that bilateral trade has been increasing and rate of growth of Chinese exports to India has been maintaining a steady pace. This can not happen in an environment of protectionism or trade barriers. In fact in 2008, the growth rate of Chinese exports to India stood at 31.21%, which was highest in the top ten destinations of Chinese exports.
- iii) The global financial crisis has impacted the bilateral trade between our two countries. In the first six months of 2009, bilateral trade stood at US$19.61 billion, which is a decline of 32% y-o-y. Indian exports to China in Jan-June 2009 stood at US$ 6.60 billion, declining by 50%. In comparison, the Chinese exports to India during the first six months of this year stood at US$13.01 billion, declining by only 16%. The value of Chinese exports during this period is double the Indian exports, which in turn is almost equal to the size of our trade deficit with China during this period which stood of US$6.41 billion.

- iv) There have been some antidumping cases initiated by India against China. All actions taken by India are as per the procedures and principles enshrined in the national laws which are uniformly applied to imports from all countries including China whenever there is a need for such measure. Indian regulations apply uniformly and are not China specific. Besides, there is a legal framework to deal with Anti-Dumping cases. The antidumping investigations are normally initiated by the Directorate General of Anti-Dumping and Allied-Duties on receiving a fully documented petition from the domestic industry with prima facie evidence of dumping and the causal link between the dumped goods and injury to the domestic industry. Anti-Dumping measures are trade remedy instruments for ensuring fair trade and not measures to restrict competition. The increasing trend in overall bilateral trade is a testimony that the Anti-Dumping investigations have not hindered the bilateral trade and are merely an instrument for ensuring fair trade in accordance with international laws.
- v) On the other hand, the Indian side has some concerns especially with regard long-pending market access for its agricultural products. The India-China bilateral WTO agreement signed in February 2000 and the MOU on Application of Phyto-sanitary Measures, signed in January 2002 during Premier Zhu Rongji's visit to India provides for cooperation and exchange of information in the field of pest risk analysis and application of phytosanitary measures to facilitate smooth trade in agricultural products especially fresh fruits and vegetables. On the basis of these two agreements, the Indian side has sought market access for 17 varieties of fruits and vegetables in the Chinese market. This has been under discussion for almost a decade and market access has been given to only three products out of a list of seventeen. In addition, the issue of market access for basmati rice has been pending for a long time and Chinese side is yet to send the technical team for assessment despite repeated invitations conveyed by the Indian side.
- vi) During the meeting of the two sides early this year, the Chinese side had assured that relevant technical teams would be sent from China and specific progress would be seen soon. However, no progress has been seen with regard to giving market access to India for fruits and vegetables.
- vii) India has several bilateral dialogue mechanisms with China, including the Joint Economic Group at Ministerial Level, Joint Working Group on Trade at DG/Joint Secretary Level and India-China Trade Remedy Cooperation mechanism at DG/Joint Secretary Level. China has become the largest trading partner of India. Both India and China have regular dialogue to discuss trade related issues. The Chinese Vice-Minister of Commerce Mr. Gao Hucheng visited India in October 2008 and another Chinese Vice-Minister of Commerce Mr. Zhong Shan visited India in March 2009. The trade and economic relations between our two countries are rapidly becoming the bedrock for a more intensive engagement.

445. Statement* issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on 13th Round of India-China Special Representatives Talks.

New Delhi, August 8, 2009.

The 13th Round of India-China Special Representatives Talks on the Boundary Question concluded in New Delhi today. The two day talks between the National Security Adviser Shri M.K. Narayanan and the Chinese State Councillor Mr. Dai Bingguo were held in a cordial and friendly atmosphere.

Apart from the boundary issues, discussions covered a broad agenda which included the entire gamut of bilateral relations and regional and international issues of mutual interest.

Describing relations with China as a key foreign policy priority for India, Shri M.K. Narayanan said that the joint document on a "Shared Vision for the 21st Century" signed during Prime Minister's visit to China in January 2008 has taken bilateral relations to a new level. There has been a significant expansion in bilateral cooperation in areas such as trade and investment, defence, culture, education and people-to-people exchanges.

Reciprocating the sentiments expressed by National Security Advisor, Mr. Dai Bingguo referred to rapid growth witnessed in the bilateral relations in recent years. Highlighting the importance of ongoing consultations and coordination between the two countries at multilateral fora, he expressed the hope that the two countries will jointly meet global challenges in the spirit of the Shared Vision. Mr. Dai Bingguo said that China takes a positive view of India's development and progress, and also supports a bigger role for India in international affairs.

Both sides noted that the Strategic and Cooperative Partnership established between India and China in 2005 was a major milestone in the relationship and reiterated the commitment of both countries to consolidate this Partnership in all fields in a comprehensive way.

On the Boundary Question, both sides expressed satisfaction at the progress being made through the Special Representatives mechanism and reiterated that pending the settlement of the boundary issue, peace and tranquility should be maintained in our border areas.

During his visit, Mr. Dai Bingguo called on the Prime Minister and the Chairperson, UPA. He conveyed the greetings of President Hu Jintao and also handed over a written message of greetings from Premier Wen Jiabao to the Prime Minister.

The Chinese delegation issued a separate statement which read:

"From August 7 to 8, the 13th Meeting between the Chinese and Indian Special Representative on Boundary Question was held in New Delhi, India. Chinese Special Representative, State Councilor Dai Bingguo met with his counterpart, Mr. Narayanan, India's National Security Advisor. During his stay in India, State Councilor Dai also met with Mrs. Sonia Gandhi, Chairperson of the Indian Congress Party and Prime Minister Singh.

In a friendly and candid atmosphere, the two Special Representatives had an in-depth exchange of views on resolving the boundary question. Both agreed to press ahead with the framework negotiations in accordance with the agreed political parameters and guiding principle so as to seek for a fair and reasonable solution acceptable to both. Prior to that, both should work together to maintain peace and tranquility in the border areas.

During the talks, the two sides exchanged in-depth views on the further development of China-India Strategic and Cooperative Partnership, as well as regional, international and global issues of mutual interest.

The Chinese side pointed out that the Chinese Government and people value the strategic and cooperative partnership between China and India, the largest two developing nations with a combined population accounting for 40 percent of the world's total. Friendly coexistence, mutual beneficial cooperation and shared progress between the two neighbours will contribute not only to the people of the two countries but also Asia and the whole world. China and India have no other option than living in peace and developing side by side. China stands firmly committed to working with India to press ahead with the bilateral ties.

The Chinese side believes that both countries need to promote the relationship with a higher and strategic perspective and continue to uphold the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence. China and India should endeavor to build the strategic mutual trust. Both need to expand the common interests and cooperation bilaterally and on regional and global affairs. Both should take concrete steps to enhance people-to-people and cultural interactions so as to nurture the mutual understanding and friendship between the two peoples. For the questions left over from history, the two countries should work to seek for a fair and reasonable mutually acceptable solution through peaceful and friendly negotiations.

For the future development of the bilateral ties, the Chinese side made the following suggestions. The two countries need to maintain the momentum of high-level exchanges, will celebrate the 60th anniversary marking the establishment of the diplomatic relations between the two countries, especially the China Festival and India Festival in each other's country in 2010. Both countries should strengthen mutually beneficial cooperation in the economic field and trade, fully tap the potential for cooperation and properly handle frictions and questions thereof and stand side by side against trade protectionism so as to ensure the sustained and healthy development of bilateral economic ties. The two neighbours should enhance people-to-people and cultural exchanges, those between the youth, academic institutions, media and localities in particular, and deepen defence cooperation and continue the defence and security talks. China and India should also intensify the coordination and cooperation on major international issues, especially the global efforts in response to world financial crisis, climate change, energy and food security so as to promote evolution of international system that is in favor of developing nations. The two sides also exchange views on the situation in South and Northeast Asia.

Meanwhile media reports said that one of the decisions taken during the talks was that the two countries would set up a hotline between Prime Ministers Manmohan Singh and Wen Jiabao as a confidence building measure. External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna told Parliament last month that the proposal had come from the Chinese side and the intention was to "maintain regular contacts at the highest level." China had proposed the establishment of the hotline during a meeting between Dr. Singh and Chinese President Hu Jintao on the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation summit in Yekaterinburg, Russia. No date was however announced and officials said the technical and other modalities were being worked out. Describing ties with China as a key foreign policy priority, Mr. Narayanan said the joint document on a "Shared Vision for the 21st Century" signed during Dr. Singh's visit to China January last year had taken bilateral relations to a new level.

It may be recalled that in March the media had reported the unannounced visit to New Delhi of the Chinese Assistant Minister of Foreign Affairs Hu Zhengyue when several issues of strategic importance were reportedly discussed. Media quoted unnamed sources to suggest that Beijing and Delhi were working towards a renewed thrust on the ties between the navies of the two nations with a possibility of the Indian Navy Chief visiting China later this year. The Chinese reportedly expressed an interest in deepening the economic engagement with India by helping build infrastructure for the 2010 Commonwealth Games. At a conference organised by the CII, analysts said that a sustained mutual interest, a growing economic presence in each other's development and sharing of best practices would help the industry on both sides to move ahead. Chinese ambassador to India Zhang Yan, addressing the conference on March 4, said: "Yes, the challenge we are facing is great, but the future is bright as long as China and India can pool their efforts, learn from each other and compliment each other, the two countries will surely emerge as winners of this crisis."

446. Response of the Official Spokesperson to question on article by a Chinese analyst.*New Delhi, August 11, 2009.

"We have seen media reports. India and China have strategic and cooperative partnership. There is multi-sectoral engagement between the two countries and the pace of exchanges has gained momentum in recent years. Both sides have agreed to continue this momentum, while seeking to resolve outstanding issues, including the boundary question through peaceful dialogue and consultations, and with mutual sensitivity to each other's concerns.

The Chinese side has conveyed to us that in approaching India China relations, China abides by the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence. One of these principles stresses respect for territorial integrity and sovereignty.

The article* in question appears to be an expression of individual opinion and does not accord with the officially stated position of China on India China relations conveyed to us on several occasions, including at the highest level, most recently by the State Councillor Dai Bingguo during his visit to India last week.

We continue to maintain that opinions and assessment on the state of India-China relations should be expressed after careful judgement based on the long-term interests of building a stable relationship between the two countries".

* An article written under the nom de plume on the website of a Chinese military think tank, Beijing strategist had suggested that China should help divide India. China should support factions of the Assamese, Kashmiris and Tamilians and break-up India into 20-30 independent nation-states like Europe and eradicate the caste system. "If China takes a little action, the so-called Great Indian Federation can be broken up," said the article posted on August 8, coinciding with the 13th round of India-China border talks in New Delhi. The website editor later denied that it represented either the views of the Chinese government or of the website editor or the think tank. It was posted anonymously by an internet user.

447. Media report on the reaction of India to the reported Chinese incursions on the India-China border in the Western Sector.

New Delhi, September 7, 2009.

Amidst media reports of Chinese incursions along the India-China border, the External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna described the boundary as "most peaceful." He told correspondents in New Delhi that the border with China was "one of the most peaceful boundaries that we have had." Reports of incursions were not any cause for concern, he said. India shared a long border with China, and incidents or incursions were sorted out through a mechanism*.

Such issues were taken up at periodic flag meetings held in various sectors at different times, media quoted unnamed sources in the Defence Ministry to suggest. The Hindustan Times on September 7 quoted an unnamed senior Indian Army officer to say that "We will definitely take up the matter with the Chinese during the next flag meeting of border personnel," Eastern Army Commander Lt Gen V.K. Singh and Leh-based XIV Corps head Lt Gen S.K. Singh, who along with other senior army officials are currently in China on a "goodwill" visit, would also raise the matter with the Chinese authorities at the highest level, he reportedly said.

The media quoted the unnamed sources in the External Affairs Ministry to say that the reports of incursions should also be seen in the context of India and China not having a mutually agreed Line of Actual Control. The Ministry had reportedly sought an early clarification from China, and a response was awaited.

* It may be recalled that while transiting through Singapore on August 10 on way back from Australia the External Affairs Minister had in his remarks to The Hindu correspondent there P. S. Suryanarayana had said the boundary issue with China "has not clouded" India's "vision of the larger picture" in bilateral ties. "We have a good relationship with China," the Minister said and called for a continued "focus" by both India and China on staying their economic courses in the present context. Hinting that the economic scene was "the larger picture," the External Affairs Minister said: "We are two robust economies, in spite of the [current] slowdown globally. These are the two economies which have shown signs of recovery and signs of growth. So, that shows that they are on the right track. We should continue to focus on that. When developing countries are collapsing like nine pins, these two countries have registered progress, which the world will have to take note of. Of course, we consider that China is a developed country; and we are a developing country. [However viewed], these two emerging economies of this century have done exceedingly well." When asked to present a snapshot of the India-China ties in the context of recent developments on the bilateral front, he said: "We would like to strengthen our relationship with China, we would like a partnership with them. We would like the present process, which has been initiated to settle our concerns or their concerns on the boundary issue, [to continue]. We have evolved a methodology to take care of that. [The latest meeting of the Special Representatives] would have made significant progress. With China, we would continue this engagement for a cordial relationship, and we will work on that."

Media reports quoted Mr. Krishna to say that the special representatives on the boundary issue were working towards addressing the different conceptions of the international border. The 13th round of meeting was held recently. (A news agency reported that after two helicopters intruded into the Indian airspace, Chinese troops moved nearly 1.5 km into the Indian territory near Mount Gya.) The Defence Ministry reportedly maintained that the issue was "overplayed," and the terrain added to the problem. Furthermore, transgressions occurred because there was no mutually agreed border.

India will strongly raise the issue of recent incursions by the Chinese army in Ladakh area of Jammu and Kashmir at the next border personnel meeting between the two countries and also at the diplomatic level.

It may be worthwhile to recall the meeting of the Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and Chinese President Hu Jintao in Yekaterinburg in June on the sidelines of the BRIC Summit which took place against the backdrop of the heightened rhetoric on the border issue. After a review of the bilateral relations they reiterated their intention of pursuing closer ties and give a fresh push to their high-level dialogue on the disputed boundary between the two countries. An official of the Indian delegation briefing the media on the meeting when asked about the recent statements by the outgoing Indian Air Force chief and other IAF commanders on the threat from China and the internal situation in Tibet, the officials said Defence Minister A.K. Antony had ordered serving officers not to make public comments. "In our system, policy statements are the preserve of ministers and duly authorised officials," the sources said, adding, "Unauthorised statements do not constitute Indian policy. They remain the individual view of whoever makes them." The officials said these statements were unhelpful. "They muddy the waters ... The Chinese read them and then they react ... and this prompts further statements."

The statement by the Arunachal Pradesh Governor J.J. Singh made in June on the reported Chinese incursions and his assertion that India intended to deploy around 30,000 troops along the Arunachal border should be seen in the same vein. It had prompted the Chinese Foreign Ministry to respond with a statement that China "cannot accept such allegations". The Spokesperson Qin Gang had said "China and India have never demarcated the border. To resolve this issue at an early date is one of the 10 strategies to improve China-India relations. The two countries have reached a consensus on resolving this issue, and we hope the two countries will follow the 10 principles and jointly safeguard stability and tranquillity in the border areas. China has always followed such an attitude to settle the issue." The media had been during much of the year persisting with reports of Chinese intrusions and incursions along the Sino-Indian border, but the official line had been consistent that there had been no major problem and that such reports were not based on correct appreciation of the boundary situation. The official line had been that the border was all along tranquil and both sides were maintaining the status quo. Putting the problem in perspective the Foreign Secretary Shivshankar Menon said the same thing earlier in the year on March 20. Pointing out that both sides had their own perceptions about the boundary, Mr. Menon said each side treated the other's crossing over as an incursion. But the important thing was whether there had been a change in the pattern of incursions and whether it was taking place in new places. The answer to both was in the negative, he said, while taking questions at the release of the book "India-China relations - The border issue and beyond" co-authored by Mohan Guruswamy and Zorawar Daulet Singh. "Both sides maintain the status quo. We don't see changes in the pattern by either side," Mr. Menon added. Mr. Menon said while there was a border issue there was no border dispute with China unlike with Pakistan. The last casualty that took place was in October 1975 and even that was an accident.

In its latest statement on the reported incident the Chinese too tried to down play the issue. The Chinese Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Jiang Yu on September 8 described the reports (of incursion) "groundless and untrue." "Border patrols are strictly conducted according to the law and will never enter [Indian] territory." "India and China should make joint efforts to safeguard peace and tranquillity along the border," he added.

On September 10, addressing the Editors' Guild in New Delhi, EAM reassured the media that India's borders were secure and that there was no lowering of our defences either. He said: "On the issue of border incursions, I would like to emphasize that there is an established mechanism to deal with such situations. Both sides have agreed that pending the resolution of the border issue, peace and tranquillity must be maintained on the LAC. Moreover, India is monitoring the situation constantly and there can and will be no lowering of our defences in this regard. Our borders are secure and it serves no purpose to create excessive alarm."

The Chinese official Spokesperson Jiang Yu too on September 10 pleaded against media led reaction on border incidents and also discounted media reports that the recent meeting of the special representatives did not yield much. She reiterated that both China and India were committed to jointly work for peace and tranquillity on the border. "Let not this issue (of media reports) affect the overall interests of bilateral relations", she said. The special representatives of the two countries were working for a "fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable solution of the border issue," she said while replying to a question on whether the recent meeting of special representatives failed to prove useful.

Chinese officials on 16th September also tried to downplay the recurring reports of incidents along the border with India, maintaining that a peaceful resolution of the long-running border dispute was possible if the two countries could enhance strategic co-operation and better an atmosphere that has fast soured in recent weeks. The Chinese officials reiterated that recent media reports on frequent border incursions were not a cause for alarm. In an interaction with Indian journalists, officials from China's Foreign Ministry attributed the recent strain in relations more to media hype than any real cause for concern. "We find it necessary and important to develop friendly and peaceful relations with India," Ma Jisheng, a director-general in China's Foreign Ministry said. "Our position is that we should support better bilateral relations and we can then resolve the dispute. If we can reach a consensus on [other] strategic issues, we believe we can develop a better atmosphere to discuss the border issue. We need to focus on the whole relationship and not just the border issue." Both governments on the same day (15-9-09) also dismissed recent reports of an exchange of fire along the border in Sikkim as "inaccurate." Officials on both sides of the border have said the reported border incursions by the Chinese troops were regular occurrences that were more a result of different perceptions on the extent of the unresolved border rather than new signs of aggression.

The Foreign Secretary Nirupama Rao too speaking at a press conference also on the 19th September, on the Prime Minister's visit to the G20 summit, said there was no significant increase in the number of Chinese incursions in all sections of the LAC and peace and tranquillity continued to hold just as it had done for "some decades now." Regarding the reports of China attempting to block an Asian Development Bank loan for projects in Arunachal Pradesh she said, "The Country Partnership Strategy has been endorsed by the ADB and that's where the matter stands."

448. Press Release of the Ministry of Home Affairs on the signing of Agreement between India and Hong Kong on Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters.

449. Comment by Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs on incorrect report on firing across Line of Actual Control along the India - China border.

New Delhi, September 15, 2009.

A media report* about two ITBP jawans having been injured due to firing from across the LAC (Line of Actual Control) has come to notice. The report is factually incorrect.

* The Spokesperson was referring to a story published in a section of the press on the same day that 'Two ITBP jawans injured in China border firing.' The Chinese Foreign Office too denied the report of firing.

A media report said that the Home Ministry having taken a serious view of such scary-mongering reporting had decided to file an FIR against the two reporters of The Times of India who filed the story claiming Indian soldiers were injured in firing by the Chinese. "We have taken this story very seriously. We are going ahead with our decision to take criminal action against the two reporters and we will soon file an FIR. They have quoted some highly placed intelligence source in their story. Let them appear before the court and tell who is this source who gave them information," media report quoted top sources in the Home Ministry to so suggest.

It may be recalled that media had been publishing repeatedly reports of Chinese incursions along the border, which the official sources felt constrained to deny. On September 18 the Prime Minister had advised journalists that media reports were painting an inaccurate picture of the conditions along the India-China border. On September 19 the Chief of Army Staff Gen. Deepak Kapoor told journalists at the Officers Training Academy in Chennai: "The Prime Minister has just made a statement that there has not been any more incursions or transgressions as compared to last year. They are at the same level. So there is no cause of worry or concern."

In an interview to CNN-IBN, on September 20, the National Security Advisor M.K. Narayanan had urged the media to be restrained. "I really am unable to explain why there is so much media hype on this question," he said, expressing concern that if such coverage continued, "someone somewhere might lose his cool and something might go wrong."

450. Questions Relevant to China asked from Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao at the media briefing for the Prime Minister's visit to Pittsburg for the G-20 Summit.

New Delhi, September 19, 2009.

Question: Is the Indian Prime Minister likely to meet the Chinese President during the G20 Summit? And, what is the status of India's application with the Asian Development Bank for the Arunachal Project?

Foreign Secretary: To answer your first question, there is no meeting that is being planned at the moment between our Prime Minister and his Chinese counterpart or the Leader of the Chinese Delegation to the G20 Summit.

On the issue of the Asian Development Bank project that you referred to, the Country Partnership Strategy that India had presented at the ADB has already been endorsed by the ADB. So, the matter stands there. There is really no pending issue now on that front.

Question: The loan application is cleared now?

Foreign Secretary: The Country Partnership Strategy has been endorsed by the Asian Development Bank.

Question: Madam, my question is on Prime Minister's comment of yesterday. He said in the Iftar party yesterday that he was in touch with the highest level authority in China about the current tension of alleged incursions. I would like if the Prime Minister talked to his counterpart or he talked to President Jintao. If yes, what is the nature of that talk? My supplementary question is that there is a general allegation which is made frequently for the last ten days that MEA is downplaying the incursions which have definitely increased because these are the official figures. Can you just clarify these two issues please?

Foreign Secretary: As far as your first question is concerned, let me tell you that we remain in constant touch, India and China, on all issues that are of mutual interest and of mutual concern to us as far as our bilateral relations are concerned and also on issues that go beyond the bilateral context. So, this is a relationship that we have been able to develop and that has matured over the years and has acquired many dimensions. A very important aspect of this relationship is the dialogue that we have been able to sustain, that we have been able to transact and conduct at the highest political level of the two countries. Therefore, the leadership level understandings and the contact and communication remains open at all times. That is the first point I wanted to make.

As far as the second point of the recent Chinese intrusions is concerned, I think enough has been said in the media about these issues in the last few days and perhaps weeks. There has been a certain hype and a certain intensification of volume if I may say, in terms of the manner in which these have been reported upon in the media. Having said that I would only base myself on ground realities and my appreciation of where the relationship stands today, as somebody who has dealt with it for many years now. As far as the intrusions are concerned, there has been no significant increase in the number of Chinese intrusions across the line of actual control in all sections of the India-China border. At the expense of repeating our position, let me do that, there is no mutually agreed or delineated line of actual control between the two countries. So, this is an issue that is yet to be agreed upon between the two sides. What happens, it is an eventuality in such a situation that you find that you have crossings over into what you regard as your side from the other side. This has gone on for a number of years now. This is not a new phenomenon, I would like to point that out. Having said that I would also like to point to the fact that contrary to popular perceptions, the situation along the areas of the line of actual control in the India-China border areas has remained peaceful for a number of decades now. We have mechanisms in place; we have confidence-building measures in place; we have communication links in place that enable each side to reach out to the other whenever there is a perceived problem or a situation that develops in the areas along the line of actual control.

I would like to underline the fact that these mechanisms have worked well and that there is good communication between the two sides. Whenever the situation warrants it we also take it up at the diplomatic level. So, this is a relationship in which there is regular communication, and there is understanding, and there is recognition on both sides that this is an important bilateral relationship, that outstanding differences between the two sides should be resolved peacefully through dialogue, through communication, as it should be between two nations as large as ours, with international responsibilities like ours, and with bilateral commitments such as ours.

Question: Madam, coming back to the China question, do you think in any way this troop movement alongside the border by the Chinese and the Indian side in Ladakh as well as around the area by Chinese side in some way is creating a cycle of mistrust and it can hamper the diplomatic work that had been done in the past with China?

Foreign Secretary: You are referring to media reports and I sought to guide your attention to the actual situation in India-China relations. The Chief of Army Staff has already spoken on this issue this morning when he referred to the fact that there has been no increase in the number of intrusions and the situation remains calm. So, I am not here to get into a debate on troop movements. Each country takes steps to safeguard its security in sensitive areas such as border areas but the central fact is that the situation remains peaceful and tranquil. We have open channels of communication with the Chinese side and the Chinese side with us to discuss all outstanding issues that need resolution.

Question: I wanted a clarification on the ADB point. Is there a reference there to Arunachal as disputed?

Foreign Secretary: No, there is no reference to Arunachal Pradesh in the sense that you refer to. This is a Country Partnership Strategy looking at development assistance as a package.

Question: ....not audible

Foreign Secretary: That has nothing to do with the approval of the strategy. I think you are referring to something quite different. There is a Chinese position on the subject, what China has been saying on the issue of Arunachal Pradesh. But here, as far as the Country Partnership Strategy is concerned, it has been endorsed by the Asian Development Bank.

451. Extract Relevant to China from the Interview* of National Security Advisor M. K. Narayanan with Karan Thapar for the TV channel CNN-IBN.

New Delhi, September 20, 2009.

Karan Thapar: Let's start with China first; in recent weeks there is a widespread perception that Chinese incursions across the Line of Actual Control (LAC) have increased and many people say that in fact the incursion is coming deeper and deeper into Indian territory. What's the truth about these perceptions?

M K Narayanan: There haven't been any increase if you take the last few years. And I really find it hard to explain why there has been so much media hype on this question. I think it's disturbing because it tends to give an impression and then people get attuned to that kind of attitude. Almost all the so-called incursions which have taken place have taken place in areas which in a sense are viewed as being disputed by one side or the other.

In terms of number of incursions; I think there has been hardly any increase. And there is much more knowledge about what's happening because I think people are much more alive to these questions etc.

Occasionally maybe the inroads are little deeper than what they might have been in the past. So I don't think there is anything alarming about it and I think we have a good understanding about the whole issue.

Karan Thapar: Let me underline two important things that you said: firstly that there has been no worrying or remarkable increase in the number of incursions, is that right?

M K Narayanan: Yes.

Karan Thapar: And secondly even though one or two of the incursions may have been deeper than before these are not alarming situations?

M K Narayanan: No.

Karan Thapar: So is it in fact just media hype that is building up a sense of concern?

* The interview covered Pakistan besides China. For the interview on Pakistan Please see Document No.378.

M K Narayanan: As a National Security Advisor and as part of the National Security architecture or mechanism as the case maybe, I am unable to explain why this kind of--one can always argue that any incursion, small or big could be a cause of concern. But having been through this--not only now but in the past, I don't think there is any reason for us to feel particularly concerned as to what's happening.

Our idea is that our border should be tranquil. I think as far as possible we would like to keep it tranquil. I think my counterpart and I have discussed this from time to time.

Not only the two of us as the special representatives but political leadership on both sides is very keen to maintain peace and tranquility on the border and I think that explains a lot.

Karan Thapar: As you must be aware certain opposition politicians, Mulayam Singh Yadav for one, have even called for special sessions of parliament. The Bharatiya Janta Party (BJP) has asked for a white paper on the subject. Are you saying to me that those are exaggerated political reactions?

M K Narayanan: When one sees what comes in the media almost on a day-to-day basis, I presume political leaders will be concerned is this happening? We want to know more about it etc. And I don't want to blame the media but the question is, why there is so much reporting?

I wont even use the word exaggerated reporting on the point. But I think this is a national security issue. It isn't a kind of a game that we are playing and the more you raise people's concerns, the tension could rise and we would then be facing a situation of the kind that we wish to avoid.

Karan Thapar: In other words the media by its overreaction could end up creating a problem that it wants to avoid?

M K Narayanan: Could create a problem and I have been through 1962. Then, of course we didn't have the media of this kind. What we need to be careful of is that we don't have an unwarranted incident or an accident of some kind and that's what we are trying to avoid.

But there is always concern that if things go on like this someone, somewhere might lose his cool and something might go wrong.

Karan Thapar: In other words the media might accidentally, unintentionally, provoke someone to do something that otherwise would not have happened?

M K Narayanan: I don't think they would provoke but people may get mesmerised into doing something, seeing a ghost where it probably doesn't exist.

Karan Thapar: It's also been reported that the army has sought the lifting of restrictions on patrolling along what's considered sensitive sectors of the border. Is that a fact that the army want these restrictions removed?

M K Narayanan: It's not as if new restrictions have been placed. There are limits of patrolling which are placed from time to time, and it's a calibrated exercise.

If you suddenly think that things are--there could be problems in a particular direction, that you may feel that you need to be little careful, sometimes the limits are--I mean everybody who is on the border is conscious of the fact that you need to keep the border safe and therefore there are different views. But the decisions are taken at the highest level basically by the China Study Group and then these are approved by the cabinet committee.

Karan Thapar: But it has been suggested that there could be differences within the government over the nature of the patrolling.

It is said in the press that the army wants a more assertive response --the MEA (Ministry of External Affairs) is a bit concerned about offending or provoking the Chinese--is there any truth to these differences of opinions?

M K Narayanan: There is always (differences)--why only between--even I suppose within the army or within the MEA or within Ministry of Home Affairs there could be differences because we are human beings. That's why you have a China Study Group which looks at all aspects of the question. Then over and above that as I said there is the Cabinet committee which looks at it.

There are perceptions of what you need to do. An organised government, which has various checks and balances, looks at these questions and sees what is in the best interest of the country. Each individual can't do what he likes.

Karan Thapar: Now it is not just activity on the border that has the media concerned and certain opposition politicians concerned. There are also increasing reports of what are considered hostile articles in the Chinese media that mock at or scoff at India.

For instance there was an article in August in the journal of the Chinese Institute of Strategic Studies which said that just a little action on China's part could lead to the fragmentation of India into 20-30 bits. How do you view this sort of increasing commentary?

M K Narayanan: I don't think it is so much of increasing--it has been there and there is now more academic freedom in China than previously I believe. And it is not that everything that comes in either 'Global Times' or in the 'Strategic Review' etc reflects the opinion of the Chinese government, which is the conventional wisdom in these matters.

After all there are articles in our newspapers or what's more even statements by responsible people in India sometimes which are not particularly favourably inclined towards China.

Karan Thapar: In other words this sort of thing happens on both sides?

M K Narayanan: Both sides and that's why you have governments who look at the whole issue and do not get carried away by individual statements.

Karan Thapar: What do you say to strategic experts who look at these two twin developments of activity on the border and hostile commentary in the Chinese press and say this is a deliberate pattern or strategy to put pressure on India?

Some people have even gone so far as to say that if we aren't careful we may see the buildup of a sort of situation that existed in India in 1962 before the war began.

M K Narayanan: The first thing I would like to sort of wipe out is the question of a repeat of 1962. India of 2009 isn't India of 1962 and those who say this, most of those people who have written this, were not even born perhaps in 1962--I was there and I want to make that point very clearly. So there is a very fundamental difference between India of 1962 and India of 2009.

It is easy to write an article - I wrote articles for 10 long years, hopefully they were balanced ones but necessarily one doesn't have most of the facts. The system that we follow is that you get pieces of information, they are not necessarily considered views and therefore assessment tends sometimes to be quite off the mark.

Karan Thapar: One reason why people are concerned at the moment about the buildup of what they consider to be incursions and also hostile commentary in the Chinese press is a second perception that the border and boundary talks that you're holding are not making progress and secondly that the Chinese are trying to wriggle out of an understanding reached in 2005 that settled areas would not be the subject of any future boundary alignment.

Are your talks with the Chinese on the boundary making progress?

M K Narayanan: I think my last round of talks with Mr. Dai Binggo was the best that I have had in the nine rounds that I have held with him. We discussed the border and boundary dispute.

I think we had over 14.5 hours of discussion spread over a couple of days and of which I think eight-nine hours were on the border. I think we are much more comfortable at this moment than we were a year ago.

Karan Thapar: One of the widespread beliefs is that the Chinese are trying to wriggle out of an understanding achieved in 2005 that settled areas would not be the subject of any border realignment in future?

M K Narayanan: I think it's a way of looking at some of the language which was used. For instance we have talked in terms of due interest of the settled population and there are what I call terms and the nuances of that are different. I think the Chinese would like certain areas with settled populations to be brought within the system.

We have under the political parameters and guiding principles a certain understanding. That's why we are negotiating.

Karan Thapar: Do you have a problem here or is this in fact once again a result of the media not being fully aware?

M K Narayanan: I wouldn't say that this is totally a media issue. There are issues that are coming up but I think both sides understand where we are and that's the whole purpose in our prolonged negotiation.

Karan Thapar: So at the moment you are not worried or perturbed about this?

M K Narayanan: No, not at all.

Karan Thapar: People say, and I want to put this to you deliberately and bluntly, that India is reluctant to face up to China. That India thinks of excuses or justifications to explain away Chinese behaviour. Do we have a China complex particularly after the 1962 war?

M K Narayanan: I don't think so. We are careful. I think we are careful partly because what happened in 1962, that we should not provoke a situation which we do not wish to have. I do not think anybody in India wishes to have a conflict with China and I think that goes also for China.

I think both sides are therefore careful but there are issues in the two countries. I don't think we have all the answers to these issues but the whole purpose of dialogue is to see where the areas of congruence are and where are the differences.

Karan Thapar: But you're saying to me quite clearly and I just want to repeat this that although there may be issues and although no one wants to provoke a situation that leads to another 1962 like conflict there is no sense of appeasement or hesitation or fear in India when dealing with China?

M K Narayanan: No, at least I am not aware of anything of this kind and may be, as I said, since I was there in 1962 I should be more conscious of that. Yes, we are careful and that's important and imperative. We do not wish to get into a situation that we do not want to be in.

Karan Thapar: People also say that China is disdainful of India that China doesn't treat India as an equal - is that your impression?

M K Narayanan: No, China certainly sees us as a rival. They wish to be numero uno in this part of the world. I think the more the rest of the world sees India as a rising power, more importantly as a democratic power, as a country with a tremendous future in terms of not merely its GDP growth but the fact that it is a young population and a tremendous intellectual capability, therefore there is rivalry.

Karan Thapar: But no disdain from the Chinese?

M K Narayanan: Nobody can disdain a country like India. I think it is important - today India cannot be disdained.

* A report published in The Hindu on October 1, highlighted the fact that the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi was not stamping the Chinese Visa on the Indian passport of the residents of Jammu and Kashmiri and instead using a separate piece of paper to stamp the visa. This question was also taken up by the Prime Minister when he met the Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao during their meeting on October 24 in Hua Hin, Thailand on the sidelines of the India-ASEAN Summit. External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna too spoke about it to the Chinese Foreign Minister when the two met on October 27 in Bengaluru on the sidelines of the RIC meeting. ** The Chinese were objecting to Prime Minister Manmohan Singh's visit on October 3 for the poll campaign to the State Assembly. A turnout of electorate to the extent of 72 percent underlined the people's enthusiasm for their democratic rights. India's concern was communicated to Chinese Ambassador Zhang Yan during his scheduled meeting with the Joint Secretary (East) Vijay Gokhale. The spokesman was reacting to the Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Ma Zhaoxu comments that "Despite our grave concerns, an Indian leader went to the disputed area, ... We urge the Indian side to take China's

2. India and China have jointly agreed that the outstanding Boundary Question will be discussed by the Special Representatives appointed by the two Governments. We, therefore, express our disappointment and concern over the statement made by the Official Spokesman of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, since this does not help the process of ongoing negotiations between the two Governments on the Boundary Question. India is committed to resolving outstanding differences with China in a fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable manner, while ensuring that such differences are not allowed to affect the positive development of bilateral relations. We hope that the Chinese side will similarly abide by this understanding."

solemn concerns seriously and to not stir up trouble at the disputed area with a view to ensuring the sound development of China-India relations."

Meanwhile responding to the Chinese concern on the planned visit of the Dalai Lama to the State, the External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna told a television channel that the Dalai Lama would visit Arunachal Pradesh as per his schedule, since as a respected guest of the Government of India he was free to any part of the country.

On October 14, India once again asserted that Arunachal Pradesh being an integral part of the country the Prime Minister Manmohan Singh was well within his rights to visit the State. "Arunachal Pradesh is an integral part of India and the just-concluded Assembly election there, held under the Indian Constitution, proved it," Union Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee said at a press conference in Kolkata. Mr. Mukherjee said "just a few months ago, the people of Arunachal Pradesh sent their representatives to Parliament under the Constitution". He said he too visited Arunachal Pradesh for campaigning and "we consider it our legitimate right to do so."

On October 17 media quoted senior officials in a briefing to suggest that "We have to recognise that there is still some distance to be covered. Problems exist and they will take time to resolve. Till then we have to maintain peace and continue talking. The issues can't be resolved by stopping talking to each other." "We have our communication channels open. We don't want our ties in other areas to be diluted or determined by this border issue alone, which, however, is a major issue in our ties. The focus is on not allowing differences to complicate our relationship or preventing it from improving," media quoted them to observe.

On the question of dam on the river Brahmaputra the media quoted unnamed but official sources to say: "dams being constructed by China ... were of the 'run-of-the-river' category. Neither did India look askance at them nor were there international provisions prohibiting them. They also drew attention to the positive aspects of the relationship such as China having become India's largest trading partner, regular high level meetings, coordination on multilateral fora and peace and tranquillity on the border for over two decades.

In an interview to All India Radio, the Foreign Secretary Nirupama Rao said on October 17 that "Both governments understand that a peaceful relationship between India and China is not only good for the two countries but it is good for this region, it is good globally also."

In her interview to Kalyan Shankar for the AIR, Mrs. Rao said, "The focus that has been given to both the incursions and also to Arunachal Pradesh, only I think intensifies the need for the two sides to really sit down to resolve these issues with even more seriousness and determination." On the question of the Dalai Lama's visit to Arunachal Pradesh she said:

"But notwithstanding the sensitivities on the Chinese side, India is determined to let the Dalai Lama travel to Arunachal Pradesh in November. "We regard and we have always said this clearly and also to China that His Holiness Dalai Lama is a spiritual figure, he is a religious figure and he does not indulge in political activities on Indian soil and he is our guest in India and he is free to visit any part of our country." On October 19, the Prime Minister Manmohan Singh told an Arunachal Pradesh delegation that China had not constructed any dam on the Brahmaputra river - which would have been a matter of concern for India. According to Chief Minister Dorje Khandu, who led the delegation of State leaders, Dr. Singh also told them that India would tackle diplomatically the boundary issue with China. "The Prime Minister said no dam is being constructed and only run-off-the-river construction has been made," Mr. Khandu told reporters while citing a letter from the Chinese government. India has no problem with run-off-the-river constructions as they involve no storage of water. Mr. Khandu said the State is an "integral part of India" and the recent election there was a reply to the Chinese claim. The question of the Dalai Lama visiting Arunachal Pradesh also figured in the Prime Minister's discussions with the Chinese Premier in Hua Hin (Thailand) on the sidelines of the India-ASEAN Summit and the Prime Minister at his press conference on October 25 when asked "Mr. Prime Minister, one of the issues that the Chinese side agreed publicly prior to their meeting with you was their objections to the planned visit to Arunachal Pradesh by the Dalai Lama. In your view do you think this proposed visit will complicate India's relations with China and make resolution of the boundary issue more difficult?, and he replied: "All I can say is that I explained to Premier Wen that the Dalai Lama is our honoured guest; he is a religious leader; we do not allow the Tibetan refugees to indulge in political activities; and that as proof of that last year we took resolute action at the time of Olympics when there were reports that some Tibetan refugees might disrupt the process. That is the position that I explained to Premier Wen." To a further Question: "Just going back to Sidharth's question, you did mention that you explained your position to the Chinese side but were they convinced enough? And is there any change of plan as of now in the Dalai Lama's planned tour to Arunachal Pradesh?" and the Prime Minister replied: "I am not aware of the plans of the Dalai Lama. I have explained this position to the Chinese leadership. We have also agreed that whatever outstanding issues there may be between us - and there is the complex boundary question which cannot be wished away - there are established Government channels to exchange views on all these issues, and one does not have therefore to go to the media to accentuate or exaggerate the amount of differences that prevail. We both agreed that the boundary question is a complex question; that pending a resolution of the boundary question we both have an obligation to maintain peace and tranquillity along the border."

On October 24 the question of the visit of Dalai Lama again cropped up at the press briefing of Foreign Secretary for the President's visit to the UK and the question asked was: "There has been a suggestion that the Dalai Lama's visit to Arunachal Pradesh may be called off in the light of ongoing war of words between various media entities in India and China. Is that at all likely to happen or is he going ahead with his visit?" and the Foreign Secretary replied: "I am not aware of such a suggestion firstly. Secondly, I have said this before and the Government has said this before that His Holiness the Dalai Lama is a respected religious and spiritual figure. We regard him as such. The Tibetan community in India is not expected to undertake any political activity. That is our consistent position. We have also said the Dalai Lama is free to travel anywhere in India."

457. Response of the Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs on a media report about a Chinese dam on Brahmaputra river.

New Delhi, October 15, 2009.

The Brahmaputra flows for about 1625 kilometres inside the Tibet Autonomous Region of the People's Republic of China and for a further 918 kilometres inside India.

Keeping in mind that the river is an economic resource for the development of the local communities in the two countries, India and China agreed in November 2006 to establish an Expert Level Mechanism to discuss trans-border river issues in an institutional way. Three meetings have been held so far.

During these meetings, the Indian side has taken up with the Chinese side, reports about the construction of a large scale dam or diversion project in the Brahmaputra. The Indian side has conveyed that such a project may have significant impact on the socio-economic condition of people living downstream. The Indian side has also expressed the hope that the Chinese side will not undertake such a large scale project or divert the waters of the Brahmaputra.

The Chinese side has categorically denied that there is a plan to build any such large scale diversion project on the Brahmaputra river.

We are looking into the said newspaper report to ascertain whether there are recent developments that suggest any change in the position conveyed to us by the Government of China*.

* The media on October 15 reported of strong evidence of Chinese activities that suggested actual construction had started on the 540 MW project, some time in March-April, contrary to the earlier assurances. The report further giving details said "The 1.138-billion Yuan project had been awarded to a five-company consortium with China Gezhouba Group. The report said from 'preliminary information available with India, the Chinese plan to have a series of five medium-sized dams along the river in the Nanshan region of Tibet at Zangmu, Jiacha or Gyatsa, Zhongda, Jiexu and Langzhen'. On October 25, the Hindu daily quoted senior officials to suggest that the Prime Minister Singh had conveyed in his opening remarks during his meeting with the Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao in Hua Hin on October 24 India's concerns about the need for relevant information and data sharing on this project and the Chinese Premier Wen said 'some data had been shared in the past but agreed that a proposed meeting of technical experts - the joint expert-level mechanism on trans-border rivers is supposed to meet annually but has been delayed this year - could take the issue up'. When the Prime Minister was asked at his

458. Extract relevant to China from the Interview of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao with Senior Journalist Kalyani Shankar for All India Radio.

New Delhi, October 16, 2009.

KS: Mrs. Nirupama Rao, you had been the Indian Ambassador to China before you took over as Foreign Secretary. You are fully aware of the Indo-China policy, the Sino-Indian policy also. Do you think the Chinese protest, it is on account of the huge turnout in the Assembly elections or there are other significant things like Pakistan Prime Minister Gilani is visiting Beijing? There have also been reports of a Chinese incursion in the last few months. And also the controversy about China issuing Visa papers to Kashmiris.

Foreign Secretary (FS): We take a long term perspective in our relations with China. China is our largest neighbour. We share a very long boundary with China. There are outstanding issues relating to this boundary which are yet to be resolved. And, therefore, the whole issue that you referred to and the Chinese protests that have been made should be seen in the context of the unresolved boundary question between the two countries. We are very intensively focused on this issue. But at the same time, one must understand that the relationship with China has also been developed in many other areas.

And that development of relations and the concomitant build up of good communication and better understanding between the governments of the two countries and indeed also the academic institutions, the business and industry circles, better connectivity, all this has happened in the last twenty years. So this is what, well, in terms of bringing the two countries into a better mode of communication with each other. As far as boundary between press conference after the conclusion of the India-ASEAN Summit on October 25 about the concerns of the North-Eastern States on the issue of Dams the Prime Minister replied: I did raise this issue with Premier Wen Jiabao yesterday. I conveyed to him that cooperation in the area of trans-border rivers is of mutual benefit. Premier Wen said that keeping in mind the overall friendly relations and the humanitarian aspects, the Chinese side has been providing hydrological data during the flood season. He said that relevant discussion on trans-border river issues could be held through the expert level mechanism that we have constituted. So, the answer to your question is, I did raise the issue of trans-border river systems."

The External Affairs Minister on October 27 told a meeting of the Bangalore Press Club that "It was conveyed to us by our own experts that no such thing is happening there."

the two countries is concerned, there is still a lot of ground that we have to cover in terms of narrowing differences and building more understanding. But progress in this regard is being made, albeit slowly but it is being made surely. We have the mechanism of the special representatives appointed by the two governments to look into these issues and they have held thirteen rounds of discussions so far. So, as far as the boundary question is concerned, even as we have had these reports of protests and the incursions, one must understand also that there is a situation in which both our countries are placed at the moment and that situation is this focus on trying to resolve the boundary question peacefully.

And on that I believe, I can say it with all honesty, both governments are convinced that there is no other way to resolve this without dialogue. One has to resolve it through dialogue. I remember our first late Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, speaking to Parliament in 1962 saying "we cannot march to Peking" and I am quoting his words. But whatever it is, we must take a realistic view that there are differences, there are differences when it comes to perceiving the line of actual control in the border areas. And there are differences also in terms of conflicting territorial claims. So this is a very complex issue. It is one of the most complicated boundary questions that exist anywhere in the world. But I think it is a good development and it is a positive factor that both countries are determined to resolve these issues.

KS: Do you think in the next round of discussions between the two special representatives, this incursions will be taken up and also about this Arunachal issue will come up because it is again referring to the border?.

FS: In fact, the focus that has been given to both the incursions and also to the Arunachal Pradesh issue, only I think intensifies the need for the two sides to really sit down to resolve these issues with even more seriousness and determination. Because, I think, both governments understand that a peaceful relationship between India and China is not only good for the two countries but it is good for this region, it is good globally also. Just look at the number of issues on which we can cooperate, we are cooperating whether it comes to the Doha Development round, whether it comes to climate change issues, whether it comes to cooperation in multilateral fora, in the reform of the international financial system in the wake of the global economic crisis. There are many many other issues in the relationship where we have common ground where there is a meeting of minds, so I think, we must look at this whole relationship in the larger perspective.

KS: But is the government taking it very seriously, I mean what has been said about Prime Minister's visit. As you said earlier rightly that this is not the first time they have protested. They have protested earlier also.

FS: Of course we take this seriously, and we have been very very particular and very clear and unambivalent in expressing our position to the Chinese. In that way we have said that Arunachal Pradesh is an integral part of India, it is an inalienable part of India.

KS : Mrs. Rao, will there be any change about Dalai Lama visiting Arunachal next month? He is supposed to go there and, I think, Indian government has put a condition that he should not talk anything political and Chinese are objecting to this also?

FS: Well, we regard and we have always said this clearly and also to China that His Holiness Dalai Lama is a spiritual figure, he is a religious figure and he does not indulge in political activities on Indian soil and he is our guest in India and he is free to visit any part of our country.

KS : Mrs. Rao, the Chinese Foreign Minister is due to visit India shortly for the Russia-China-India trilateral. What issues will be discussed in this meeting and also at what level will our Foreign Minister be raising these points?

FS: Kalyani this is a trilateral meeting of the Foreign Ministers, India-Russia-China trilateral. This is the structure that the three countries have devised and this enables us to discuss issues of regional importance and of course, our External Affairs Minister will be meeting his Chinese counterpart during this meeting and this meeting will afford us the opportunity to touch upon various issues of mutual concern and mutual interest in the bilateral relationship, but you must understand that the larger context of this meeting is trilateral. But, there will be bilateral meetings and of course, it goes without saying that whenever we have the opportunity to meet between the two countries, as we would on this occasion, the opportunity does arise for us to raise all issues including issues of concern because it is through discussion, through frank discussion and through open discussion and through discussion at that level, we can remove misunderstandings.

* The Hindu on October 25th however, quoted senior officials, 'pointing out on condition of anonymity that difficult issues were raised and discussed, especially the recent tension over the boundary question and lingering uncertainties about upstream water projects on the Yaluzangbu, as the Brahmaputra is known on the Chinese side'. The paper quoted Indian officials to suggest that the Chinese premier reaffirmed this understanding twice. He said the border dispute was "complicated and difficult" and that both sides must have "courage, vision and patience" in order to reach a settlement that was "fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable." He also noted that in 2,000 years of shared historical and civilisational ties, India and China had been through a "very difficult period" just once.

The Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at his press conference in Hua Hin on October 25 gave a broader perspective of his meeting with the Chinese Premier when asked: "Mr. Prime Minister, what happened in your meeting with the Chinese Premier? Did we raise the issue of Chinese incursions into Indian territory?" and he replied: "I had a frank and constructive exchange of views with Premier Wen both during our formal meetings and at the gala dinner last night. We discussed all these issues and agreed that existing mechanisms for bilateral cooperation should be used to resolve all issues amicably in the spirit of the strategic and cooperative partnerships. As you know, the Chinese Foreign Minister will be visiting India in two days' time and the Foreign Ministers will have an opportunity to discuss all issues which have bearing on our relationship. The Premier and I reaffirmed the need to maintain peace and tranquillity on the border pending a resolution of the boundary question. Both of us agreed that we should continue and strengthen efforts to build political trust and understanding."

* Media report said that at the meeting the Chinese Foreign Minister did not raise the issue of Dalai Lama's proposed visit to Arunachal Pradesh. On complaint about the issue of visa to Chinese workers employed on the Indian projects, Mr. Yang was told by his Indian interlocutors: "There was no change in the visa regime. Only the misuse of the business visa was stopped. Visas would henceforth be uniform employment visas" applicable to all foreign worker. China condemned the Mumbai attacks and the repeat bombing of the Indian embassy in Kabul after India gave a detailed briefing and "exposed" the masterminds, media quoted highly placed sources to say. China said such killing of innocent civilians "also affected them." The two sides also dwelt on trade issues and explored ideas to step up the volume in a manner that addressed Indian concerns about the massive imbalance. Briefing the media a day earlier on the 26th October Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs said: "Absolute peace and tranquillity prevails along the LAC between India and China." However, he added for good measure, as had been articulated in the past that Indian and Chinese patrols were presumably foraying into each other's territory as the LAC had not been clearly demarcated.

Next day on October 28 the External Affairs Minister Mr. Krishna replying questions from the media at a press meeting organized by the Bangalore Press Club, said "China wants to have good ties and I have often said India would like to have very friendly relations with China. Our effort is to take this relationship to the level of partnership. Hence there is goodwill on both sides and it augurs well." Regarding the India-China border, referring to the 13 meetings of the representatives of the two countries he said: "We have to have lots of patience. I would like to assert that the India-China border is one of the most peaceful and tranquil one though it is not delineated. Because of this, if there are incursions, there is a mechanism and things are sorted out at the field level." Regarding the visit of Dalai Lama to Arunachal Pradesh, Mr. Krishna said the Dalai Lama, as a guest of India, was free to go wherever he wants. "The only restriction on the Dalai Lama is that he should not indulge in politics or boundary related questions." On reports of construction of a dam by China across the Brahmaputra, he said "It was conveyed to us by our own experts that no such thing is happening there." About the issuance of visa to Indians from Jammu and Kashmir by China on a separate slip, instead of on the passport, Mr. Krishna said he told his Chinese counterpart that it should be uniform for all Indians.

Talking about Pakistan he said organisations based in Pakistan were "breeding terror" against India, and described as "ridiculous" the allegation by the Pakistan Foreign Minister that India was supporting terror attacks in several parts of that country. He said that the preliminary reports on the two attacks on the Indian Embassy in Kabul suggested that the perpetrators were "outsiders and not those who live in Afghanistan." On the Mumbai attacks, Mr. Krishna said India had provided six dossiers to Pakistan on the involvement of its nationals and Islamabad should now pursue the leads and bring them to justice.

advising visitors to China regarding visa requirements.

New Delhi, November 11, 2009.

It has come to the attention of Government of India that the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in New Delhi and the Chinese Consulates in Mumbai and Kolkata are issuing visas on a separate piece of paper "stapled" to the passport (rather than "pasted" as is the usual practice), to certain categories of Indian nationals on the basis of their domicile, ethnicity and/or place of issue of the passport. Such paper visas stapled to the passport are not considered valid for travel out of the country.

All Indian citizens intending to travel to the People's Republic of China are advised that before making any travel arrangements they should first ascertain from the Chinese Embassy or Consulate, as the case may be, whether the visa being issued to them will be affixed to the passport or will be in the nature of a stapled paper visa, so that they are not inconvenienced or put to any financial loss later on this count.

463. Address of the Vice President M. Hamid Ansari at the Conference titled "Emerging China: Prospects for Partnership in Asia" organized by Indian Council of World Affairs and Association of Asian Scholars. November 2009.

New Delhi, November 21, 2009.

I am happy to be here at this seminar organized by the Indian Council of World Affairs and the Association of Asia Scholars. Sapru House itself has a place in the evolution of our foreign policy thinking. Established in 1943, the Council is tasked to promote the study of national and international affairs. More than a generation of scholars, analysts and diplomatists has passed through its portals.

It was here that Jawaharlal Nehru, with his vision of Asia forged in the fires of the struggle for freedom that raged across the entire continent of Asia, organized the Asian Relations Conference in 1947 as a non-governmental gathering.

Human societies live in time and space. A historian has noted that in the year 1500 each one of the great centres of world civilization was at a roughly similar stage of development, some more advanced in one area but less so in others. Subsequent events were to show that initiative, technological innovation, intellectual liberty and a flourishing economic base provided the critical mix that allowed the West to dominate the world for almost five centuries.

The Asian Relations Conference was held at the end of one era and at the threshold of another. One theme of the Conference was the contours of the awakening of Asia; another was cooperation and partnership among the countries and peoples of Asia. The objective was spelt out by Nehru: "We propose to stand on our own feet and to co-operate with all others who are prepared to co-operate with us."

Six decades later, the continent stands at the threshold of another Asian era. In this period the Nehruvian vision of Asia, indeed the geographical unity of the continent so to speak, has ceased to matter for geo-politics or economics. Asia developed, but the development was perceived and reflected in individual countries, sub-regional and trans-regional groupings. Japan emerged from the ruins of the Second World War as an important economic powerhouse, South East Asia has witnessed rapid economic growth and there has been a dramatic change in the economic, military and political profile of China. India has developed at a much faster pace in the last decade bringing millions out of poverty and showing that substantive social and economic progress is possible through democratic governance.

In this period, even as India and China enunciated the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence as the corner stone of inter-state relations, the bilateral relations between them did not always conform to those very principles. Yet, as Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi presciently put it in 1988: "What must not be forgotten in a listing of differences is a listing of commonality in our world outlook. There has been significant parallelism in the views expressed by India and China on a wide range of issues relating to world security, the international political order, the new international economic order, global concerns in regard to environment and space".

A glance at the Asian map shows that over a wide arc extending from West Asia, through Central Asia, to South and South East Asia to East Asia, Indian and Chinese interests intersect. Active partnership between New Delhi and Beijing and mutual sensitivity to each other's concerns is thus vitally necessary if stability, security and prosperity in the shared spaces in their near and distant neighbourhood are to be effectively ensured.

The leaderships of India and China during the past two decades have cooperated in creating mutual political and economic stakes for mutual benefit. Economic cooperation between us has become a principal driver of our strategic and cooperative partnership for peace and prosperity. Yet, cooperation does not preclude competition. We realize that countries compete in global markets and such competition is constructive and beneficial rather than adversarial.

The post-Cold War world also demands that we readjust our theoretical models of state behaviour. Traditional concepts of polarity, alliance building, balance of power and spheres of influence have to contend with the impact of globalization where opportunities for, and threats to, human welfare and national progress have a global character. How India and China deal with various trans-national challenges such as terrorism, illegal migration, smuggling of drugs and arms and pandemics would affect large parts of Asia. The joint vision of the leaderships in India and China is to ensure a global order in which our simultaneous development will have a positive impact for our peoples and economies, as also for the rest of the world.

Friends

Allow me to dilate a little on conceptual frameworks. Partnership in Asia has primarily taken four forms. The first is one of Asian regionalism. Asia has been primarily reduced to the total of its constituent sub-regions like GCC, SAARC, SCO, ASEAN, BIMSTEC and the MGC or the Mekong Ganga Cooperation framework. The second means of partnership has been through inter-regional dialogue forums like Asia-Europe Meeting (ASEM) and APEC. The third framework is one of global and multilateral organizations. These include the UN and its specialized bodies, the IMF and World Bank, WTO and WIPO, Asian Development Bank etc. There also exist thematic organizations such as the G-20, Organisation of Islamic Conference (OIC) and the League of Arab States. The fourth framework is that of bilateral relations between countries of Asia.

The last decade has seen two contradictory trends at work. Even as market-driven globalization is a reality, the global political and economic institutional framework has weakened and is evident in the diminished role and influence of bodies such as the United Nations, IMF, World Bank and WTO. Nations have resorted to regional political and economic institutions to resolve problems and cooperate for mutual gain. This phenomenon is most visible in the economic arena. With progress being stalled in the Doha round of trade negotiations, countries of Asia have concluded regional and bilateral free trade and economic partnership agreements creating the so-called "noodle bowl" of Asian regionalism, spurred on by the inability of global multilateral bodies to address the Asian economic crisis in 1997 and leading to the emergence of the ASEAN+3 framework.

The evolution of community building and partnership in Asia thereafter led to the launching of the East Asia Summit (EAS) process. The first Declaration issued in Kuala Lumpur called for the EAS to be an open, inclusive, transparent and outward looking forum. The ultimate vision is one of Asian economic integration by converging the Free Trade Agreements among Asian countries into an Asian Regional Trade Agreement. This could, later, lead to the creation of a broader Asian Economic Community.

Ladies and Gentlemen

Partnership and cooperation among Asian countries is a necessity to take advantage of the opportunities emerging as a result of the region's increasing economic integration, as also to face the common threats of terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, energy shortage, security of sea lanes, pandemics, natural disasters and others. China is an important element of this architecture of cooperation, as are India, Japan, Korea, ASEAN, Australia, New Zealand and all other Asian sub-regions.

The future weight and success of Asia is the sum of the success of each of these national and regional components and the tenacity of their inter-linkages. Long-term security and stability in Asia is dependent on the ability of Asian countries to build mutual stakes in one another. Every framework that can further this process should be encouraged and welcomed. A few caveats however would be in order:

1. No partnership architecture or process should be exclusive or exclusionary. It should seek to bring into the fold as many Asian nations as possible and articulate an inclusive, open and transparent process of community building.
2. Community building in Asia should not be a reflection of the emerging redistribution of global or regional power nor should it be a platform for projection of narrow economic and political interests of a nation or group of nations.
3. Soft regionalism based on informal dialogue and consultation mechanisms, consensus building and open structures is a better alternative to hard regionalism based on rigid and definitive institutional structures, inflexible mechanisms and formal dialogue.
4. A multitude of formal cooperation structures could lead to a pick-and-choose policy for 'forum shopping'. The "noodle bowl" of free trade agreements and comprehensive partnership agreements is overflowing and the impact of these numerous bilateral and multilateral agreements on trade efficiency is an open question. Eventually, there would be no alternative to effective and functioning global multilateral institutions such as the United Nations, IMF, the World Bank and the WTO to ensure that there is a fair, transparent, open and rules-based global political and economic order.

Before I conclude, and in a gathering of strategic thinkers and analysts, it is relevant to recall the words of a master of statecraft of the 19th century. Nations, he observed, travel on the stream of time which they neither create nor direct but upon which they can "steer with more or less skill and experience." I am confident that this conference would make a contribution to this compendium of skill and also come forth with some practical suggestions about how trans-Asian connectivity can be achieved in an early time frame.

I thank the Indian Council of World Affairs and the Association of Asia Scholars for inviting me to inaugurate this Conference and wish your deliberations all success.

464. Valedictory Address by Minister of State Dr Shashi Tharoor at the International Conference on the theme of "Emerging China: Prospects for Partnership in Asia" organized by the Indian Council of World Affairs.

New Delhi, November 22, 2009.

It is an honour to be invited to deliver the valedictory address to this distinguished audience brought together here today under the auspices of the Indian Council of World Affairs and the Association of Asia Scholars. I understand that over the last two days, many insightful and well-informed ideas on the shape of Asia and the world at large, consequent upon the phenomenon of China's rapid emergence have been discussed. It is a theme that has captured the attention of the world, be it Governments and policymakers, or scholars, intellectuals and strategic thinkers like yourselves.

As witnesses to history in the making, it is important for all of us to share our ideas and understandings in order to deal with the new challenges and to take advantage of the enormous opportunities brought about by the changes taking place in Asia. A conference dedicated to the theme of "Emerging China: Prospects for Partnership in Asia" is therefore timely. I must compliment the organizers for their prescience and initiative.

I also appreciate the fact that the ICWA and AAS have jointly taken the initiative to organize a Series of Conferences on Asian Relations, starting with this very Conference. It is befitting that the ICWA should steer this process. Way back in 1947, even before India and several nations in Asia were yet to throw off the colonial yoke, when China was still in the throes of an uncertain civil war, and when Asia got no more than a footnote in any chapter on global politics and economics, this distinguished institute, under the inspiration of Shri Jawaharlal Nehru, organized a visionary "Asian Relations Conference". Many of the tenets of that endeavour are closer to being a reality today, with the process of Asia's economic integration and interdependence already in motion and the alignments for an inclusive Asian Community beginning to shape up. Meanwhile, the centre of gravity of the world economy has begun to shift eastwards to Asia, propelled first by the Asian Tigers and now, if I am permitted to continue the metaphor, increasingly by the Dragon and the Elephant. In these exciting times, it is once again the ICWA that attempts to nurture an Asian understanding of the changing Asia through this commendable series of conferences.

Returning to the theme of this conference, let me point out that China's emergence, much like the emergence of the rest of Asia, including India, is not an altogether new phenomenon. As ancient civilizations, China and India have remained constants in the long course of history. Economic historians tell us that before the Industrial Revolution in the West, China, together with India, accounted for over half of the world GDP. Autarky in China and feudal infighting in India prevented the two countries from maintaining this lead and reaping the fruits of industrialization and global commerce. After two centuries of colonial or semi-colonial rule, both China and India, uncertain of the global environment in a Cold War world, initially experimented with planned growth that focused on acquiring self-reliance. But both of us realized the limitations of this approach ---- China in the late 1970s and we in the early 1990s ---- and opened up our respective economies for foreign trade and investment. At the same time, the enabling domestic infrastructure and the institutions that both our countries had evolved before embarking on economic reforms created the symbiotic attractions for foreign investors. We were also benefitted by the forces of globalization in our return to the global stage.

I am speaking about India and China together, not because I accept the glib idea of "Chindia", but because our growth stories and growth trajectories are similar. China and India are two countries whose development will have a significant impact on the global system, and on the world's sense of where international economic and political power will shift in the decades to come. We are the most populous nations on the earth, with the arduous task of uplifting millions of our citizens and realizing social harmony and inclusive growth. Given the scale of our economies and the scale of the 'catching-up' required, this is likely to be a long-drawn out process, in which China is clearly well ahead. Both of us, though, require sustained international cooperation and a peaceful security environment around us in order to fulfill this task. Currently, in a world faced with a rare economic and financial crisis and tenacious new threats and challenges, our job has become all the more difficult. Therefore, as responsible nations with a stake in peace, stability and prosperity of the world, both India and China must strive to tackle the new challenges together while helping the global economy out of a recession that had nothing to do with us. The continued growth of our two economies have proved vital to the health of the world economy, and that in itself is a most eloquent proof of the prospects for the world and Asia of an emerging China, and may I add, an emerging India.

The Government of India does not view China or China's development as a threat. We have always tried to develop a friendly and cooperative relationship with China, which is our largest neighbor and with which we cannot afford to have a relationship of antagonism. Long before the India-China growth story attracted global attention, we drew upon our civilizational wisdom to enunciate the principles of Panchsheel that demonstrated our interest in building peace and friendship. Our relationship has since evolved to a point where we now have a Strategic and Cooperative Partnership for Peace and Prosperity and a Shared Vision for the 21st Century with China. Indeed, our relationships have become so multifaceted, strategic and intricate that the nature of stakeholders in our relations have changed and broadened to include the wider civil society in both nations.

We do have differences in some areas, notably over the border between our countries. I believe dialogue and diplomacy hold the key to resolving these differences. We decided more than two decades ago not to let such issues come in the way of cooperation in functional areas, even as we try to find solutions to our differences. This has helped our two sides in our common quest for peace and prosperity. The border has been largely peaceful and tranquil, while China has emerged as our largest trading partner, at over $50 billion in annual trade, and the biggest overseas project contractor. Tourism, particularly of Indian pilgrims to the major Hindu holy sites in Tibet, Mount Kailash and Lake Mansarovar, is thriving. Indian information technology firms have opened offices in Shanghai and Hangzhou, and Infosys recruited nine Chinese this year for their headquarters in Bangalore. There are dozens of Chinese engineers working in (and learning from) Indian computer firms and engineering companies from Gurgaon to Bangalore, while Indian software engineers in Chennai and Bangalore support the Chinese telecoms equipment manufacturer Huawei. Seven thousand Indian students are currently studying in China.

It should be our endeavour to consolidate these gains. There is a lot that India and China can achieve by joining hands together, and it will not only be for their interest, but for the common good in Asia and the developing world. India is not an obstacle to China's aspirations, far less an instrument for its "containment", as was wrongly suggested by some.

It would certainly help if Chinese scholars and commentators broadened and deepened their understanding of India. Equally, knowledge and scholarship of China in our country needs to be augmented: we need to understand China better. Scholars present here today have an important role to provide a compass to the Government and the public and help us pursue our 'enlightened self-interest' with an emerging China. It would help if the media, which has not always been constructive on this issue, plays a more responsible role. I hope a solid beginning has been made through this Conference.

Our Prime Minister has often said that the world is big enough for both India and China to realize their developmental aspirations. I would like to submit that the world is big enough for the whole of Asia to join in aspirations to make the 21st century an Asian Century. We need to look for opportunities, and I like to think that both China and India today present some of these opportunities, for each other as well for others around us. On that note, I would like to once again congratulate the organizers for this successful Conference.

465. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Defence on the meeting between the Defence Minister A. K. Antony and Chinese Deputy Chief of General Staff Gen. Ge Zhen-Feng.

New Delhi, December 4, 2009.

The Deputy Chief of General Staff of the Peoples' Liberation Army, China, General Ge Zhen-Feng called on the Defence Minister Shri AK Antony here today.

During the meeting the visiting dignitary said that China is interested in building cordial relations with India on all fronts. Gen Ge also stated that the present generation of political leadership in both countries would solve the border dispute through political negotiations and dialogue. Outlining his Government's position, he said that the border dispute is a remnant of history. Shri Antony said that India did not want to escalate differences and would work together to strengthen cooperation in various areas to the benefit of both countries.

Gen Ge, heading a Peoples' Liberation Army delegation on a six-day visit to India from December 01, 2009, said that the Chinese Government would observe the 60th Anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic ties between the two countries in 2010 as an important occasion to strengthen people to people contacts. He conveyed to Shri Antony an invitation on behalf of the Defence Minister of China to visit Beijing at an early date.

General Ge also called on Defence Secretary Shri Pradeep Kumar and discussed matters of mutual interest.

466. Speech of External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna replying to the discussion in the Lok Sabha on India - China Relations.

New Delhi, December 9, 2009.

The Minister of External Affairs (Shri S.M. Krishna): Mr. Chairman, Sir, I am grateful to the hon. Members who have participated in this very important debate which was initiated by one of our senior leaders, Dr. Murli Manohar Joshi; and a number of friends have added to the content of this debate. It has shed light on a number of issues and it has pointed out to the areas of our strength and to the areas of our weaknesses. The Government will certainly take note - and I say particular note - of where we have shortcomings. In the course of the coming months, we will be in a position to address ourselves to these concerns which, I would say, are rather compelling. Dr. Joshi did provide a historical peep into the relation between these two countries. These are two countries which have had civilizational links. We have had our trade links and we have had our spiritual links. The cumulative impact of these links will point out to only one course and that is that we should strive for deepening of our cordial relations, our trade relations. Economists have been predicting that the 21st century will certainly belong to these two Asian giants. China and India will emerge in the next 25 years, if not earlier, as the economic superpowers of the world. We also can make our useful contributions for stabler global conditions between the two countries: India and China. I think we have shown to the rest of the world how even though there is a global slowdown in the economy, but it has not impacted China and it has not impacted much in India. Let me make a distinction here that China has been able to continue their trajectory of seven to eight per cent growth whereas India has not been able to match that. But we are lingering around six-and-a-half per cent hoping that we will be reaching seven per cent next year.

This is only to prove the point that these emerging Asian economies are going to dictate the pace of the global economic growth in the coming years. Sir, this is no mean compliment to our own achievement. We have done exceedingly well and we should be happy about it. This should give us the necessary self-confidence for the country to surge forward in the years to come. India and China have had good relations and at times we have had strained relationship. Many of my friends did draw our attention to the developments of the 1960s and to the developments of the 1980s. Sir, I for one feel that history has something to convey to us. If it has something to convey to us we should humbly take note of that fact and then try to learn from whatever shortcomings or mistakes. You might call them as mistakes and I might say that they were shortcomings. Nonetheless, as a matured country we should take due note of whatever had happened in the last five decades and more. Sir, in the next year we are celebrating the Sixtieth year of the starting of the diplomatic relationship with China. We would like to celebrate it in a befitting manner because these two Asian giants have got to celebrate this. The way we are looking forward to celebrating this is that in the whole year we will be celebrating India's year in China and the China's year in India. These are reciprocal symbolic gestures which we make to our neighbours. We value China's friendship, association and we would like to further take it to certain strategic levels. I am sure that China is willing to reciprocate. There have been a number of high level meetings which have taken place in the recent past. Our relations with China get very high priority in our strategic thinking. We would like to develop this cooperative partnership based on equality in which each side should be sensitive enough to the concerns, aspirations and sentiments of the other nation.

As part of our practice of maintaining regular high level political exchanges, the Prime Minister has met the Chinese Premier very recently in Thailand. I had the pleasure of having a meeting with the Chinese Foreign Minister in Bangalore in the month of October. We had very frank and constructive exchanges with the Chinese Foreign Minister. Adding to this, the hon. President of India is scheduled to visit China next year. I have also been also invited to visit China for bilateral talks; and I intend to go to China next year. Leadership in both the countries agree on the importance of strengthening cooperation and maintaining forward looking approach to bilateral relations. This can be done only when an atmosphere of trust, an atmosphere of mutual respect and understanding of each other's positions on various issues can take place. We are also continuing with our Defence cooperation with China. Our Defence exchanges are also increasing. The Deputy Chief of General Staff of the Chinese Army visited Delhi in the first week of December. We will be holding the Third Defence Dialogue with China next month. This will build better understanding between our Armed Forces. Most importantly, the bilateral trade between our two countries has touched a new high of 52 billion US dollars this year, and we have jointly set a target to take it to 60 billion US dollars by next year. Even though the trade deficit has been growing, and this obviously is a matter of concern to India, the Prime Minister himself has flagged this issue with the Premier during his meeting in Thailand and I have taken it up with the Foreign Minister of China in Bangalore. We are pressing them for greater market access for Indian goods and services. The Chinese side has promised to take measures to address our concerns.

There are other areas where the two countries can gainfully, for mutual benefit, work together including in the field of energy, tourism, education, culture, science and technology, civil aviation, water resources, etc. We are diversifying our exchanges and cooperation.

Well, this is the plus side of our relationship. But there are outstanding issues of which the boundary question is an important area where we have not been able to come to an amicable understanding between ourselves. Well, this is being discussed by a mechanism which has been created between the two countries by mutual acceptance that the Special Representatives, who are addressed, to sort out these boundary differences. I am sure the hon. House, more particularly, a seasoned Parliamentarian like Dr. Murli Manohar Joshi will appreciate the fact that this is a very complex issue and this is also time consuming issue because of the fact that the boundary has not been demarcated. We have only a Line of Actual Control between the two countries. Our perception and their perception may not find convergence, and in those areas we will have to argue with them and then try to find an acceptable solution to those issues. We have had 13 meetings at the level of Special Representatives, and I am sure more meetings are in the pipeline. Both the Prime Minister and myself have conveyed to the Chinese leadership that our differences over the boundary question should not be allowed to affect our functional cooperation in other areas. The importance of both sides maintaining peace and tranquillity in our border areas has also been underscored. It goes without saying that we will remain vigilant on our borders. Our Armed Forces are regularly patrolling all areas along the border with China.

A mention was made about the infrastructure development all along the borders between India and China. Well, without trying to sound alarmistic, I would like to submit to this House with all humility that within the constraints of our resource that we have been trying to develop our infrastructure over the border line of India and China, and in the months to come, it is bound to increase. The momentum is going to be much higher than what I and you have been seeing of late. After going through very carefully our boundary issues and the concerns of the people, we will have to keep reporting to you because we are a democracy. We are answerable to the people of this country, and this Government is answerable to this hon. Parliament. Hence, we will have to keep reporting to you as whatever steps we take to strengthen our borders, to strengthen our infrastructure in our border areas. I think I would like to give an assurance to this House that we will continue to do so with all the might that is at our command. Now, having made these general points, I would like to go through some of the observations that the hon. Members have made. Due to the paucity of time, I will not be able to dwell at length some of the points which have been made, though important. I will have to be brief in my attempt to meet those concerns. Dr. Murli Manohar Joshi himself made the point that there were 200 incursions or more. Yes, there were incursions. It is in the public domain that we have said it in answer to a number of questions that there have been incursions. But there is also a mechanism. Whenever such incursions take place on our boundary between China and India; between India and China, there is a mechanism which we have created that it gets sorted out there itself. Because it is not a demarcated boundary line and it is only a line of control, their perceptions and our perceptions can certainly differ. As a result of that, we have brought in a mechanism where we try to settle these issues at the local level, at the boundary level, and at the field level itself.

Dr. Murli Manohar Joshi: I agree that you say that there is a mechanism. But what we find is that this mechanism has been violated more by China. That is, when you say that between this range of the line of actual control on our side and their side there will be no such activity, they have violated even that area and they have come to us. We have not gone to them. The whole point is that if there is a 10 km. or 5 km. or 8 km. border where there should be no such activity, neither we will go nor they will come. But they are coming within this area. I would like to know whether they recognize their actual line of control or not.

Shri S.M. Krishna: I do not think that there could be such selective solutions to the boundary problem. I think whatever China does or whatever India does, it has to be on a basis which is acceptable to both India and China. So, if there are some incursions either by China or by India, then certainly we have to deal with it. The short point that I am trying to make is, Mr. Chairman, that we have tried to defuse these incursions, defuse these differences, so that it does not get enlarged into some kind of a major difference between these two big countries. It is the approach and hope of the Government of India that we will be able to contain these boundary incursions. I would like to commend the speech made by Shri Sandeep Dikshit. He was able to pin-point the strength of our country. He conveyed to this House that let us not be diffident. Well, 1960 was something, but 2009 is totally different. There is a sea-change which has come about. India has become strong in every sense of the term and we cannot be brow-beaten by anybody. So, when we have that kind of a confidence within ourselves, then I think we will be in a position to face regardless of who or how powerful the adversary is. But, this is not a bravado because I for one believe after talking to the Foreign Minister of China on a very serious note that China is willing to reciprocate. In fact, I was very pleasantly surprised when the Chinese Foreign Minister himself reminded me - I did not but he reminded me - about the five principles, Mrs. Chakravarty, of peaceful co-existence. ... (Interruptions)

Shrimati Bijoya Chakravarty: But they never practice what they say. ... (Interruptions)

Shri S.M. Krishna: Sir, I was surprised and I was impressed also. I had forgotten about the five principles of co-existence. But my counterpart in China reminded me of that and he assured me that China will adhere to those principles of co-existence. If that is done, then most of our problems which have been aired by certain Members of this hon. House will get automatically resolved and then, perhaps, we can happily live thereafter, each growing in his own right. Shri Vijay Bahadur Singh, hon. Member and Shri Shailendra Kumar, another hon. Member wanted to evaluate our shortcomings. Shri Vijay Bahadur Singh talked about a crisis of confidence. I think we do not have a crisis of confidence from our side. We are fully secure and we feel quite confident in what we are saying and how we are dealing with China and we know that China would understand our concerns and China will respect those concerns of ours. Shri Vijay Bahadur Singh also mentioned about stapled visa. Well, this is something which has come up very recently. I think we have reacted to it, the only way that a strong India can react to that. We have said - anything which is not stamped on the Indian passport will not be treated as a valid visa either to go out or to come into this country. So, how can you say that our policy towards China is weakening? How can you say that our policy towards China is soft? Well, we have not been hard; but we have been very correct. China must understand this and they will have to respect the way we are dealing with our visas in the last sixty years. Suddenly, they cannot introduce a new system where they would staple on a white paper and then attach it to our passports. We certainly are not going to compromise with the visa policy which has been laid down by the Ministry of External Affairs.

Shri Jagdish Sharma drew our attention to the menace of duplicate drugs which are making their way into Indian territory. Well, duplicate currency and duplicate medicines - all these are menaces and we are keeping a close eye on how these come and where to checkmate it and where to prevent it. ...

(Interruptions)

I think Shri Mahtab also did refer to the visa problem and the border problem. Shri Anant Geete mentioned that we are becoming a soft State. Well, I would reject that kind of a contention with the contempt that it deserves. We are not a soft State; we are a State which has earned the respect of the entire world today. You should just go out of India to understand how you are looked upon. I did study in the USA and I have seen how I was treated some 40 years ago and today, even when we go as an ordinary citizen, we are looked with awe, we are looked with admiration and we are looked with, shall I say, some subterranean jealousies also. That is the kind of the new found stature that our country has acquired today. It is largely because of the efforts of a billion people - it is their effort - it is largely because of our intellectuals and it is largely because of the service sector of our industry that today we have been able to succeed. Now Shri Sanjoy Takam coming from Itanagar of Arunachal Pradesh, which has figured very much in this debate, also participated. Where were we weak-kneed? We were told that His Holiness Dalai Lama should not go to Arunachal Pradesh. We were told that our Prime Minister should not go to Arunachal Pradesh. Did the Prime Minister not go to Arunachal Pradesh? Did His Holiness Dalai Lama not go to Arunachal Pradesh? Did my predecessor, Shri Pranab Mukherjee not go to Arunachal Pradesh? Let me reiterate the resolve of this country, the resolve of the people, that Arunachal Pradesh is part and parcel of this great country of ours. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Vijay Bahadur Singh: Why are they objecting?

The Minister of State in the Ministry of Planning and Minister of State in the Ministry of Parliamentary Affairs (Shri V. Narayanasamy): If they are objecting, you have to ask China. Why are you asking the hon. Minister? ... (Interruptions)

Shri S.M. Krishna: One point made by one hon. Member from Kashmir is why construction of a road in Jammu and Kashmir was stopped. Let me convey to this House that Government of India had no role to play either in the starting of that road project or in the halting of that road project. It was purely a decision which the State Government of Jammu and Kashmir has taken, with which the Government of India was neither consulted nor was it brought to our notice. Only we came to know through the media reports about that road. ...

(Interruptions)

With reference to other Members who have raised certain issues, I will seek the indulgence of the Chair that I will be able to communicate to them as to what the Government of India's feeling is. But before concluding, Mr. Chairman, ... (Interruptions) Let me conclude, then you can ask. ... (Interruptions) We are fully cognizant of the need to protect and safeguard our borders and ensure that there is no erosion of our sovereignty. The situation in the India-China border areas is being constantly monitored. As I submitted earlier, we are strengthening the infrastructure in the border areas, and our defence system is well established and highly efficient. There is also excellent coordination between the various Departments. One point was made by a solitary Member that there is no coordination between the Ministry of Home and the Ministry of External Affairs and various other things. But let me assure that there has been perfect coordination between our Ministries in this regard. The resolution of differences on the border with China must be and can only be resolved peacefully. The history of the last 60 years of our relations with China cannot be simply brushed aside. We must learn from the experience, which has taught us that conflict is not a solution, and dialogue and negotiation provide the best way forward. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, Sir.

Dr. Dana Schuppert, Chairman, 21st Century China India Center for Culture & Communication,

Ladies & Gentlemen,

It gives me great pleasure to inaugurate this very important and timely Exhibition of Chinese paintings and calligraphy in New Delhi. I would like to express my deep appreciation for the 21st Century China India Centre for Culture and Communication and the TATA group for organizing this event. I understand that works of more than 30 outstanding artists from China are on display at the Exhibition today. I am also happy that many traditional Chinese performing artists are also with us today.

2. Next year 2010, will mark the 60th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations. Both countries are planning commemorative activities including the Festival of India in China and Festival of China in India. This would again highlight the intimate cultural ties shared by the two countries. This exhibition serves as an excellent precursor for the various celebration activities planned for next year.

3. As two ancient civilizations and close neighbors, both countries have a long history of cultural contacts and exchanges. In the last 60 years, exchanges in the fields of culture and arts have continued to play a vital role in increasing the mutual understanding between our peoples. An event like this, gives a further push to the people-to-people contacts between the two countries, which has been emphasized as a key component of our relations by leaders from both sides. The great Chinese scholar and one of the foremost Indologists, the late Professor Ji Xianlin, has rightly said: "The two great cultural circles - China and India - have always learned from and influenced each other, and this process greatly speeded the development of the two cultures, which is both history and reality".

4. Talking about our overall bilateral relationship, I am very happy to see the tremendous progress being made. Leaders of both countries continue to have frequent contacts and our trade and economic relations also have seen rapid development. The bilateral trade crossed US$ 50 billion last year and China has become one of India's largest trading partners. I am very optimistic about the future of our relationship and we should continue to work to further enhance cooperation in all fields and strengthen our strategic and cooperative partnership.

5. This event is an excellent example of people's participation in our relationship. We encourage and support such initiatives. I congratulate Dr. Dana Schuppert, Founder and Chairman of the 21st Century China-India Center for Culture and Communication for this initiative.

Thank you for giving me this honor to inaugurate this exhibition and I wish it complete success.

JAPAN*469. Remarks by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna and the Japanese Foreign Minister Hirofumi Nakasone at the Joint Press Interaction.*Tokyo, July 3, 2009.*Remarks by Japanese Foreign Minister Hirofumi Nakasone

I just concluded the 3rd Japan-India Strategic Dialogue between our two Foreign Ministers with His Excellency Mr. S.M. Krishna, Minister of External Affairs of India. We had a very fruitful exchange of views on bilateral issues as well as various regional & international challenges.

On the bilateral front, both sides affirmed the following points:

- (1) The Minister and I agreed to enhance bilateral exchange of views between Japan & India, on the regional situation in South Asia, such as Sri Lanka.
- (2) The Minister & I affirmed that we will work together actively towards the realization of the DFC project, or India's Dedicated Freight Corridor, and also towards an early realization of Delhi Mumbai Industrial Corridor Project.
- (3) Furthermore, we confirmed our collaboration with each other regarding the Indian Institute of Technology (IIT), Hyderabad, which is a project that symbolizes Japan-India collaboration.

We also exchanged views concerning international challenges and regional situations.

- (1) With respect to the issue of climate change, I pointed out the significance of the Major Economies Forum - COP15 - and expressed my hope and expectation for India to exercise leadership even more positively and from a broader perspective. The Minister and I shared the view that we should step up our bilateral dialogue on this issue.
- (2) With respect to the issue of disarmament & non-proliferation, I introduced to the Indian side my '11 benchmarks' which were announced by me in April this year, and we shared the view that we should work together so that negotiations on the Fissile Material Cut-Off treaty will be commenced as soon as possible.

- (4) And furthermore, the Minister and I shared the view that the nuclear & missile development by North Korea is a threat to the international community, and that we need to steadfastly implement the measures set out in the UN Security resolution 1874 and make North Korea to take this very seriously.

Remarks by External Affairs Minister

I am very pleased to be in Japan at the invitation of His Excellency Foreign Minister Nakasone. On behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, I wish to thank him for his warm hospitality during my visit.

My visit to Japan is taking place soon after the new Government has assumed office in India. This indicates the high importance that my Government attaches to our bilateral relations.

Foreign Minister Nakasone and I held the 3rd Strategic Dialogue. We thoroughly reviewed our bilateral relations since my Prime Minister's visit to Tokyo in October 2008. We agreed that the Strategic & Global Partnership between us is an important factor in furthering our ties, as well as in promoting peace, stability and prosperity in Asia and the world. We also discussed how our two Foreign Ministries will carry forward the process of implementing the agreements and understandings contained in the two joint documents that were signed when my Prime Minister visited Japan last year.

We are making progress in our negotiations on a Comprehensive Economic Partnership Agreement. Foreign Minister Nakasone and I agreed on the necessity of concluding a high quality and mutually beneficial agreement. We have also agreed to expedite the work on the Dedicated Freight Corridor and Delhi-Mumbai Industrial Corridor projects. I am confident that these will become important symbols of our partnership.

We appreciate the Official Development Assistance given by the Japanese people. It has contributed to our economic development in important ways.

Foreign Minister Nakasone and I also reviewed the follow-up on the implementation of the Joint Declaration on Security Cooperation.

We discussed regional and multilateral issues including UN Reform and multilateral economic arrangements in Asia. We consider it important that both of us regularly share assessments on such issues.

We agreed that climate change is an important global challenge. We hope that all countries will participate constructively in the framework of the UNFCCC and the Kyoto Protocol, in order to have an ambitious and, at the same time, an equitable and fair outcome at Copenhagen in 2009 which ensures that developing countries are able to continue their economic growth at an accelerated pace to give our people a better quality of life.

I have assured Foreign Minister Nakasone that we will participate constructively in negotiations on nuclear disarmament. Our consistent policy is to support a universal, non-discriminatory and verifiable regime for a nuclear weapon-free world. We also discussed recent developments in the Korean peninsula.

I will be calling on Prime Minister Taro Aso later today. I will also be meeting other political leaders from Japan during my visit. (the meeting with the Prime Minister took place as scheduled).

I am fully satisfied with my discussions today. I have invited Foreign Minister Nakasone to visit India for the 4th Strategic Dialogue in 2010. We also have an annual summit with Japan. We are looking forward to the Japanese Prime Minister's visit to India at a mutually convenient time. The two Foreign Ministries will continue to discuss matters of mutual interest through the dialogue architecture that we have established between us in the last five years*.

* While it was agreed to expand the frontiers of engagement on key international challenges, Japanese spokesman Kazuo Kodama confirmed that no new initiative or mechanism was decided upon. Mr. Kodama told The Hindu correspondent in Singapore on the telephone there was "a meeting of minds" on the issue of worldwide nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation. Mr. Nakasone appreciated India's ongoing observance of a voluntary moratorium on nuclear-weapon tests. At the same time, he expressed the "hope" that India would sign the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and ratify it. Referring to Japan's "benchmarks" for disarmament and non-proliferation, he was "hopeful" of cooperation with India for an early start of multilateral negotiations on a fissile material cut-off treaty.

External Affairs Minister Mr. Krishna told newsmen after the talks, that he assured Japan of India's "constructive" participation in nuclear disarmament talks. He reaffirmed India's commitment to "a universal, non-discriminatory, and verifiable regime for a nuclear weapons-free world." On whether India had now sought Japan's cooperation in the civil nuclear sector, External Affairs Ministry spokesman said Tokyo was already informed that "we are ready when they are ready for it." On the global challenge of climate change, Mr. Nakasone said, after his talks with Mr. Krishna, that they "shared the view that we should step up our bilateral dialogue on this issue." India emphasised the need for an "ambitious" but also an "equitable and fair" solution.

Tokyo, July 4, 2009.

Distinguished members of India-Japan Parliamentary Friendship League and Japan India Association;

Ambassador H. K. Singh;

Distinguished Japanese guests;

Members of the Indian community in Japan;

Ladies and Gentlemen,

On my very first visit to Japan as the Minister of External Affairs, it is my pleasant duty to inaugurate this newly constructed Chancery building of the Embassy of India in Tokyo.

2. Japan is a major partner in Asia, a country with which we share civilizational affinities, common values and interests. As a new Asia unfolds in the 21st Century, we stand together in the determination to bring peace, progress and prosperity to our respective peoples and to our region and the world.
3. It has long been the vision of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to transform the India-Japan Partnership and realize its true potential. In the last three years, we have established a Strategic and Global Partnership and given concrete shape to that vision. In my fruitful discussions with the Foreign Minister and Prime Minister yesterday, we have agreed to work for the steady implementation of the established Roadmap for enhancing our bilateral relations across the board.
4. This new building, located in the sylvan surroundings of Tokyo's most famous cherry blossom boulevard, is a fitting symbol of the expanding partnership between our two countries and a reflection of India as a modern and great nation.
5. The Ministry of External Affairs has given priority attention to augmenting the infrastructure of our diplomatic missions abroad, in keeping with the changing global environment and the great transformations which are taking place in India. The Tokyo Construction Project was among the first to be completed. It sets high benchmarks which I hope will be emulated in the Ministry's projects in other capitals.

6. During my brief tour of the excellent facilities offered by this new Chancery, I have been struck me most by the care and attention that has gone into ensuring the highest standards of design and execution. The functional requirements of an Embassy have been ensured in an ambience of architectural elegance using some of the most advanced building technologies extant.
7. To our Japanese friends and members of the Indian community, I would like to address a special word of welcome to this abode of India. This building and its Cultural Center will henceforth be your base for strengthening the bonds between our countries which you have long and steadfastly supported.
8. I wish to congratulate Plants Associates Inc. for their exemplary work as Architects and Consultants for the Tokyo Construction Project. I would also like to thank the constructors Shimizu Corporation for their outstanding work in building this Embassy.
9. Finally, I wish to congratulate Ambassador Hemant Krishan Singh for his stewardship in making this Project an admirable success. The Ministry values your contributions highly and commends your efforts to realize the Tokyo Construction Project.

Thank you.

472. Keynote Address by Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor at the Research and Information System–Japan Economic Foundation Symposium: ' Under economic crisis, how should Asia promote further economic integration'.

New Delhi, September 24, 2009.

I would like to thank you, Dr. Sengupta, for inviting me to deliver the keynote address at the inaugural session of the International Symposium on the theme 'under economic crisis, how should Asia promote further economic integration'. I take this opportunity to compliment RIS and the Japan Economic Foundation for organising this symposium. Over the years, RIS has played a significant role in exploring the future directions of our foreign economic policy and today's Symposium is yet another significant contribution to this effort. I welcome the collaboration of our Japanese friends in this RIS endeavour. The Japan Economic Foundation, since 1981, has done admirable work in building cooperation with their counterparts in Asia and elsewhere. The partnership of RIS and Japan Economic Foundation for this Symposium is both timely and important.

Even as we meet in New Delhi today for this Symposium, the Summit of G-20 will begin later today in Pittsburgh. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in a statement yesterday prior to his departure to attend the G-20 Summit mentioned, inter alia, that he was looking forward to exchanging views with several of the leaders who will be present including the new Prime Minister of Japan H.E. Yukio Hatoyama.

Developing a perspective on the future of Asia during and after the current global financial and economic crisis is a daunting task. "The future is never what it used to be". However I believe that, given the professional background of both the RIS & the Japan Economic Foundation, the two organisations are eminently qualified to do so. In a way, the current crisis has questioned the very assumptions underlying the global economic order as we have known it since the end of the Second World War. Not only was this evident in the failure of analysts to understand the genesis and the nature of the gathering crisis but also in the realisation that the path to global recovery would be quite different from the recovery from earlier recessions. Even before the current crisis burst upon us, the non-sustainability of the global macro-economic imbalances was looming larger by the day. The pressure on the dollar, the low savings and high consumption in the western markets, shift of the manufacturing sector and some services to developing economies especially Asian, and the high agriculture subsidies in the western economies were the underlying causes for these growing imbalances. In addition, volatile food and oil prices, and mitigation and adaptation challenges created by global warming ensured that the dimensions of this crisis were different. The challenge of coping with the diverse manifestations of this crisis is compounded by that of a perceived need to strengthen international financial institutions and make them more effective. It may be recalled that the G-20 Summit in London agreed to mobilize additional financial resources for these financial institutions largely to sustain growth in emerging markets. So, in a manner of speaking, we are - practically - having to rewrite our textbooks.

The sudden financial and economic meltdown in the west was the result of the failure of global regulatory and supervisory mechanisms; excessive speculation and greed ("casino capitalism"); and ideological preconceptions of the most powerful actors and policy makers ('market fundamentalism') mainly in the developed countries. Originating in the US sub-prime housing sector meltdown, the toxic assets were exported to Europe and the rest of the world.

The crisis spread to emerging economies through capital and current account routes of the balance of payments (BoP). The effect of the financial crisis on emerging economies thereafter was mainly through reversal of portfolio flows due to unwinding of stock positions by Foreign Institutional Investors (FIIs) to replenish cash balances at home. Withdrawal of FII investment led to stock market crash in many emerging economies and decline in the value of local currency vis-à-vis US dollar, as a result of supply-demand imbalances in domestic markets. Together with slackening global demand and declining commodity prices, it led to fall in exports, thereby transmitting the financial sector crisis to the real economy. Countries with export-led models of growth and those dependent on commodity exports were more severely affected. The direct impact of the financial crisis on the Asian financial market has been limited because Japan, Korea, Taiwan, China, and Singapore have relatively less toxic assets in the US financial market. However, indirect impacts have been significant, with large GDP contractions witnessed in Japan, Korea, Malaysia, Thailand, and Singapore, whereas countries such as India, Indonesia, and Vietnam are facing smaller GDP contractions. Job losses in Asia have been enormous.

The crisis brought to an abrupt end the surge in private capital flows to developing countries that had occurred during 2003-07. In 2008, total net international flows of private capital to the developing world fell to $707 billion (4.4 percent of developing-country GDP) from the record high level of $1.2 trillion). The downturn affected all developing regions in various degrees, with the exception of the Middle East and North Africa, where flows increased slightly. Emerging Europe and Central Asia were the hardest hit, accounting for half of the $451 billion decline in capital flows.

The Indian economy was not significantly affected by the global financial crisis in the initial stages, which had set in around August 2007. In fact, the initial effect of the global financial crisis was positive, as India received huge FII investment inflows of US$ 22.5 billion during September 2007 to January 2008, as against US$ 11.8 billion during April-July 2007. In its more intense phase, the global financial crisis spread to India through capital and current account routes of the balance of payments (BoP). The extent of reversal of capital flows from India was US$ 15.8 billion during five months following the end of "positive shock" period in January 2008 and the monthly export growth became negative after July 2008 and import growth became negative after August 2008.

Yet, the overall Balance of Payment situation remained resilient despite signs of strain in the capital account. India's GDP growth was 6.7 per cent in 2008-09. The first half of 2008-09 saw the Indian economy recording a growth of 7.8 per cent in GDP, despite the build-up of uncertainty in the international commodity and financial markets. Among the domestic growth drivers, gross fixed capital formation (GFCF) retained some of its momentum from the preceding years with a growth of nearly 11 per cent. In the second half of 2008-09, GDP growth declined to 5.8 per cent, with a further decline in private consumption growth to 2.5 per cent and a significant moderation in growth rate of GFCF to about 6 per cent over the corresponding period of 2007-08. However, the Government of India adopted a pro-active fiscal policy with the roll-out of two rounds of fiscal stimulus packages. As a result, the growth in government final consumption expenditure shot up to nearly 36 per cent, partly making-up for the shortfall in other components of the domestic aggregate demand. The overall GDP growth for the fiscal 2008-09 at 6.7 per cent surpassed all estimates and forecasts, made by international agencies and analysts, mostly ranging from 5.5 per cent to 6.5 per cent.

The crisis is abating somewhat but the prospects remain uncertain. On the positive side, emerging and developing economies are projected to regain growth momentum during the second half of 2009, albeit with notable regional differences. Growth projections in emerging Asia have been revised upward to 5.5 percent in 2009 and 7.0 percent in 2010. The upgrade is the result of improved prospects in China and India, in part reflecting substantial macroeconomic stimulus; and a faster-than-expected turnaround in capital flows. There are signs of the crisis bottoming out: industrial production has either stabilized or is expanding, global trade is picking up, and financial market stress has reduced.

However, let me emphasize that despite the positive trends I have talked about, significant downside risks remain. The consensus in the recent G20 Finance Ministers meet was that unless the recovery is secured, the measures need to be continued. The path and timing of exit strategies will be crucial. Nationally contextualized and yet globally concerted exit strategies will determine the recovery path in the medium term. Cohesive and well-coordinated international action is an urgent requirement. The massive stimuli packages also have the potential of building steam for inflationary pressures, if not handled properly.

The other set of challenges lies in the financial sector. The pace of recovery is crucially dependent on the repair of the balance sheet of impaired financial institutions in the developed world - especially the issue of cleaning up the toxic assets. Structural reforms in the financial sector, financial inclusion and completing the set of financial reforms outlined in the London G20 Summit declaration will be crucial. Being capable of monitoring the global economy and having forward looking forecast tools to give early warnings of any build-up of crisis will be essential.

The continuing resilience of Asia would depend on how well it manages the regional integration process. Asia's export-led growth model, centred on US and European markets in recent decades, can no longer be relied upon to sustain the region's economic growth beyond the crisis. Consumer spending in US will remain sluggish over many years to come and this will be a structural phenomenon, not a temporary one. Asia will need to shift the current export-led production structure away from the advanced economies to the regional market in the medium to long-term; it certainly means calibrated and synchronized decision-making in Asia about reorientation of its export destination with production decisions. A fundamental rebalancing towards domestic demand is needed if Asia wants to preserve the high growth rate that has characterised its recent past.

How is this rebalancing to be carried out in Asia? This is an important but a complex question for the reasons stated above. It requires forethought, considerable planning and technical expertise and - if I may say so - enlightened self-interest. Asia, today, has the intellectual and financial wherewithal to carry out this rebalancing - having learned the right lessons from the Asian financial crisis of 1997-98. As I can see, the Asian leaders are alive to both the opportunity and the challenge.

In order to promote further economic integration, Asia clearly needs to go beyond the ASEAN Free Trade and Investment Area. In this connection, India has recently concluded FTAs with ASEAN and Korea and similar arrangements are being negotiated with other East Asian countries: India is, also, negotiating with ASEAN an agreement on services and investments which it hopes to conclude in the near future. Currently, there is an array of overlapping bilateral and plurilateral free trade agreements in the region which could be taken to a higher level of economic integration. These include the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) which now has 8 member countries and which, we believe, can effectively promote regional economic cooperation and integration in the South Asian region. Even while re-starting the Doha round, the Asian leaders envisage an Asia-wide economic partnership agreement. At the forthcoming East Asia Summit in Thailand in October, 2009, the leaders of the participating countries would be presented a blueprint for realizing a Comprehensive Economic Partnership in East Asia (CEPEA); an important decision has been taken by the East Asia Summit Economic Ministers' meeting, in August this year, in Bangkok to discuss the recommendations on this at the Senior Officials level.

Financial cooperation and integration is another area for swift action; the Chiang Mai Initiative has been welcomed as it creates a framework for multilateralised currency swaps between ASEAN Plus Three grouping (ASEAN, ROK, Japan and China). Cooperation in the banking sector is a focus of East Asia Summit member countries. Trade integration and facilitation, especially encouragement for the small and medium-sized firms, is again another area whose potential is being recognized. Sustained economic growth, with national emphasis on poverty alleviation, needs to be the priority for all Asian countries and our collective endeavour should never lose focus on it; this is also necessary for creating national demand in our times of weak external demand. We need to make considerable collective effort for skills development, especially involving the less advantaged sections of the local community in both urban and rural areas. Infrastructure development is again a major area for pan-Asian co-operation and the work carried out presently needs to be considerably scaled up; an example coming straight to mind is the proposed Delhi-Mumbai Corridor where Japan is playing such a crucial role. India, too, needs to play a more active role than hitherto. It goes without saying that our collective pan-Asian effort should be to ensure that the competitiveness of Asian products and services remains strong.

If I may say so, given the magnitude of the problems, the Asian countries need to fast-track these processes. The leaders have welcomed the decision of the Economic Research Institute for ASEAN and East Asia (ERIA), ADB and the ASEAN Secretariat to work together to prepare, as soon as possible, a coherent master plan for upgradation of sub-regional development initiatives.

Prof. Sengupta,
Mr. Hatakeyama,
Distinguished participants.

With these words, I will conclude by saying that in the Ministry of External Affairs we look forward to the deliberations of this symposium and their outcomes. I wish you all success in these very important discussions you will hold in the next two days.

Thank you!

475. Media Briefing by Official Spokesperson on the visit of Japanese Prime Minister.*New Delhi, December 26, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good evening to you all. I am delighted to see you. I have also the pleasure of introducing a dear friend and colleague, who recently took over as Joint Secretary (East Asia), Mr. Gautam Bambawale.

We would like to brief you on a very important visit of His Excellency the Prime Minister of Japan who is coming at the invitation of our Prime Minister on an official visit from 27th to 29th of December. This is for the Annual Summit meeting. Prime Minister Hatoyama will be accompanied by his spouse Madam Miyuki Hatoyama and a high-level delegation.

Let me take you through the programme. Prime Minister Hatoyama arrives tomorrow at Mumbai. He would be paying tributes to the victims of 26/11 terror attack. He would be signing the Condolence Book at Hotel Trident. He then goes to meet with the Governor of Maharashtra who would also be hosting a dinner in his honour. On Monday the 28th, he meets with some of the captains of Indian industry including Mr. Ratan Tata and other business leaders. Thereafter he arrives in Delhi. In the second half he has a meeting with Dr. R.K. Pachauri, Director-General, TERI and also with the Chairperson UPA. Later on he meets with the Prime Minister of India, who would be hosting a private dinner in the honour of the visiting dignitary and his spouse. On the 29th, there would be delegation level talks followed by a brief Joint Press Interaction around 1150. Prime Minister would also be hosting a lunch where after Mr. Hatoyama departs for Tokyo.

As you are aware, during the visit of our Prime Minister to Japan in December 2006 both sides had decided to elevate our relations to the level of Strategic and Global partnership. It was also agreed to hold Annual Summit level meetings, and this would be fourth such summit. You would also recall the Prime Minister of India had visited Tokyo in October last year for the Annual Summit.

This Summit is particularly significant as it is the first after the elections in Japan in August 2009 when the Democratic Party of Japan came to power. Prime Minister Hatoyama was sworn in on the 16th of September, 2009. It is particularly noteworthy that this would be the first standalone visit by Prime Minister Hatoyama to any country. It obviously reflects the continuing commitment of the two sides to strengthening and broadening our bilateral relations.

In the last three months, Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and Prime Minister Hatoyama have already met twice. They met at Pittsburgh in September during the G20 Summit, again at Hua Hin in October during the East Asia Summit. This would be their third bilateral meeting and interaction. During their last interactions both sides reiterated the resolve to strengthen and enhance our Strategic and Global partnership, and deepen our bilateral political, economic, cultural and educational cooperation. We attach the highest importance and priority to our bilateral relations with Japan and to the Annual Summit mechanism.

Soon after the new Government assumed office in Japan, the National Security Advisor visited Japan as Prime Minister's Special Envoy and also called on Prime Minister Hatoyama. In fact, I would like to note that the high-level exchanges between our two countries have become quite a norm. In July this year, External Affairs Minister had visited Japan for the third Strategic Dialogue at the Foreign Ministers' level. Raksha Mantri visited Japan in November 2009, when the two sides agreed to have annual visits of the two Defence Ministers and to have exchanges at other levels in the Ministry of Defence. The Japanese Minister for Environment Mr. Sakihito Ozawa was in India in October. Shrimati Nirupama Rao, Foreign Secretary was in Tokyo in December for discussions with her counterpart the Vice-Foreign Minister of Japan.

As important, we have held meetings within the framework of comprehensive official dialogue mechanisms including the Strategic Economic Dialogue, the Comprehensive Security Dialogue, and so on. That is the backdrop in which Prime Minister Hatoyama's visit takes place when there has been all-round progress in our relationship and a steady and qualitative upgradation in India-Japan Strategic and Global partnership, reflective of growing congruence of interests.

There has been a steady growth in trade, economic relations and investments. As per the Japanese statistics, during 2008-09, bilateral trade crossed 12 billion dollars despite the global economic slowdown. We have, as you are aware, a trade target of 20 billion dollars by 2010. Japan already is the sixth largest investor in India with actual investments, already exceeding three billion dollars. The pace of investments has picked up in recent years. In the preceding eight or nine years alone, actual investments from Japan have been over 2.5 billion dollars.

The two sides, encouraged by the trend of growing economic and commercial relations and wanting to consolidate that trend, are in the process of concluding discussing a Comprehensive Economic Partnership Agreement (CEPA). You would know that twelve rounds of discussions have already been held which shows the importance that we are attaching to this agreement. The last round was in Tokyo in September-October this year.

Japan has been extending assistance, very valuable assistance to us, which we are greatly appreciative of, in large infrastructure development projects including the dedicated freight corridors and Delhi-Mumbai Industrial Corridor. Since 2004, India has been the largest recipient of Official Development Assistance (ODA) from Japan. In 2008-09 we received ODA of 2.5 billion dollars which was almost 30 per cent of Japan's global ODA.

We have also, in recent months and years, witnessed greater people-to-people contacts, cultural and educational exchanges. In September this year the India Cultural Centre was set up in Tokyo. Also the first ever Chair on India in the prestigious Tokyo University has been set up. Japan is also extending assistance in the establishment of a green-field project, an IIT in Hyderabad.

The India-Japan Joint Declaration on Security Cooperation, as you are aware, was signed in October 2008 during the visit of our Prime Minister. We have witnessed a number of defence exchanges during this year including the trilateral Malabar Exercise in April-May and also the visit of three Japan Maritime Self-Defence Force ships to Goa in May.

These are some of the areas that I highlighted but I would like to add that our multifaceted ties also cover a number of other important areas including energy. For us, as you know, energy security is very important and Japan has offered substantial assistance for training and capacity-building in the field of energy. Other important areas are high-technology trade, science and technology cooperation, urban development and so on. That is the broad and rich canvas of the bilateral relations.

During the visit, Prime Minister Hatoyama and Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh would be covering all aspects of bilateral relations as well as regional and global issues of common interest. The two Prime Ministers will review progress on all substantive issues and give political direction, to carry forward and accelerate the process wherever required.

In sum, as two major democracies in Asia the partnership between India and Japan is an essential pillar for peace, progress and development in the entire region. It is expected that the visit would provide further momentum to our comprehensive engagement as well as impart more depth to our Strategic and Global partnership.

Thank you. JS(EA) and I will be happy to take questions, if any.

Question: Any agreements to be signed?

Official Spokesperson: We will let you know. At the moment we cannot prejudge the outcome. As I have already mentioned, we have a very broad canvas of relations. I have already taken you through so many aspects of that. We will let you know as things evolve.

Question: As you know, two American Fortune 500 companies - Westinghouse and GE - are owned by two Japanese companies. There is a perception, and a justifiable one, that the 123 Agreement with the US cannot be operative till India signs a Nuclear Energy Agreement with Japan too. Considering the strident stand of Japan on such issues, is it being actively pursued? Can we see the light at the end of the tunnel during the visit?

Official Spokesperson: As I said, energy security is a very important area for us. We are appreciative of Japan's support at Vienna last year during the discussions which were held at IAEA and at the NSG, which makes it possible for us to engage in civil nuclear commerce with all countries including Japan. Both sides are in agreement that nuclear energy is a safe, sustainable and non-polluting source of energy. Both sides have also exchanged views on our respective nuclear energy policies. That is where the matter is. We would be happy to take the process forward at a pace and in a manner convenient to Japan*.

Question: Will the Prime Minister raise this issue during the current visit, the possibility of civil nuclear energy cooperation?

Official Spokesperson: I have already said that the entire gamut of bilateral relations will be discussed, and energy is an important area. With Japan please understand that it is not just nuclear energy but a whole range of energy cooperation - renewable sources of energy, clean coal energy and so on - and Japan has been extending valuable assistance in capacity development and capacity building and so on. I did note that the whole range of bilateral issues are expected to be discussed.

Question: Can you tell us more about the evolving security and defence cooperation between India and Japan?

Joint Secretary (East Asia) (Shri Gautam Bambawale): Thank you for that question. I think all of you know about the Joint Declaration which was signed in October of 2008 between India and Japan during the visit of our Prime Minister there. Things have moved forward. In fact in November 2009, just a month ago, our Raksha Mantri visited Japan and has had very good consultations with his counterpart there. We are pushing the envelope, we are moving things forward in this area, and you will see hopefully some more coming out after these negotiations and discussions between the two Prime Ministers here in Delhi.

Question: Strategic observers in China have been raising concerns about the growing Naval cooperation between India and Japan. How do you view this?

Joint Secretary (East Asia): I think it is very clear that India-Japan relations stand on their own. There is a logic and momentum about the relationship which is moving it forward. I can reiterate that India-Japan relations, defence and security relations are not aimed or directed at any third country.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you. I would just like to add that each country has relationship with the others. Japan has its relationship with China. Look at our own relationship with China. We have strategic partnership and cooperative partnership with China. Our own relations are moving forward with China very rapidly. We have growing defence cooperation with China. We have had joint defence exercises with China. So, what is important to note is that each relationship stands on its own merit. As large countries, as key players in the world, we are in the process of developing, deepening our ties with other key countries in the world.

Thank you very much.

* On high technology dual use trade with India Japan continues to have reservations. It still hopes that India will sign the CTBT and enter into negotiations for the FMCT. Already the two countries have held four rounds of talks to conduct high technology trade, including nuclear commerce. "We are conducting bilateral consultations and we need to exchange more information..." said Kazuo Kodama, Director-General for Press and Public Relations and spokesman for the Japan Prime Minister on December 28. Mr. Kodama however conceded the role of nuclear energy in climate control. He said Japan would want to translate the strategic partnership into more "concrete action oriented" and build upon the shared values. He spoke of the possibility to set up a framework of 2+2 dialogue to include representatives of the Ministers of External Affairs and Defence at junior level in order to deepen the dialogue. Describing trade as the engine of promoting deeper relations. Japanese investment in India stood at $5.22 billion surpassing its investment in China that was $3.65 billion in 2008. The two-way trade was worth $13 billion in 2008. He did not agree with a questioner that promotion of partnership between India and Japan was to counter China, and said that bilateral relationship could not be at the expense of any other country, and that New Delhi too held a similar position.

476. Joint Press Interaction by Prime Minister of India and Prime Minister of Japan.

New Delhi, December 29, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good afternoon to you all and welcome to the Joint Press Interaction. First, the Prime Minister of India Dr. Manmohan Singh will be making an opening statement. Next, the Prime Minister of Japan His Excellency Mr. Yukio Hatoyama would be making a statement.

Sir, may I invite you to make your statement?

Prime Minister:

Your Excellency Prime Minister Hatoyama,

Ladies and Gentlemen of the media.

I am delighted to welcome His Excellency Prime Minister Hatoyama to India. We are particularly honoured that the Prime Minister decided to visit India so soon after his historic victory in the elections in Japan.

Our relations with Japan enjoy a strong national consensus in our country. They are based on shared values and shared interests in the Asia-Pacific region and beyond. We welcome Japan's leadership on global issues which will contribute to world peace and prosperity.

In our discussions today, we undertook a comprehensive review of our bilateral cooperation, as well as of major regional and international issues. These discussions have given me renewed confidence about the future of our relations and of the enduring nature of the Strategic and Global Partnership that we established in December 2006.

The economic partnership between India and Japan is the bedrock of our relations. But over the last few years, we have significantly diversified our relations in the areas of defence, security and counter-terrorism. There is closer cooperation on international issues. As agreed upon at the last India-Japan Summit in October 2008, we have finalized an Action Plan to advance our security cooperation.

I conveyed to Prime Minister Hatoyama that India welcomes Japanese investments into India, and that the growth of our economy offers huge opportunities to substantially increase our trade and economic cooperation. In particular, there is great scope for expansion of cooperation in the areas of urban infrastructure, high technology, and renewable and energy efficient technologies.

We have decided to expedite our negotiations on the Comprehensive Economic Partnership Agreement in order to conclude a high quality and balanced agreement. We are hopeful that this can be completed in time for the next Annual Summit meeting.

We agreed on the early implementation of the Dedicated Freight Corridor Project between Mumbai and New Delhi. We have decided to finalise all details for Phase I within the next few months, so that actual implementation can begin in 2010 itself. We also endorsed the plan to take the Delhi-Mumbai Industrial Corridor Project forward. Both these projects will have a significant positive impact on the Indian economy and on the scale of our economic cooperation with Japan.

Prime Minister Hatoyama and I endorsed the importance of enhancing educational, cultural and scientific and technological exchanges. We are grateful to Japan for its assistance and collaboration in the development of the Indian Institute of Technology at Hyderabad, on which there has been concrete progress.

Prime Minister Hatoyama and I also discussed global and regional issues, including the G-20 process, the Copenhagen Climate Change Conference, energy security, terrorism, reform of the United Nations Security Council and nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation. We reviewed developments in the Asia-Pacific region, and agreed that the cause of peace and stability would best be served by creating an open and inclusive architecture in this region. I welcome Prime Minister Hatoyama's initiatives on the Asian Economic Community.

Prime Minister Hatoyama's visit has succeeded in taking our partnership to a new stage. This is reflected in the Joint Statement that we have just signed. I look forward to working with the Prime Minister in years ahead to consolidate the gains of our partnership.

I thank you ladies and gentlemen.

Official Spokesperson: Can I now invite His Excellency the Prime Minister of Japan to make his statement?

Prime Minister of Japan: ...(Inaudible)...I believe that making sure we implement these annual mutual agreements ...(Inaudible)... in advancing our bilateral relations. On security, we issued a Joint Statement last year. We have further deepened that security relationship by coming up with an Action Plan, and I welcome this very much. We shall be realising a Subcommittee level, the 2+2 dialogue. Also with regard to cooperation in the defence of the sea lanes of communication, I believe that stepped up cooperation between our two countries would be very meaningful. I think it is indeed very good that we have been able to agree on these.

Turning to the economic sphere, bilateral Japan-India trade still remains far below the level of Japan-China trade, only 1/20th of Japan-China trade. However last year, Japan's direct investment to India for the first time surpassed Japan's investment to China. In that respect it was a dramatic year. I think it is important that we further speed up or encourage such investment. One of the things that will be conducive to do that would be early realisation of a Bilateral Economic Partnership Agreement (EPA) on both sides. There still remain concerns that need to be negotiated. But both of us will be instructing our officials to expedite their talks so that we shall be able to conclude the bilateral EPA as soon as possible.

On specifics, there is the Dedicated Freight Corridor (DFC) project. Japanese Railway system - the Shinkansen or the bullet train - is extremely safe. Since its inauguration, there has not been any fatal accident. We would like to see this technology utilised in the construction of railways in India. I think this is a project that will be beneficial to both sides. Also there is the Delhi-Mumbai Industrial Corridor (DMIC) project which we have managed to advance from the planning stage to the implementation stage. With Japan Bank for International Cooperation (JBIC) and Japan External Trade Organisation (JETRO), Japan would like to help improve the climate and more investment in infrastructure development because I believe that infrastructure development brings benefits to both sides, enabling Japanese businesses to invest in India.

As part of this we have also discussed specific issues related to visa and asked for cooperation on the Indian side with regard to the procedures for visa issuance. I believe that these major projects will bring benefits not only to our two countries but to the entire world by providing traction to the world economy. We would also like to encourage people-to-people exchanges especially among youth. One project that would be useful in this regard is the cooperation on the establishment of Indian Institute of Technology, Hyderabad. Through this sort of cooperation, the youth of our two countries can build greater confidence in each other and serve to improve the level of skills. That will contribute to people in Asia and also to people around the world.

We also had discussions on global issues. With regard to East Asian Community, an initiative that I have been advocating, I am grateful to Prime Minister Singh for showing his strong interest. In the East Asian Community initiative, needless to say, India would be an essential element, a country that could play a very important role. By advancing this initiative for East Asian Community, I am convinced that it will ...(Inaudible)...

I also commented on Copenhagen meeting and the initiative on climate change. It is unfortunate that we failed to come up with a legally-binding framework. But I said that with the participation and cooperation of the all countries, we need to make that agreement advance into a legally-binding agreement with specific time limits.

Also we discussed that Japan and India have common interests in advancing nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation around the world. I suggested that we cooperate for the total elimination of nuclear weapons. Prime Minister Singh responded by saying that India would do its best for disarmament and non-proliferation as a matter of course.

We also discussed cooperation in the nuclear energy area because I believe this will become a very important agenda in the future. We have also discussed the reform of the UN Security Council. As members of the G4 and also as members of the Asian Community, Japan and India, by stepping up our bilateral cooperation, can contribute to promoting the reform of the Executive Council and contribute to becoming permanent members mutually. By doing that we will be able to contribute for world peace.

I had the fortune of visiting India at a very busy time of the year end and have had this opportunity to meet with Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and the members of the Cabinet of India. I am truly delighted about this opportunity ...(Inaudible)... very fruitful dialogue. I very much hope that this visit of mine will serve but as an important step to further advance the bilateral relations.

Thank you very much.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you, Sir. The leaders will be very happy to take one question each.

Question (Mr. Ajay Kaul, PTI): My question is addressed to both the Prime Ministers. First, to the Japanese Prime Minister. I understand the Japanese business community is keen on having civil nuclear cooperation with India. How do you see the prospects of such cooperation in the near future and what is the progress in relaxing the restricted regime on high-tech trade? In a related question to Prime Minister of India, Sir, there are concerns about restriction or their tightening of visa norms. Your comment on that please.

Prime Minister of Japan: Allow me to respond first. The question was about the outlook for cooperation with India by Japanese business. In recent years, Japanese companies are showing very high-level of interest to cooperate with India. Japanese companies would surely, I believe, expand their trade and investment with India. Not merely for the interest of these companies themselves but this will actually contribute significantly to the society and to the regions where these Japanese companies would establish themselves.

The core in all these endeavours I believe would be the Delhi-Mumbai Industrial Corridor (DMIC) project. Centering on the DMIC project, many of the Japanese companies should be able to cooperate with India. I believe it proves that both the Japanese and Indian Governments can create the climate that will facilitate their entry and cooperation.

With regard to high-tech trade deregulation, regulations still remain today. This is a matter that Prime Minister Singh pointed to and he expressed his hope that there will be a major move towards liberalisation. Needless to say, since both countries have a high level of high technology, increasing level of mutual cooperation in a high technology area, I believe, will significantly contribute to the development of our two countries and not just that of the entire world. Prime Minister Singh mentioned that Indian companies will not divert the imports from Japan for weapons purposes and they will not divert these imports someday to other third-party countries. With strong determination, I should like to, as soon as possible, see to it that we would be able to act on this matter of regulation while making sure that on individual cases there is nothing wrong by accurately confirming the information provided. So, we would like to make efforts for a positive conclusion.

Prime Minister: With regard to the visa system, both in India and Japan there was a fairly extensive discussion. I requested Prime Minister Hatoyama to ensure that the Japanese visa system becomes more liberal to enable faster growth of trade, investment and people-to-people contacts. I also pointed out that as a special case India has introduced the system of granting visas on arrival in the case of Japanese citizens. But the Prime Minister still maintained that there were some restrictive features of our system, and I promised him that I will have it looked into. The same way I raised the issue of Japanese visa system and requested the Prime Minister to have this looked into as a means of promoting the increased cooperation in trade, investment, and in particular in high technology areas.

Question (Mr. Fujita, NHK, Japan): I would like to ask the two Prime Ministers a question with regard to the abolition of nuclear weapons. I think it was explained that both the Prime Ministers have the same feeling and the same objective. I think the realistic approach is different. But overcoming differences, how can Japan and India cooperate together for the elimination of nuclear weapons? If you could refer to the discussions you had today, I would like to ask the views of both the Prime Ministers.

Prime Minister: We had fairly extensive discussion on cooperation in civil nuclear energy areas. I explained to the Prime Minister the circumstances in which India had to go the nuclear weapon route. But I also mentioned to him that India has unilaterally declared a moratorium on nuclear explosive testing, and that is a commitment we will honour. I have also mentioned that India has an impeccable record with regard to non-proliferation, that the Nuclear Suppliers Group had already given India access to trade in nuclear material and nuclear technologies, and that further India is deeply interested in working together with Japan and other like-minded countries to promote the cause of universal, verifiable, non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament.

Prime Minister of Japan: Essentially this is a discussion we had yesterday. I said we share the thoughts because both India and Japan strive for the ultimate goal of total elimination of nuclear weapons. At least we have been able to confirm that point. There is an ... (Inaudible) ... response to NPT and we have to recognise that there is a difference. As for CTBT, globally I think there is a rising momentum towards early entry into force of the treaty. I expressed my hope that together with the US and China, India will also sign and ratify CTBT at an earlier time. In response, Prime Minister Singh said that with regard to CTBT, should US and China sign the CTBT that will create a new situation. He stated that as a matter of fact. I believe we probably have to engage in these endeavours. I also referred to the Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty and I suggested that negotiations for that treaty should be launched as soon as possible and that Japan and India should cooperate for its early conclusion. That suggestion was welcomed by Prime Minister. So, towards the ultimate goal of total elimination of nuclear weapons I myself would like to continue to seek cooperation firmly and I shall cooperate with India in that respect.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you, Sir. The Joint Press Interaction now draws to a close. Copies of the Joint Statement and the Action Plan are available here which can be collected. Thanks for your presence.

480. Response of Official Spokesperson to a question on the satellite launched by the DPRK.*New Delhi, April 6, 2009.

We have seen reports that variously describe the missile launch by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea as a satellite launch or a ballistic missile test. The issue is presently under consideration in the UN Security Council. We are concerned at the possible destabilizing effect of these events in a volatile region.

While it is for the Security Council to come to a conclusion on the nature of the event and its relationship to its earlier resolutions, we hope that responses by all concerned will be restrained and proportionate*.

* The Democratic People's Republic of Korea had on April 5 announced the "successful" launch of an indigenous communications satellite while the scepticism about DPRK's "claim" lingered for hours after the satellite was "placed in orbit." An official spokesman in Tokyo described the event as the launch of a "flying object." It may be recalled that Japan, South Korea, and the United States were already in a state of military alert against the possibility of such a launch. The DPRK's state news agency, as monitored in Seoul, said a home-made three-stage rocket, Unha-2 (Milky Way), carrying the satellite, lifted off the launch pad at 11.20 a.m. local time. And, the satellite, with an unspecified profile, was safely put in orbit, nine minutes and two seconds thereafter. The controversial launch, however, set the stage for an emergency session of the United Nations Security Council. Led by the United States, several countries denounced North Korea for its implicit action of testing a dual-use rocket with potential military applications. South Korea pledged to take "concrete counter-measures." Japan took the initiative for the emergency U.N. debate. Japanese spokesman Yasuhisa Kawamura described the action in "clear violation of the [relevant] U.N. Security Council Resolutions." Regardless of Pyongyang's latest versions, Mr. Kawamura said, the Resolutions, passed after its earlier missile and nuclear-weapon tests, "clearly prohibit North Korea from developing ballistic missile technology." The Japanese maintained that it was likely to negatively impact the peace and stability in East Asia. So, the focus now was to ensure "appropriate action by the Security Council."

481. Media Report on the Indian reaction to the conduct of a nuclear test by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

New Delhi, May 25, 2009.

External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna in a statement said: "Like others in the international community we are concerned at the adverse effect on peace and security in that region of such tests. We continue to monitor the situation."

Defence Minister A.K. Antony on May 25 described the nuclear test by North Korea as a "development of serious concern" not just for India but the entire world. "This is a development of serious concern. India is very much against nuclear proliferation. It is a matter of serious concern not only to India but also to the entire world," Mr. Antony said in response to a question on North Korea conducting the nuclear test. Mr. Antony said the security scenario around India was becoming more and more challenging. "Developments around us are a cause for serious concern. So eternal vigilance is a must."

New Delhi, January 15, 2009.

In response to a question about bail to two Indian nationals by the Supreme Court of the Republic of Korea, the Official Spokesperson said:

We were informed by our Embassy in the Republic of Korea earlier today that the request for bail for the two Indian nationals, Captain J. S. Chawla and Chief Officer Chetan Syam, has been granted today by the Supreme Court. The process for release of the two Indian nationals from the detention centre is complete. The Government of India welcomes this decision and hopes that the Supreme Court will conduct an expeditious hearing of the Appeal against the verdict of the Daejon High Court, and that all aspects of the case will be carefully considered in order to have an early and fair conclusion of this case.

The Government of India will continue to pursue the matter further with the Government of the Republic of Korea in the backdrop of the close and cordial relations that exist between the two countries.

483. Reaction of the Government of India to the Indian seafarers being cleared by South Korean High Court.

New Delhi, June 11, 2009.

Government of India welcomes the verdict of the Daejon High Court, Republic of Korea, delivered on 11 June 2009 in which the two Indian seafarers - Captain J. S. Chawla and Chief Officer Chetan Syam of the marine vessel "Hebei Spirit" have been held "not guilty" on the charge of criminal negligence leading to destruction of property. This verdict once again vindicates the position of the two Indian seafarers that there was no criminal negligence on their part in the accident involving their ship.

Government of India understands that the lawyers of the Indian seafarers have already approached the Prosecution for lifting the exit ban on them.

It is hoped that the exit ban on the two seafarers will be lifted and that they will be able to return home soon.

489. Speech by President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Banquet in honour of Mongolian President Tsakhiagiin Elbegdorj.

New Delhi, September 14, 2009.

Your Excellency President Elbegdorj,

Madam Bolormaa,

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It gives me immense pleasure to welcome you and your delegation to India. We are honoured that India is the first country that Your Excellency is visiting after assuming the office of the President of Mongolia in June 2009. You represent a nation and a people with whom India has interacted since time immemorial.

The history of Mongolia fascinates people all around the world, as it shaped the course of history in large parts of Asia and Europe. The cultural and spiritual contacts between India and Mongolia are deep-rooted and go back to ancient times. The message of Lord Buddha was carried from India to your country and adopted with reverence. Buddhism acquired a unique Mongolian identity and continues to provide a close link between our two cultures. As we forge ahead, this enduring cultural relationship provides us with a solid foundation for economic, scientific and technological cooperation between our two countries.

Harmony and tolerance are ingrained in the Indian ethos and tradition. These values are at the root of our pluralistic society and our secular way of life. Also our ancient culture, our humanistic traditions and a long history of indigenous local institutions have enabled us to successfully conduct a democratic system of governance.

We appreciate and welcome the evolution and flourishing of democracy in Mongolia. Your leadership, statesmanship and grass-roots work in strengthening the civil society movement, human rights, freedom of speech and democratic aspirations, are indeed commendable.

Within the framework of democracy, both India and Mongolia are undergoing rapid economic and technological development and social transformation. In this atmosphere both our countries are engaged in mutually beneficial economic, political and cultural cooperation. We would like to further broaden and deepen people- to-people contacts especially at the level of parliamentarians, scholars, students, artists, scientists and businessmen of our two countries.

India is committed to development and inclusive growth. Our effort is to harness science and technology, in particular Information Technology, to empower people, especially women. The Government has taken a decision to set up a National Mission on the Socio-Economic Empowerment of Women. I understand Mongolia is equally committed to fast economic growth and bringing about all-round development of the country. India stands committed to assist Mongolia in these endeavours and to share with you our experiences and achievements in these areas.

Excellency, I am glad to know that during your visit a number of agreements have been signed between our two countries for cooperation in various fields. I am confident that these Agreements will further strengthen and broaden our friendly cooperation.

India and Mongolia share common views on international peace, security and development. We are both against the menace of international terrorism that is afflicting our region. We are committed to cooperating to build a just and peaceful world order and for that purpose, to restructure the United Nations in order to reflect the interests and aspirations of the developing countries. We deeply appreciate your support for our aspirations to be represented in a reformed Security Council of the United Nations.

Excellency, we look forward to cooperating with Mongolia for the benefit of our two countries and for the resurgence of our continent, Asia, so that the 21st Century is the Century of Asia.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen, I now invite you to join me in a toast to:-

- the good health, well-being and success of His Excellency the President of Mongolia, Mr. Tsakhiagiin Elbegdorj and Madam Bolormaa;
- the continued progress and prosperity of the people of Mongolia; and
- the everlasting friendship and cooperation between our two countries and peoples.

MYANMAR*490. Speech by Vice President M. Hamid Ansari at the Banquet hosted in his honour by Vice Senior General Maung Aye, Vice Chairman of the State Peace and Development Council of Myanmar.*Nay Pai Taw (Myanmar), February 5, 2009.

Allow me, at the outset to thank you and your gracious wife for the generosity of your hospitality. My wife and I, and indeed my entire delegation, deem it a privilege to visit this great country - a neighbour with which we share our heritage, culture and history.

Excellency

In recent years we have made great strides in our bilateral relations that have truly become multi-faceted. The agreements, whose signing we witnessed today, are a symbol of the immense potential that exists in our bilateral engagement. And in this effort, I place on record our appreciation of the important role that you have personally played in nurturing it.

Your visit to India in 2000 marked the beginning of a series of initiatives designed to bring our peoples closer. Your landmark visit last year signaled the desire of our two countries to build on the commonalities and synergies, promote peace and security on our borders and undertake developmental projects and initiatives.

It is but natural that when friends meet, the talks are permeated with a spirit of friendship and mutual understanding. This was indeed so this afternoon. We have pledged to work together to strengthen our bilateral relations in the months and years to come. We share with you a vision of a partnership based on friendship and mutually beneficial cooperation.

The Kaladan Multi-modal project, which was signed during Your Excellency's visit to India, promises to be the cornerstone in our efforts to develop infrastructure projects for cross-border benefits. The importance of enhancing interaction between North East States of India and Myanmar cannot be overemphasized and you occupy a central place in our "Look East Policy".

Tomorrow, we shall witness the launching of yet another landmark project - the Myanmar-India Entrepreneurship Development Centre in Yangon. We believe that this Centre, along with the proposed Centre for English Language Training and the Centre for Enhancement of IT Skills, will become centres of excellence and enable the people of Myanmar to share in, and benefit from, India's developmental experience.

Excellency

Our economic engagement has expanded to embrace both our public and private sectors. Several positive developments have taken place recently in the areas of trade, investment, power, oil and natural gas, manufacturing, IT and the vocational training sectors. It was in recognition of this growing engagement that I have brought with me a high level business delegation. I am confident that their presence will lead to opening up of new opportunities in our investment and trade relations.

Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen, may I now request you all to join me in a toast:

- to the health and happiness of Vice Senior General Maung Aye and his gracious wife, Madame Mya Mya San;
- to the friendly people of the Union of Myanmar;
- to the continuing friendship, prosperity and cooperation between India and Myanmar.

491. Address by Vice President M. Hamid Ansari at the inauguration of the Myanmar-India Entrepreneurship Development Centre.

Yangon, February 6, 2009.

Distinguished Guests

Ladies and gentlemen

Entrepreneurship was indeed an ancient theme in Indian history. The great Indian political philosopher Kautilya wrote in the Arthashastra: "The king shall ever be active and discharge his duties; the root of wealth is activity, and of evil its reverse."

Today, a young India sees opportunity all around. The 21st century has come to be defined by the dynamism of its entrepreneurs and enterprises. They have created opportunities where none existed earlier. Their activities have cut across boundaries, encompassing an ever widening global arena. To seize these opportunities, countries need adequate entrepreneurial capacity, beginning with small and micro enterprises and eventually leading on to bigger and stronger enterprises. The growth of entrepreneurs is being seen as a more sustainable approach towards addressing some of the more intractable problems of a developing economy, including unemployment and poverty.

We are here today to mark the launch of an important initiative towards the creation of such an entrepreneurial base in this country. The Myanmar-India Entrepreneurship Development Centre is intended to share our developmental experience - with all the problems faced and successes achieved - with the people of Myanmar.

Myanmar abounds in natural resources, such as gas, minerals, forest products and agro-products. This Centre aims at creating a pool of entrepreneurs who can transform these resources into marketable commodities, thus enriching themselves and the country as a whole. I have no doubt that this Centre will spearhead the entrepreneurship development movement in Myanmar and facilitate the creation of viable and competitive new enterprises and new job opportunities. This Centre will also help existing enterprises to face new challenges of global competition.

It is our hope that the MIEDC, together with the recently established Centre for Enhancement of IT Skills and the soon-to-be established Centre for English Language Training would provide a comprehensive infrastructure for training of Myanmar's youth and equip them with essential skills for participating in the global economy.

I would like to compliment the Entrepreneurship Development Institute of India, entrusted with setting up this Centre, for its professionalism and for a job well done. I would also like to thank the Government of Myanmar for its help and cooperation in realising this project.

It is with much happiness that I declare this Centre open.

492. Response of the Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs on sentencing of Daw Aung San Suu Kyi. New Delhi, August 11, 2009.

We have seen reports of the sentencing of Daw Aung San Suu Kyi in Myanmar for a period of eighteen months.

India has emphasised to the Government of Myanmar the need to expedite their political reform and national reconciliation process and have noted the various steps taken so far by the Government of Myanmar in this direction.

We have maintained that this process should be broad based, including the various ethnic groups. In this context, the issue of release of political prisoners will no doubt receive due attention*.

* Ms. Suu Kyi has already served nearly 14 years of house arrest since she was prevented by the military rulers from forming and leading a government after her National League for Democracy's big win in the 1990 election. The last phase of her house arrest ended on May 27; but before that day itself, she was put on trial for an alleged violation of the restrictions that were imposed on her. She was accused of extending hospitality to American John Yettaw, who swam to her lakeside residence and stayed at her place for two days, when she was still under house arrest.

Shri Kamal Nath, Union Minister for Commerce and Industry, and Mr. Tim Groser, Trade Minister of New Zealand, during the bilateral meeting here today, agreed for an early commencement of Free Trade Agreement (FTA) negotiations between India and New Zealand, subject to the approval process of both the countries. Both the Ministers noted that the Joint Study Group (JSG) Report demonstrates considerable potential that exists to substantially develop the bilateral trade and economic relationship further, and that this would be significantly enhanced by a bilateral Free Trade Agreement.

During the interaction, Shri Kamal Nath informed the visiting New Zealand Minister that during 2007-08, India's exports to New Zealand was valued at US $ 159 million and imports from New Zealand were US $ 336 million taking the total trade to around US $ 0.5 billion and added that in the current financial year, the bilateral trade has already reached US $ 394 million in the first 7 months at a growth rate of 40%. Major items of India's exports to New Zealand are gems & jewellery, medicines, textiles, iron & steel products tyres and parts of aeroplanes/helicopters. Major items of New Zealand's exports are coal, wool, wood, metal waste/scrap, and raw skins/hides.

Speaking on the WTO Doha Round Negotiations, Shri Nath emphasised that India has been engaging constructively and actively with other fellow member countries for an early conclusion, provided the developed countries are willing to show necessary flexibility and added "it is expected that based on these negotiations, further revised texts would be brought out during March/April 2009."

FDI inflows from New Zealand to India have been US $ 16.8 million. This investment has been mainly in power, food processing industries and computer software/hardware sectors. Faculty Members, Ladies and Gentlemen

And my dear Students,

I am honoured and delighted to be here to inaugurate this international seminar on "New Dimensions of Indo-Arab Relations" in this prestigious college in my home State, which is also a seat of excellence of learning in India. It gives me immense pleasure to further note that this Seminar is being organized in the Maharaja's college with the support of the Policy Planning and Research Division of the Ministry of External Affairs. As some of you are no doubt aware, the Policy Planning Division of the Ministry of External Affairs undertakes studies on general foreign policy issues. For this purpose, it maintains interaction and liaison with the Area Studies Centres of the University Grants Commission. The Division also extends financial assistance to various academic institutions and think tanks located in different parts of the country for holding conferences, seminars and for research. Kerala has a long history of openness to the rest of the world and that is why we are particularly happy to be associated for this event with the Maharaja's College.

2. I am happy to see the presence of many eminent personalities here including Ambassadors and diplomats from many Arab states. This will certainly provide this Seminar an added profile. The deliberations as well as recommendations of the Seminar will carry greater weight and reach the appropriate audiences. I would like to compliment the organizers of the Seminar for their initiative and their efforts to make this a memorable event.

3. India-Arab relations is a subject close to my heart. Personally, not only have I travelled to several Arab countries in the course of my international career, but after I left my job at the UN, I was temporarily resident in Dubai in my bid to work with various institutions to bring, amongst other things, quality and affordable education to my home state of Kerala. This put me in direct contact with Arab people and I have come away very impressed not only with their intrinsic abilities and entrepreneurial skills but also with their deep sense of appreciation of the historic, cultural and civilizational ties that bind India and the Arab countries. As a student of history as well as an ardent believer in the importance of history in shaping our destiny I propose to deal today with some aspects of our historical relations with Arab countries. This will show all of us how our relations cannot be anything but excellent.

4. Our ties predate our emergence as nation states. Not only did Arabs and Indians know each other before the advent of Islam but it is said that the Arabs even played a crucial role in the emergence of the very notion of "Hindustan" and even in giving a name to the religion of Hinduism. We can argue whether it is to the Arabs, Persians or Greeks that we owe the concept of the Hindu - the people who live across the river Sindhu or Indus - but there is no doubt that the people of India were referred to as Hindus by the Arabs long before the Hindus themselves called themselves Hindus.

5. The Arabian Sea, which washes the shores of both our regions, has played a crucial role in the cultivation of our relations. India's cultural links with West Asia can be traced to the early years of recorded history. There is evidence, for instance, of trade links between the Harappan civilization and that of Dilmun in the Gulf. In pre-Islamic times, Arab traders acted as middlemen in trade between Bharuch in Gujarat and Puduchery and the Mediterranean through Alexandria and even through the Palakkad gap as evidenced in archaeological finds of Roman coins and artefacts in southern India. On-going excavations in the Red Sea coast continually produce fresh evidence of perhaps even older links. And it is no accident that so many distinguished Arab families in many different Arab countries bear the surname al-Hindi, or that Hind is still a desirable name used by many Arab women.

6. Some scholars trace Indian studies on the hadith to the early days of the arrival of Islam in India in the South in the 7th century and in the north in the 8th century AD. Islamic scholars from the turn of the 8th Century AD to al- Baruni (d.1048 AD) have, in their writings, documented Indo-Arab cultural links, including Indian contributions to Arab thought and culture. Translations of Indian works were sponsored by the Abbasid Caliphate in Baghdad where, especially under Harun al-Rashid, Indian concepts in secular subjects ranging from medicine to mathematics and astronomy were absorbed into the corpus of Arab scientific writing. Scholars have also documented the compilation of a large number of Indian works in Quranic studies over the last 500 years as also in Islamic jurisprudence over a slightly longer period. Perhaps less remembered today is the contribution of Indians to Islamic scholarship in the medieval period. Amongst notable scholars was Shah Waliullah of Delhi and his descendants. Indeed, so important were these contributions that in an article in West Asia and the Region brought out last year by the Center for West Asian Studies of Jamia Millia Islamia, the following tribute from the Lebanese scholar Rasheed Rada is to be found:

If our brothers, Indian Ulama had not taken care of the science of hadith in this period, the same would have disappeared from the Eastern countries, because that branch of knowledge had become weak in Egypt, Sham (Syria Lebanon, Jordan and Palestine), Iraq and Hijaz since the 16th century A.D and it reached its weakest point at the beginning of the 20th century A.D.

7. Travellers between India and the Arab world were the vehicles not only for scholarly exchanges but also for cultural interaction at a popular level. Much of the Sufi tradition is the result of Indo-Arab interaction and Khwaja Moinuddin Chisti, whose shrine at Ajmer is visited by people of many faiths, was himself an Arab. Over centuries, stories from the Panchatantra have blended with the Fables of Aesop and stories from Alf Laila wa Laila or the Arabian Nights. Some Arab travellers, such as the Moroccan Ibn Batuta occasionally found themselves elevated to positions of power by their hosts; Ibn Batuta was, for a while, made the Qazi of Delhi, even though he was unfamiliar with the school of Islamic jurisprudence used in India. As Dr Liaqath Ali has reminded us, many Arabic words can be found in several languages particularly in Hindi and Urdu.

8. The adventures of seafarers who have ridden the waves and tides of the Arabian Sea on their dhows are the stuff of legend. I have even heard that story that it was an Indian seafarer who regularly traveled between Kerala and the Arab settlements on the east coast of the African continent who might have guided Vasco da Gama to the Indian coast at Kozhikode. It is for scholars of history to debate on the accuracy of this tale, but what is not debatable is that these ties have hundreds if not thousands of years of antiquity and are responsible for the civilizational melting pots that all of us have inherited and thrived in. Another compelling example would be enough to illustrate my point and this is the worldwide use of what are known in the West as Arabic numerals, but which the Arabs themselves acknowledge they learned from India.

9. The early years of the 20th century, marked as they were by the beginning of the end of Western colonialism, witnessed much interest in the fortunes of the Arab and Islamic world within our own freedom movement. The Khilafat struggle perhaps best exemplified this. And one of our great nationalist leaders, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, was born in Mecca and studied at the famous al-Azhar University of Egypt. The leaders of our freedom movement closely monitored developments in Egypt and other countries, a trend that was also noticeable after we gained freedom. The struggle of the FLN in Algeria and President Nasser's nationalization of the Suez Canal and the Suez Crisis of 1956 were but two important historical developments that found resonance in India's support for our fraternal Arab peoples.

10. Having said that, let me now move to our contemporary relations. Just because we have had centuries-old relations does not mean that we do not have to endeavour to sustain and nurture our present day relations. If anything, it needs more hard work by all concerned so that we are not lulled into complacency. The bedrock of goodwill between our two regions allows us to build a strong edifice of substantial contemporary relations. India considers the Arab region very important role in shaping our political, economic, defence and security policies at both the regional and global level. Let me make it very clear. Our approach on issues affecting the Arab world is based on principles, not expediency. India has endeavored to follow the spirit of South-South solidarity and cooperation in its dealings with the Gulf and Arab world. In this context, it is not surprising to note that that the number of flights to the Gulf region, for instance, is more than the total number of flights from India to the rest of the world.

11. Whereas the world has heard of our "Look East" policy in South-East Asia, as far as the Arab world is concerned, we are proud that we have a "Look West" policy too, and "West" here does not refer to Europe or America. In keeping with our desire to strengthen our relations with the countries of the region we are trying to put in place a structure of multifaceted cooperation covering all sectors. It is a matter of satisfaction that our efforts are being matched in equal measure by the countries of the Arab world. 2008 witnessed several high-level visits, bilaterally manifesting the importance of the region in our relationship, peaking with our Prime Minister's visit to Qatar and Oman in November 2008. The visit of the Vice President of India to Kuwait in April 2009 opened up new facets for cooperation.

12. Let me take this opportunity to address one important aspect of India-Arab relations i.e. the issue of Palestine. India's solidarity with the Palestinian people and its attitude to the Palestinian question reflects, perhaps more than any other issue, the enduring nature of Indo-Arab ties. It was as early as in 1936 that the Congress Working Committee sent greetings to Palestine and on 27 September 1936 Palestine Day was first observed in India. The 1939 Session of the Indian National Congress adopted a Resolution on Palestine and looked forward to the emergence of an independent democratic state in Palestine in which Jewish rights would be protected. India was a member of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine. In 1974, it became the first non-Arab country to recognise the Palestine Liberation Organization as the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. In March 1980, the Government of India announced in Parliament India's decision to accord full diplomatic recognition to the PLO office in New Delhi. It was after this that the late Yasser Arafat paid a three-day official visit to India in March 1980. It was during this visit that Mr. Arafat described India as "an eternal friend". In 1988, India recognised Palestine as a State. Construction of the Palestine Embassy building in New Delhi, a gift of the people and Government of India, is nearing completion. The continuing tradition of exchange of high level visits, which saw us welcoming President Bashar al-Assad of Syria in June 2008 and President Mubarak of Egypt in November 2008, also witnessed a State visit by President Mahmoud Abbas to New Delhi in October 2008.

13. India has had a consistent and unwavering record of support for the Palestinian cause since the days of our freedom struggle. Our policy is in line with United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 of 1967 and 338 of 1973, the Quartet Roadmap and the Arab Peace Initiative. India supports a united, independent, viable, sovereign state of Palestine with East Jerusalem as its capital, living within secure and recognised borders side by side at peace with Israel. We have expressed concern for the continuing expansion of Israeli settlements in occupied Palestinian territories. India also supports Palestine in a variety of tangible ways. In March 2009, $10 million were contributed as budget support for the Palestine National Authority. We also assist Palestine in developing its human resources through the ITEC programme.

14. Reverting to the broad nature of India-Arab relations, Arab countries, as vital sources of oil and gas whether from the Gulf or more recently from Egypt, Sudan and the Maghreb, have become essential to India's energy security needs. Indian companies have secured concessions or have otherwise invested in the oil sector significantly in Sudan, Egypt and Libya. Less publicized, perhaps, is the enormous importance to India's food security of countries such as Jordan, Morocco, Tunisia and Algeria as providers of rock phosphate and phosphoric acid and potash, all of which translate into fertilizer for our farmers.

15. Egypt has emerged as a significant Indian investment destination with Indian investments estimated at over US $500 million. Some Indian companies are also exploring possibilities of setting up plants to manufacture phosphoric intermediates in Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Jordan. We are also examining the possibilities of working together with Syria in this regard.

16. Besides the hydrocarbon and fertilizers sectors, Indian companies have executed or are in the process of completing a variety of projects including those financed by concessional lines of credit. Examples include a thermal power plant in Sudan, a cement plant in Djibouti, an architecturally complex bridge in Jordan and a variety of projects in Libya.

17. Our trade with Arab countries is booming. A look at our figures of trade with the Arab world is illuminating. For instance the Gulf region has emerged as a major trading partner of India. During 2006-2007 the total two-way trade was US $ 47 billion and in the year 2007-08 it reached more than US$ 76 billion. Trade with the non-Gulf Arab countries totaled more than US$ 13 billion in 2007-08. Total trade with Arab countries was about US$ 90 billion in 2007-08.

18. I am happy to inform you that to give a boost to trade relations, we are negotiating with the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) to conclude an India-GCC Free Trade Agreement (FTA). This would complement our ongoing and rapidly expanding bilateral economic engagement with individual member countries of GCC. The third GCC-India Industrial Conference, which was held in Mumbai in 2007, was a success and it has further consolidated our economic interaction. We are working to hold the fourth GCC-India Industrial Conference later this year.

19. India has always shown its willingness to share with our Arab brethren our experience and expertise in institution and capacity building, governance, science and technology including Information Technology and biotechnology, healthcare and higher education including training of Arab officials, diplomats, soldiers and scholars. ISRO/Antrix Corporation was awarded a contract in July 2008 for launch of the Algerian satellites. Antrix has completed a remote sensing project involving setting up of an earth station in Algeria using Indian CARTOSAT imagery. India and Egypt concluded an agreement on the peaceful use of outer space during President Mubarak's 2008 visit. Cooperation in Information & Communication Technology is another area worth mentioning. Recently, Memoranda of Understanding and agreements relating to this area have been signed with Tunisia and Syria.

20. The Secretary General of the League of Arab States and my good friend, H.E. Mr. Amre Moussa, visited India in November-December 2008. I am happy to inform you that during this visit the Memorandum of Cooperation between India and the League of Arab States on the establishment of an Arab-Indian Cooperation Forum was signed in New Delhi. This is a very comprehensive document that looks at deepening our relations in many sectors including energy, education, human resources development and trade and investment. We are looking forward to the spirited implementation of the Memorandum which we are sure will take our relations to new heights. I look forward to cooperation from all to carry this ambitious agenda forward. In this context, I am happy to note that last December, the Ministry of External Affairs worked with the Indian Council of Cultural Relations and the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry to organise the first Indo-Arab Cultural Festival in New Delhi with the support of various Arab Missions and governments. The Government of the UAE has recently selected Indian books for translation into Arabic to enhance understanding of our country's history and literature. We too study Arabic here, as the presence of so many Indian scholars of Arabic here today testifies.

21. Ladies and Gentlemen, the Arab world has always figured very high in India's foreign policy priorities. India considers the Arab world a key part of its strategic neighbourhood. The Arab world is the only region for which the Government of India has appointed a Special Envoy. India has worked with its Arab friends in a variety of multilateral forums including the United Nations, the Non-aligned Movement and the G-77. India is a major troop contributor to UNIFIL and provides elements to UNDOF. Indian peacekeepers also serve with the UN Mission in Sudan, UNMIS, which acts in support of the Comprehensive Peace Accord of January 2005.

22. Allow me to turn to a subject which is close to the hearts of people of Kerala - the welfare of the Indian community in the Arab countries in general and the Gulf region in particular. The people of India in the Gulf and the Arab world have contributed immensely to the economic development of both India and the countries they reside and work in. The remittances that India receives from the 4.5 million expatriates in Gulf, many of them from Kerala, in the order of more than US$ 10 billion annually, make a significant contribution to India's economic development. In view of the large Indian population in the region, a number of issues come up from time to time in our relations with these countries which relate to our people-to-people contacts and to consular matters. Active steps have been taken and are continually being taken, in cooperation with the countries of the region, to promote the welfare of the Indian community, particularly expatriate workers. Memoranda of Understanding on manpower have been signed with some countries and are under negotiation with others. These and similar arrangements will enable us to jointly deal with issues relating to the welfare of the expatriate Indian communities in the region. I would like to take this opportunity to assure the people of Kerala that our Government gives high priority to the welfare of Indians in the Gulf and if anybody needs any help or assistance in this regard, my Ministry together with that of the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs will always be at your service.

23. India desires to strengthen cooperation to explore opportunities across the entire spectrum of potentialities that exist. We wish to work together today with an eye on tomorrow: to consolidate our ties in emerging sectors of the economy so that we can develop a framework for future generations. Our economies are complementary. In many areas, countries in the Arab world have the capital, while India offers the opportunities, especially for the development of infrastructure. The more the long-term linkages that India and the Arab world develop, the greater will be our mutual stakes and interests in each other's success and prosperity. I want to assure our Arab friends that it is not only financial investments that we are thinking of: we are invested in the future of our relationship.

24. To summarize, I would like to underline that we have in place a framework for cooperation, which is constantly deepening and widening. While its pace could be faster, a critical mass has already developed to take us into a qualitatively upgraded relationship. There are many dimensions to Indo-Arab relations, some very old and some very new. I am sure the deliberations of this seminar will examine these relations from all perspectives and offer recommendations for augmenting our multi-dimensional cooperation. I look forward to reading and acting upon the recommendations of the seminar.

25. I would like to add another word on a broader theme. I believe strongly that foreign policy is too important a subject to be left to the Foreign Ministry alone. Discussion of international relations should not be confined to the seminar rooms of Delhi. That is why I am delighted by the initiative of Maharaja's college because I believe all Indians, even 2000 km away from our nation's capital, have a vital stake in the development of our international relations. I am sure there will be many more such occasions in the future to discuss our country's external affairs in different parts of India and that we will have the privilege, as we do today, of seeing distinguished diplomats travelling out of Delhi to attend them. I call upon other educational institutions in this state and across India to emulate this example. I wish you well in your deliberations today.

Thank you.

496. Address by Minister of State Shashi Tharoor on "Expanding Horizons of Cooperation between India and the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) at the Bahrain - India Society.

Bahrain, October 4, 2009.

Excellencies, distinguished colleagues and friends,

I am extremely happy and indeed delighted to be with you here today addressing this august gathering. I am particularly honoured by the presence of H.E Sheikh Khalid bin Ahmed bin Mohammad Al Khalifa, the Foreign Minister of the Kingdom of Bahrain here today. I also immensely satisfied to see amidst you many of my friends and colleagues, people I have come to know and admire over the years. As many of you know, Bahrain is not new to me as I have been here earlier on couple of occasions and always enjoyed my interactions. However, this is my first visit to a Gulf country in my new capacity as Minister of State for External Affairs of the Government of India. As such this undoubtedly is a special occasion for me.

2. I start by expressing my gratitude to His Excellency Mr. Abdulnabi Alsho'ala, Chairman of Bahrain-India Society, Advisor to the Prime Minister and former Minister of Labour for the Government of Bahrain for his support and leadership towards building Bahrain-India relations. He is one of our great friends and we appreciate and admire his contribution. I also take this opportunity to appreciate the efforts of Bahrain-India Society which has acted as a pillar of strength in the relations between our two countries and our peoples.

3. I have been asked to talk on the expanding horizons of cooperation between India and the GCC. Let me start by saying that this is a subject which I have come to view as one which holds the greatest potential for development as we already possess a strong base to work with. It is also area of work which is close to my heart and I propose to dedicate my energies to see it prosper and grow.

4. India's ties with the Gulf region go back 5000 years. Archaeological excavations across the region regularly yield evidence of the Gulf's intimate maritime and commercial links with our civilizations in Harappa and Mohenjodaro. There is evidence of relations between the Harappan civilisation and the Dilmun society. These ties, which have continued and flourished over centuries, are a testimony to the proximity of the Gulf region to India not only in geographical terms but also in a civilizational and cultural sense. For several hundred years, India provided foodstuffs, textiles and jewellery to the Gulf and, in turn, imported dates and pearls. Indian traders have lived in the Gulf for several centuries, just as Gulf merchants made Kerala and Mumbai their home.

5. Over the last 40 years India has been in the forefront in providing human resources for the development of the Gulf countries: today, Indians are the number one expatriate community in every member country of the GCC. The presence of Indian professionals across the Gulf is also increasing. This is a very healthy and encouraging development that adds a new dimension to our relationship. I am aware that this trend is also very strong in Bahrain with some 300,000 Indians and the presence of large number of Indian professionals in Bahrain.

6. I am convinced about the oneness of our peoples and anything but close and friendly relations would be an aberration. The Gulf region has a special place in India's external interactions as well as our internal dynamics. For India, the Gulf region is an important source of energy and is home to over 4.5 million Indians. The Gulf's rich resources and the growing demands of India's rapidly expanding economy make us partners for our mutual benefit. The Gulf region is a major trading partner and the emergence of Bahrain and the GCC countries as a major investment partner of India is but a matter of time. I deeply appreciate the manner in which Bahrain has emerged as a financial hub and nerve centre. Bahrain has great potential to partner financial cooperation with Indian financial institutions and we should strive towards building more such linkages.

7. I believe most experts agree that India has faced one of the greatest economic challenges of recent times, namely the global financial crisis, admirably. Although our economy also did face considerable stress, it was able to withstand the recessionary trends and emerged as one of the few bright spots in the generally bleak world economic landscape of the past one and half year or so. This reflects the resilience of the Indian economy and its strengths. It is a widely held belief that the Indian economy in the post-financial crisis years will be better placed to accelerate its growth. Our average growth rate during 2004 to 2008 remained 8% plus. Even in the midst of the financial crisis India attained a nearly 6% growth rate and I believe that in the next fiscal year we will again enter a near 8% growth rate. The principal challenge before us is to ensure that we re-attain a high economic growth rate every year for the coming two decades to bring prosperity to the masses at large. Two most important pre-requisites in this regard for us are energy security and development of infrastructure. We also need to expand electric-power production 6 to 7 times between now and 2032 to energize our growth requirements. These challenges call for a robust national effort to obtain the resources required to meet these targets. It is here we see the foundation of India's new terms of engagement with the Gulf region.

8. As a result of high oil prices and prudent fiscal policies, the countries of the GCC have generated a very high level of investible surpluses. India is held as one of the safest investment destinations in the world, giving some of the best returns on investments. I am happy to note that GCC countries see India as an important investment partner and destination. I personally believe that investments will constitute a new, abiding and mutually beneficial framework for the future growth of our ties.

9. For several years, India has obtained the bulk of its crude requirements from the Gulf. In view of the Gulf's vast oil reserves and our geographical proximity, I am confident that India and the Gulf region will remain long-term partners in the energy sector. We would like to transform the present buyer-seller relationship into something more substantial and enduring. We would like to encourage mutual investments in each other's energy sectors. Indian companies could participate in exploration and development projects in the Gulf while companies from GCC countries could invest in India's downstream and petro-chemicals sector. An early meeting of our officials and entrepreneurs to discuss cooperation in this sector is desirable.

10. Trade in goods and services between India and the Gulf is expanding rapidly and it exceeded US$ 87 billion in the last fiscal year. The export of foodstuff constitutes an important part of India's export basket. Today, India is a reliable supplier of food products to the Gulf countries. I thus see India's requirement for energy security and that of the GCC countries for food security, as opportunities that can work to mutual advantage. We could even think of third country agro-projects where Indian expertise in agriculture could be used to ensure food security for GCC countries.

11. To achieve these goals and to enhance our economic and commercial relationship we now have in place the necessary institutional arrangements. I would like, in this regard, to refer to the India-GCC Framework Agreement for enhancing and developing economic cooperation which was signed in 2004. To liberalize trade relations and to hold discussions on a Free Trade Agreement between India and GCC countries, we have established negotiating teams that have held three rounds of discussions so far. A Free Trade Agreement between us would complement our ongoing and rapidly expanding bilateral economic engagement with individual member countries of the GCC.

12. The India-GCC industrial conference has been playing an important role in strengthening the economic relationship between us. The 3rd India-GCC industrial conference held in 2007 has recommended that an India-GCC FTA should be concluded expeditiously. We are contributing our part to see it materialise and I am happy to see that the 4th India-GCC Industrial Conference will take place in February 2010 in Riyadh, which will further pave the way for our growing cooperation. In a somewhat larger context we shall be organising the 2nd Indo-Arab Investment Conclave in February 2010 in New Delhi and I hope you all will find it convenient to attend and benefit from the cross sectoral mutually beneficial investment opportunities on offer there.

13. We consider that an exchange of visits at the political level is very important to strengthen our relationship with GCC countries. In this regard, I am happy to note that the exchange of visits at the highest level has increased between India and GCC countries. India's Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh visited Qatar and Oman in November 2008 and our Vice President Mr. M. Hamid Ansari visited Kuwait, reflecting the close relations between India and the Gulf region. We also have had the honour of receiving a large number of dignitaries from the Gulf region in recent years. These visits have further strengthened our relationship and have led to very fruitful discussions.

14. From the strategic point of view, India and the GCC share the need for stability and security in the region. The common political and security concerns of India and the GCC translate into efforts for peace, security and stability in the Gulf region and South Asia. The emerging common threat perceptions create further opportunities for GCC-India cooperation in the future. The anti-piracy drive in the region is symbolic of an extensive and functional multilateral cooperation. The critical space for India to play an increasingly pro-active role is widening. It is in this context that India and the GCC States can create many opportunities for mutual benefit.

15. There are newer opportunities and potentials which need to be built upon between the Gulf region and India. Although GCC-India cooperation has expanded, I have a personal conviction that this is not enough. We have to work jointly to expand our cooperation further. Our potential to cooperate is infinite - just like the horizon we can see from your country's beautiful shores. For this framework we are thankful to Bahrain for its contribution and I hope that it will continue in the future. Bahrain has been one of our greatest supporters and well-wishers in the GCC and India appreciates and honours this support.

Thank you.

New Delhi, November 16, 2009.

Mr. Manouchehr Mottaki, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Islamic Republic of Iran is on a two day visit to India (November 16-17). During his visit he called on the Hon'ble Vice President and the Prime Minister. He met with External Affairs Minister and held delegation level talks covering a wide range of issues. The discussions continued over lunch hosted by the External Affairs Minister. The Iranian Foreign Minister reiterated an invitation to Prime Minister from President Ahmedinejad to visit Iran.

The two sides underlined the need for the early convening of the next session of the Joint Commission and discussed various projects including in the fields of oil and gas, power, surface transport and infrastructure projects like the Chabahar Port and the International North-South Corridor. It was agreed that an Indian Cultural Centre would be set up in Tehran and an Indian cultural week would be held in Tehran and Shiraz in 2010. Both sides also discussed trade facilitation mechanisms and the need for an early conclusion of a Bilateral Investment Promotion and Protection Agreement, an agreement for Avoidance of Double Taxation, as also discussions on a Preferential Trade Agreement. The two sides also took the opportunity for detailed exchange of views on important regional and international issues, including the threat of terrorism confronting the two countries.

Media report elaborating said that the two countries also discussed prospects of trilateral dialogue between India, Iran and Afghanistan on transit routes to central Asia, with the Iranian port of Chabar to be the staging point for goods. In four hours of talks with the External Affairs Minister Mr. Krishna which included a luncheon meeting, issues relating to security, pricing and guaranteed supply, and resolved to convene a meeting of the Joint Working Group to discuss the finer details of gas pipeline and other energy related projects were discussed. "Our interest in having a trilateral agreement was underlined," media quoted informed sources to say, about the transit route beginning from the Chabar port. It was planned to construct a railway line from Chabar to Bam. From there, goods would be taken from the Afghan border town of Zaranj to Delaram on an Indian-built road to the Afghan garland highways, which provide access to several central Asian republics. The need to add greater economic content was also recognised during delegation-level talks between the two Foreign Ministers. Both sides touched upon increasing contacts in the banking sector, civil aviation cooperation, double taxation avoidance agreement, bilateral investment protection agreement and civil aviation cooperation. Mr. Mottaki in his meeting with the Prime Minister renewed to him the invitation to visit Tehran, and it was agreed to work out the details through diplomatic channels. The liquefied gas deal between the two countries too came up for discussion. New Delhi reportedly maintained that as far as it was concerned, the agreement was signed in 2005 and reopening it to accommodate Tehran's desire for higher rates was difficult to accept.

502. Resolution adopted by the Board of Governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency to implement the NPT Safeguards Agreement and Relevant provisions of Security Council Resolutions 1737 (2006), 1747 (2007), 1803 (2008) and 1835 (2008) in the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Vienna, November 27, 2009.

The Board of Governors,

- (a) Recalling the Resolutions adopted by the Board and the UNSC,
- (b) Commending the Director General for his professional and impartial efforts to implement the Safeguards Agreement in Iran, to resolve outstanding safeguards issues in Iran and to verify the implementation by Iran of the suspension,
- (c) Stressing the important role played by the IAEA in resolving the Iranian nuclear issue and reaffirming the Board's resolve to continue to work for a diplomatic solution to the Iranian nuclear issue,
- (d) Reaffirming the inalienable rights of all the parties to the Non-Proliferation Treaty to develop research, production and use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes in accordance with Article IV of the NPT,
- (e) Commending the Director General for his proposal of an Agreement between the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Governments of the Republic of France, the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Russian Federation for Assistance in Securing Nuclear Fuel for a Research Reactor in Iran for the Supply of Nuclear Fuel to the Tehran Research Reactor; appreciating the intensive efforts of the Director General to achieve an agreement on his proposal,
- (f) Noting with serious concern that Iran continues to defy the requirements and obligations contained in the relevant IAEA Board of Governors and UN Security Council Resolutions,
- (g) Also noting with serious concern that Iran has constructed an enrichment facility at Qom in breach of its obligation to suspend all enrichment related activities and that Iran's failure to notify the Agency of the new facility until September 2009 is inconsistent with its obligations under the Subsidiary Arrangements to its Safeguards Agreement,

(h) Affirming that Iran's failure to inform the Agency, in accordance with the provisions of the revised Code 3.1, of the decision to construct, or to authorize construction of, a new facility as soon as such a decision is taken, and to submit information as the design is developed, does not contribute to the building of confidence,

(i) Underlining that Iran's declaration of the new facility reduces the level of confidence in the absence of other nuclear facilities and gives rise to questions about whether there are any other nuclear facilities under construction in Iran which have not been declared to the Agency,

(j) Noting with serious concern that, contrary to the request of the Board of Governors and the requirements of the Security Council, Iran has neither implemented the Additional Protocol nor cooperated with the Agency in connection with the remaining issues of concern, which need to be clarified to exclude the possibility of military dimensions to Iran's nuclear programme,

(k) Emphasizing the Director General's assertion that unless Iran implements the Additional Protocol and, through substantive dialogue, clarifies the outstanding issues to the satisfaction of the Agency, the Agency will not be in a position to provide credible assurance about the absence of undeclared nuclear material and activities in Iran, and

(l) Noting that the Director General has repeatedly declared that he is unable to verify that Iran's programme is for exclusively peaceful purposes,

1. Urges Iran to comply fully and without delay with its obligations under the above mentioned resolutions of the Security Council, and to meet the requirements of the Board of Governors, including by suspending immediately construction at Qom;

2. Urges Iran to engage with the Agency on the resolution of all outstanding issues concerning Iran's nuclear programme and, to this end, to cooperate fully with the IAEA by providing such access and information that the Agency requests to resolve these issues;

3. Urges Iran to comply fully and without qualification with its safeguards obligations, to apply the modified Code 3.1 and implement and ratify promptly the Additional Protocol;

4. Urges Iran specifically to provide the Agency with the requested clarifications regarding the purpose of the enrichment plant at Qom and the chronology of its design and construction;

5. Calls on Iran to confirm, as requested by the Agency, that Iran has not taken a decision to construct, or authorize construction of, any other nuclear facility which has as yet not been declared to the Agency;
6. Requests the Director General to continue his efforts to implement the Safeguards Agreement in Iran, resolve the outstanding issues which give rise to concerns, and which need to be clarified to exclude the existence of possible military dimensions to Iran's nuclear programme, and to implement the relevant provisions of UNSC resolutions;
7. Further requests the Director General to report this resolution to the UNSC; and
8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

503. Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs explaining India's Vote at the meeting of the Board of Governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Vienna.

New Delhi, November 27, 2009.

The Board of Governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) met on November 26-27, 2009 in Vienna. Reproduced below is the text of the Explanation of Vote by India on the resolution on the issue of implementation of safeguards in the Islamic Republic of Iran, which was adopted by the Board on November 27, 2009.

Explanation of Vote

The Indian delegation has taken careful note of the report of the DG on Implementation of the NPT Safeguards Agreement and Relevant Provisions of Security Council Resolutions in the Islamic Republic of Iran. In his Report the DG has noted that while the Agency has continued to verify the non-diversion of declared nuclear material in Iran, there has however, been no movement on remaining issues of concern which need to be clarified for the Agency to verify the exclusively peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear programme.

The DG concluded that 'Iran's failure to notify the Agency of the existence of this facility until September 2009, rather than as soon as the decision to construct it or to authorize construction was taken, was inconsistent with its obligations under the Subsidiary Arrangements to its Safeguards Agreement and that Iran's late declaration of the new facility reduces confidence in the absence of other nuclear facilities under construction in Iran which have not been declared to the Agency.'

India has consistently supported the right of all states to the peaceful uses of nuclear energy consistent with the respective obligations that they have undertaken. In Iran's case which is a signatory to the NPT, it has all the rights and obligations that go with its membership of the NPT pertaining to the use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes. We also underline the importance of the full and effective implementation of all safeguards obligations under taken by member states of the IAEA.

Our support for the resolution is based on the key points contained in the Report of the DG. During previous Board meetings we had underlined the critical importance of continued cooperation and dialogue between the Agency and Iran. The Agency's safeguards system is the bedrock of the international community's confidence that peaceful uses of nuclear energy and non-proliferation objectives can be pursued in a balanced manner. The integrity of this system should be preserved.

India has considered the role of the DG has having a vital bearing on the consideration of all issues by the Board of Governors. The conclusions he has drawn in his report are therefore difficult to ignore.

In recent months we were encouraged by the new pathways of engagement that had opened up with Iran, including the recent meetings in Geneva and Vienna which gave rise to hopes of constructive and productive results. As such we do not believe that the adoption of this resolution should divert the parties away from dialogue. This resolution cannot be the basis of a renewed punitive approach or new sanctions. In fact, the coming weeks should be used by all concerned to expand the diplomatic space to satisfactorily address all outstanding issues. India firmly supports keeping the door open for dialogue and avoidance of confrontation.

Media reports quoted official sources in the Prime Minister's entourage in Port of Spain where he was attending the CHOGM Conference to suggest that this resolution should not be the basis of a "renewed punitive approach or new sanctions" against Iran. They said 'India's support for the resolution was based on the key points contained in the report of the Director-General of the IAEA, Mohamed ElBaradei. At earlier Board meetings, India had consistently underlined the critical importance of dialogue between the Agency and Iran. India, however, found the conclusions drawn in Mr. ElBaradei's report difficult to ignore.' It was felt that the Agency's safeguard system was the bedrock of the international community's "confidence" that peaceful uses of nuclear energy and nonproliferation objectives can be pursued together and that the "integrity of the system" should be preserved. It was suggested that the coming weeks should be used to expand the diplomatic space to address the issues. The door must be kept open for dialogue and avoidance of confrontation.

Earlier the question of Iran acquiring nuclear weapons also figured at the press conference of Prime Minister in Washington on November 25 and he then said:

"India enjoys good relations with both the United States and with Iran. With regard to the nuclear weapon ambitions of Iran I have stated India's position on a number of occasions, and that is well known. But in my meetings with the leaders of the US I did mention that a few days before we came to Washington the Foreign Minister of Iran was in Delhi and he called on me; that I asked him about the state of play with regard to the negotiations on the nuclear programme of Iran; that he said to me that they have been getting very good messages from the new Obama Administration; and that he was hopeful that engagement with P5 powers will succeed. If that comes about, as neighbours of Iran living in that region where five million citizens of our country work and earn their livelihood, given our dependence on energy imports from Iran, we would welcome an outcome of engagement between Iran and P5. I sincerely hope that this engagement will be productive of results."

504. The Information given to the Lok Sabha on economic cooperation with Iran.

New Delhi, December 16, 2009.

During the visit to India by Foreign Minister of Iran Mr. Manouchehr Mottaki on November 16-17, 2009, the two sides discussed, inter alia, the issue of bilateral energy cooperation, the development of Chabahar Port and Railway Project, and the International North South Corridor. A delegation led by Mr. Seifollah Jashnsaz, Deputy Minister in the Iranian Ministry of Oil and President of National Iran Oil Company visited India from November 30-December 3, 2009. The two sides held discussions on various aspects of bilateral cooperation between India and Iran in the oil and gas sector.

India is pursuing the import of natural gas from Iran through the said project. Issues such as pricing, delivery point, project structure, etc., are being focused on. Such multilateral projects involve protracted discussions and as such no time frame can be indicated for completion of discussions.

30 million standard cubic meter per day (mmscmd) of gas is estimated to be supplied in phase-I of the Project.

KAZAKHSTAN*505. Speech by President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Banquet in honour of the President of Kazakhstan Nursultan Nazarbayev.*New Delhi, 24th January 2009.

Your Excellency President Nazarbayev,

Distinguished Guests,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It gives me great pleasure in welcoming Your Excellency and members of your delegation, to India on this historic visit. I say historic, because this is the first time, that a leader from a Central Asian country is gracing our Republic Day celebrations, as our honoured Chief Guest. This is indicative of the importance India attaches to the Central Asian region, which is our extended neighbourhood, and to the Republic of Kazakhstan, in particular.

Our countries figure on the fabled Silk Route of ancient days. Buddha's images in the etchings found on the banks of the Ili River in Kazakhstan stand testimony to the historic linkages that existed between our two nations. The dynasties of the Sakas and the Kushanas took the legacy of our linkages forward. Our multi-ethnic and diverse societies today are based on pluralism, mutual respect and tolerance. Our countries are secular and firmly believe in inclusiveness. We are committed to take forward our historical linkages into the future, by developing a multi-faceted and a mutually beneficial bilateral relationship. Your visit, Excellency, will further consolidate our dynamic relations.

We are deeply touched by the words of condemnation expressed by Kazakhstan, on the terrorist attacks that took place in November last year. Your words of support reinforced our resolve to firmly deal with the menace of terrorism, which requires coordinated efforts globally. We regard Kazakhstan as a valuable partner in this fight against terrorism.

We, in India, admire the remarkable progress achieved by Kazakhstan in a short period of time. This progress is not merely economic growth, but overall development of Kazakhstan as a nation. We congratulate Your Excellency, for the far-sighted vision and exemplary leadership with which you have steered Kazakhstan.

Kazakhstan is fortunate to be endowed with a variety of natural resources, which have contributed to its economic growth. It gives me satisfaction to know, that our two countries are cooperating in the critical area of energy security - hydrocarbons and civilian nuclear energy - to mutual advantage.

Education has figured high in India's national priorities and, as a result, we have very good educational institutions and a vast qualified human resource capability. Cooperation in education, therefore, holds promise. I am delighted to learn that there are academic exchanges between our two countries, under the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation and other scholarship programmes. There are many Kazakh ( ) nationals who have trained in Indian educational establishments. I believe that impressions about a country, as a student and the friends that one makes at that impressionable age, remain for a lifetime. Education builds long-term bonds and, as friendly countries, we should foster and nurture these bonds, which bring us closer.

During the successful visit of Vice President Hamid Ansari to Kazakhstan last year, I understand that cooperation in agriculture was discussed and our two Governments are pursuing the idea further, to develop institutional linkages. Such cooperation addresses the critical area of food security and has a human dimension. I feel that it is in the interest of our two countries, to ensure that we capitalize on this opportunity.

Excellency,

Allow me also to wholeheartedly commend your initiatives on promoting world peace and harmony. Kazakhstan is uniquely placed on the crossroads of Europe and Asia and Kazakhstan's elevation to chair the Organization of Security and Cooperation in Europe in 2010 is truly deserved. The Conference on Interaction and Confidence Building Measures in Asia initiative has now matured into an important multi-lateral forum and the agenda has expanded to include areas such as transport and tourism. India is committed to the CICA process and looks forward to contribute to other such initiatives of Kazakhstan.

Excellency, your presence at our Republic Day celebrations is a major milestone in our relationship. The agreements and understanding concluded during this visit strengthen our bonds of friendship. As we continue on this journey, let us weave a strong fabric of friendship.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen, may I request you to join me in a toast to:

- the good health and long life of His Excellency President Nazarbayev;
- the prosperity of the friendly people of Kazakhstan; and
- the everlasting friendship and cooperation between our two countries and peoples.

It was recommended that feasibility studies on the two projects by Indian agencies should be undertaken immediately and considered by the two Sides for implementation.

14. The Governments expressed satisfaction at the functioning of the institutional mechanism which have steered bilateral cooperation to desired levels and identify new areas of cooperation. The two Sides appreciated the role of the India-Kazakhstan Inter-Governmental Commission on Trade, Economic, Scientific, Technical, Industrial and Cultural Cooperation in establishing and enhancing trade and economic cooperation as well as cultural cooperation. It was emphasised that the meetings of Commission and established Joint Working Groups should be held regularly.

15. The two Sides shared the view that relations between the two countries had entered a new phase and a qualitatively higher level. KUWAIT*507. Media Briefing by Secretary (East) N. Ravi on Vice-President's visit to Kuwait.*New Delhi, April 2, 2009.

Director (XP) (Shri Gopal Baglay): Good afternoon friends. Welcome to the External Publicity Division of the Ministry of External Affairs for this briefing in connection with the visit of the Hon'ble Vice-President of India to Kuwait. We have with us today Shri N. Ravi, Secretary in the Ministry of External Affairs of India. Kuwait is amongst his vast and onerous responsibilities. We also have, on the Secretary's right, Shri Anil Trigunayat, the Joint Secretary dealing, with among other countries, Kuwait; and also the Joint Secretary to the Vice-President of India, Shri P. Harish. Many of you would know him from his previous responsibility as Director (XP).

May I now request Secretary (East) to make his opening remarks.

Secretary (East) (Shri N. Ravi): Thank you Gopal. Let me also extend a very warm welcome to all our friends from the media. Today we are gathered to hear a little about the forthcoming visit of Hon'ble Mohammad Hamid Ansari, Vice-President of India to Kuwait. There is a Press Release that will be given to you after the meeting is over.

The visit of the Vice-President is at the invitation of the Crown Prince His Highness Sheikh Nawas. During the visit the Vice-President would be calling on His Highness the Amir of Kuwait and will have substantive discussions with the Kuwaiti leadership. He will also be addressing the captains of Kuwaiti industry and business at the Kuwait Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

The visit commences on the 6th (April). On the day of the arrival, the Vice-President would be calling on His Highness the Amir following which the Vice-President would be hosted at lunch by his host the Crown Prince. The meetings with Ministers will take place half on the first day and the other half on the 7th (April). The Ministers that the Vice-President would be receiving are the First Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Defence, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and then the Minister of Oil, followed by the Minister of Finance. Subsequently the Vice-President would be addressing the Kuwaiti Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

The last high-level visit from Kuwait to India was in June 2006 when the Amir of Kuwait His Highness Sheikh Sabah Al-Ahmad Al-Jaber Al-Sabah was in India. This was the first visit by the Amir, since he assumed his position, to any foreign country. And since the visit of the Amir we have had two sessions of the Joint Commission between India and Kuwait - one in November 2006 followed by another in July 2008. In addition to these two sessions of the Joint Commission we have had various exchanges at the Ministerial and official levels which have sustained the momentum in our bilateral relations across many sectors.

Needless to add, the meetings that have been scheduled for the Vice-President during his stay in Kuwait would cover all bilateral and other regional issues. And, of course, mutual cooperation in all possible fields would also be discussed.

Friends, as you know, Kuwait is a part of our extended neighbourhood. Our relations with Kuwait have been very close, friendly; and most important of all, they go back many centuries. In fact, trade between Kuwait and India goes back a few hundred years. This today translates itself in a very large number of Indians who are resident in Kuwait who are contributing across all sectors of labour in different areas inside Kuwait. At last count we have just under 600,000 people of Indian origin working and living in Kuwait contributing to the economic development of Kuwait.

Kuwait is also an important member in the Gulf Cooperation Council. Among the subjects that will be discussed, apart from trade and investment of course, security in the Gulf, maritime lanes, anti-terrorism, defence, science and technology would be the main areas of focus of our cooperation. As most of you are aware, the Gulf really forms the major source for the purchase of our energy products meaning crude oil and certain other petroleum-refined products.

The energy security for India in its present economic development story is a very important element. This visit would contribute to enhancing this aspect in our bilateral relations and also in our relations with Kuwait. According to one of the records that we have, the very first Consulate ever opened by Kuwait was in Bombay, or Mumbai, after they achieved Independence. Many Kuwaitis, especially members of the royal family, have got very close linkages with India through trade and through visits, and they maintain these links even today.

Kuwait is an important trading partner. We have a bilateral trade of about $ 8.4 billion in 2007-08. It accounts for about 12 per cent of our crude oil imports. Recently the Indian Oil Corporation has renewed its contract for purchase of about nine million metric tonnes of crude and about 351 trillion cubic metres of gas from Kuwait. This gives you an idea about the importance that Kuwait has in our energy security framework. The effort during the visit would be to convert this relationship into a mutually beneficial one where the two partners can look to new areas where they can cooperate.

As I had mentioned a while back, Kuwait hosts about 580,000 Indians who work in Kuwait. Our visit is further aimed at intensifying this trade and economic cooperation through seeking more investments from Kuwait in the infrastructure. As most of you are aware, in the coming decade India can, according to one calculation, absorb as much as 500 billion dollars worth of investment from abroad.

During the forthcoming visit we hope to sign two agreements - one in the field of science and technology cooperation and another would be an educational exchange programme for the years 2009-11. This is expected to initiate functional cooperation in these areas between the respective agencies including in research and development, research projects for application, potential in medium and long term, as well as turnkey projects based on the science and technology capabilities of both countries.

Some of the areas of mutual interest that have been identified are: information and communication technology, biotechnology, small and medium enterprises entrepreneurship, alternative energy sources, and so on.

I think I will stop here and perhaps take a couple of question.

Question: You have mentioned that there are nearly six lakh Indians in Kuwait. Is there any meeting scheduled with representatives of Indian community there of the Vice-President to discuss their problems?

Secretary (East): One interaction is under consideration. During that, representatives of the Indian community would have an opportunity to meet with the Vice-President.

Question: Sir, in the context of recession, are there are concrete proposals on the table when we go there or otherwise? Are we looking for more investments from Kuwait especially in the context of global recession? Also, when we talk about security cooperation, could you amplify on terrorism and maritime security?

Secretary (East): First, in the current scenario of world recession, Kuwait happens to be a country which has got a lot of capital which can be invested and this would be one point of interest for us to encourage Kuwaiti investment into India, particularly in infrastructure sector which can absorb a lot of capital from that country. Needless to add, we have to sort of discuss the framework among officials who are concerned with this. But this point would be touched upon in the meetings. The security cooperation I am specifically referring to is basically the maritime security because a lot of India's energy imports are entirely from the Gulf into India, and it is our intention to make sure that these supplies arrive on time and at places where we desire them to without being disturbed. In this the exporting countries which are in the Gulf also have a role to play, and both sides would be discussing it at the appropriate levels to make sure that this energy security aspect is addressed in all its angles by both countries.

Question: Will the issue of terrorism also figure in the meetings Vice-President will have with the Ministers there?

Secretary (East): Terrorism is a very important element in our discussions with all world leaders because it is a matter that affects all countries of the world. Without doubt it would be discussed at the appropriate meetings by the Vice-President.

Question: Sir, with this global recession there have been reports of Indian workers being laid off in the Gulf countries. Is this problem also there in Kuwait? If it is, will it be taken up during the meetings?

Secretary (East): So far we have not got any report of any major lay-offs from Kuwait back to India or any other place.

Question: You said that the Defence Minister of Kuwait would also be meeting the Vice-President. Any defence cooperation being discussed between the two countries?

Secretary (East): Training exchanges between the two countries is an ongoing feature. In fact, there was a delegation from Kuwait which was in Delhi about a week or ten days back. The general cooperation between the two countries would be discussed during that meeting.

Question: Sir, you mentioned about the importance of Kuwait to India ... (Inaudible)... crude oil and other things also you have talked about. But we are told that a visit of any VVIP from India is taking place after 28 years. Why have there been no high-level visits from India in these many years?

Secretary (East): This visit is taking place within three years of the visit of His Highness the Amir of Kuwait. So, we are looking at it in the modern context as the various opportunities that exist to tighten the cooperation and to diversify it between the two countries. So, we are looking at it purely as a return visit for the visit of His Highness's high-level visit. Of course, more visits are planned in the future as and when it is convenient for both sides.

Question: When did the last visit take place?

Secretary (East): The one visit that did take place from India was in the 1980s when the then Prime Minister Mrs Indira Gandhi visited Kuwait.

Question: Since our relations with Kuwait are historical and very long, do you anticipate any cultural exchange between the two countries in the near future?

Secretary (East): You may recall that in early December we had an Indo-Arab Cultural Festival in which representatives from all Arab countries took part. I think FICCI organized the festival. The next round would be due in Arab countries. It is a part of the Arab League-India Exchange. So, this would form a part of our ongoing cooperation in the cultural field without doubt.

Director (XP): Thank you friends.

509. Address of Vice President M. Hamid Ansari at the Kuwait Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

Kuwait, April 7, 2009.

Excellency, Mr. Ali Mohammed Thunayan Al-Ghanim, Chairman of the Kuwait Chamber of Commerce and Industry

Distinguished Members of the KCCI

Ladies and gentlemen

I thank you for your warm words of welcome. I thank the Government of the State of Kuwait, and the Kuwait Chamber of Commerce and Industry, for the opportunity to share my thoughts with this distinguished gathering of captains of trade and industry.

Let me say at the outset that an Indian does not come to Kuwait as a stranger. The same holds for a Kuwaiti in India. Our two people have known each other for centuries and trade was the central element in their relationship. In the process, we familiarised ourselves with each other's cultures, manners and customs.

Nor is there a mystery about this relationship. We live in each other's extended neighbourhood. Mumbai to Kuwait is a distance of about 1500 nautical miles. The air distance is 2890 kilometres and the flying time is 4 hours and 15 minutes. For us in India, this is a little less than the flying time from Kashmir to Kerala.

So I come here today to continue an ongoing dialogue with friends, rather than initiate a new one with strangers. The contents of the dialogue, then and now, relate to each other's interests and requirements, capabilities and capacities, aspirations and achievements.

The centrality of the Gulf region to the economic wellbeing of the world is evident. Peace and stability are essential pre-requisites to economic activity. This translates into four propositions:

- Friendly relations and good cooperation with the states of the region
- Access to the energy resources
- Freedom of navigation and safety of sea lanes
- Access to markets for trade, technology, investments and workforce.

The states of the region, as responsible members of the international community, subscribe this approach. So does India.

Two additional factors are relevant in the case of India. The governments and the people of the region are India-friendly and Indian-friendly.

These general and specific principles form the basis of Indo-Kuwaiti bilateral cooperation.

As leaders of business and industry, you are aware of the economic transformation of India in the past decade. Our economic reforms have been premised on a calibrated, stable and sustainable process of growth that has contributed to the economic empowerment of millions of citizens, paving their way out of poverty. We look not merely at growth rates and per capita incomes, but at durable indicators of human capital.

The challenge before us is to sustain this growth in the coming two decades to eradicate poverty and bring about inclusive socio-economic development for citizens. Despite the current global crisis, we are determined to make the economy expand at a healthy rate. During the last five years our rate of growth was at an average of around 9 percent; this year it will be about 6 per cent, still one of the highest registered globally. Winds of global recession should not mean erection of new walls and protectionist barriers for trade, investments and free movement of service-providers and professionals.

From an Indian perspective, the two most important prerequisites for growth are energy security and development of infrastructure. We need to increase our primary energy supply by 3 to 4 times and electricity generation capacity and supply by five to six times to sustain a growth rate of 8 percent till the year 2030.

India is in a position to absorb US$ 500 billion investment in the next decade or so to meet the growing infrastructural needs. It is here that we see the new horizon of our engagement with the Gulf region.

Economic growth in India represents an opportunity for economies in our neighbourhood, including this region, and indeed for the global economy. The biggest opportunity is in infrastructure development where public-private partnerships are being encouraged, as the public sector alone would not be able to deliver on its own. Our rural areas have become the target areas for a massive investment in infrastructure development and connectivity enhancement. This approach also creates an employment safety-net. The government is equally committed to renewal of urban areas through a nation-wide programme of development of urban infrastructure and service delivery mechanisms.

The emergence of India has been accompanied by indigenous development and harnessing of new scientific and technological capabilities. Many of these can be fruitfully utilised by our partners and friends. These relate, in the first instance, to the knowledge based industries. Indian Information Technology companies have played a critical role in the growing e-economy and e-business across the globe and have given India a new global image. Likewise, our proven capabilities in bio-technology, pharmaceuticals and health sectors and in environmental protection and conservation could be tapped by our partners to the benefit of our peoples.

Friends

12 percent of the crude oil imported by India comes from Kuwait. The Gulf region as a whole accounts for two-third of our crude imports. We consider this critical to our energy security framework. Even with a very low per capita energy consumption amounting to a quarter of the world average, India is today the world's fifth largest energy consumer. If our economy continues to grow at 8 per cent, we would be the third largest energy consumer by 2030. The relevance of the Gulf region as a whole and of Kuwait in particular, for our energy security would thus increase considerably.

India's relations with Kuwait and the GCC countries are based on the fundamental premise that the Gulf region is part of our natural area of economic interaction. In recent years, we have crafted and implemented a new Look East Policy relating principally to the ASEAN group. This is to be supplemented with a "Look-West" policy reflecting our commitment to strengthen our relations with the Gulf countries. We have had intensive negotiations for achieving an India-GCC Free Trade Agreement. It is our hope that this would be concluded at the earliest to mutual benefit.

Friends

High level exchanges between our countries provide a platform for renewing relations and exploring new avenues for mutual cooperation. The official visit to India in June 2006 by the Amir, His Highness Sheikh Sabah Al-Ahmad Al-Jaber Al-Sabah, provided a fresh impetus to our bilateral relationship.

An important outcome of this has been the impressive growth in bilateral trade that has reached US$ 8.4 billion in 2007-2008. In the wider regional context, GCC is the largest single origin of imports into India and the second largest destination for exports from India. There is nevertheless considerable scope for further expansion in trade.

Over the years India has become a major source of professionals, skilled and semi-skilled workers to Kuwait and other GCC countries. Currently, more than 4.5 million Indians are contributing to the economic development process in the GCC countries. Within Kuwait, the presence of a large Indian community constitutes a vital aspect of our bilateral ties. It is particularly satisfying that they have acquired a reputation for hard work, efficiency, and being disciplined and law-abiding.

A significant untapped area for cooperation pertains to foreign direct and portfolio investments. Fertiliser production, for instance, offers opportunity for Kuwaiti businessmen and investors wanting to safeguard their investments in these troubled times and earn a profitable return on such investments. Fertilisers and sources of energy such as oil and LNG are inseparably linked. We are encouraging joint venture projects for production of urea near the source of gas/LNG so that cost of feedstock is minimal. Thereafter, long term buy back arrangements with India ensure the financial profitability of such joint ventures. The success of the Oman India Fertiliser Company is a vindication of this approach. Such Indian investments in Kuwait would further strengthen our relations, and promote investments, economic and employment opportunities for Kuwaiti citizens.

I therefore urge Kuwaiti investors to explore opportunities in the production of fertilisers for dedicated supply to India.

Friends,

One objective friends should be cooperation for mutual prosperity. I am confident that the India-Kuwait relationship would blossom in the years to come and there would be more intensive commercial and trade engagement and more investments made by businessmen and industrialists*.

Thank you once again for the warm welcome that you have extended to me and my delegation.

* The Hindu correspondent based in West Asia quoting Diplomatic sources said that India and Kuwait aligned their perceptions on the global economic slowdown and the regional tensions generated in the Gulf nation's volatile neighbourhood during the Vice President's visit. Kuwait was of the view that a return to the surging oil prices of the past would deepen the global recession, and that was not in the long-term interest of the oil-producing nations. It said Iran, Gulf security and terrorism featured prominently in the talks. On Iran, Kuwait was of the view that it was better to engage with Iran rather than pursue a path of confrontation. Consequently, Kuwait is supporting the recent attempt by U.S. President Barack Obama to reach out to Iran. Kuwait hoped that the situation in neighbouring Iraq would stabilise, despite the declaration by the Americans that they would exit from Iraq and step up their force strength in Afghanistan. Through its high-capacity port facilities, Kuwait could help in transiting Indian goods into Iraq. Both sides expressed concern over the destabilising impact of terrorism. The paper quoting official sources said the two countries were ready to consider all aspects related to counter-terrorism, including intelligence-sharing. The report further added the discussions were held on ensuring maritime security that would allow unimpeded transit of oil tankers carrying crude from the Gulf towards India. The same diplomatic sources said these talks were held in the larger context of Gulf security that would involve all the six countries of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC): Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates (UAE) and Oman. During the Vice President's visit, Kuwait expressed its commitment to invest in India's infrastructure, especially in power distribution, airport and port development projects.

Kuwait's Finance Minister and the head of the Kuwait Investment Authority (KIA) told Mr. Ansari that Kuwait had already made modest portfolio investments in India. The Hindu report further quoting sources said Kuwait has shown greater inclination to invest in India after Kuwaiti investors lost heavily on their real estate investments, especially in the neighbouring recession-hit Gulf countries.

PALESTINE*510. Statement by Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs on Gaza situation.*New Delhi, January 9, 2009.

The deteriorating situation in Gaza has drawn the attention of the Government of India and the plight of the population has become heart rending. The daily time table of a three hour cease fire does not appear to be producing any favourable change in the situation. The situation on the energy front appears extremely grim as nearly three-fourths of the Gaza population is now without any electricity and the prospects with no fuel oil available appear even more serious. The situation on the food front in Gaza is no better. Some 750,000 people are without access to food.

It is indeed strange that while talks are going on in Cairo among representatives of all concerned under the guidance of the French and the Egyptian officials, there is no sign of sorrow or concern about the plight of the million and half Gazan civilians living in a permanent state of fright.

The Government of India looks forward to an early end to the suffering of the people of Gaza and a return to a dialogue and resumption of the peace process

* The statement was referring to the deteriorating situation in the Gaza as a result of the Israel attack and it's rejection of the call by the United Nations Security Council for an immediate ceasefire. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said at the end of a security Cabinet meeting on January 9 that the U.N. plan was "unworkable." He said the military would continue with its operations, citing the fresh salvo of Palestinian rockets that were fired into Israel from Gaza on same day. "The firing of rockets this morning only goes to show that the U.N. decision is unworkable and will not be adhered to by the murderous Palestinian organisations," he said in a statement. Mr. Olmert's office said Israel "has never agreed to let an external body decide its right to protect the security of its citizens." Israeli air raids and ground assaults on January 9 killed at least 12 Palestinians. Palestinian doctors said six Gaza residents of the same family were killed when tanks shelled a house in Beit Lahiya, north of the Strip. An Israeli military spokesman said the air force attacked 50 targets overnight. The Palestinian group Hamas, which has been battling the Israelis in Gaza since December 27, too rejected the Security Council's ceasefire resolution. Osama Hamdan, representative of Hamas in Lebanon, said the resolution did not affect Hamas as it had been drafted without consultations with the group contrary to the U.N. resolution, and another plan being drafted by Egypt and France, Hamas supports an alternative proposal authored jointly by Syria and Turkey, the London based Palestinian daily, Al Quds Al Arabi said.

Meanwhile another peace effort by Turkey and Syria was afoot which was said to feature the following points: The joint cessation of fire by Israel and Hamas, and Sharm El Sheikh (Egypt), July 13, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for this opportunity to address this important committee. Although this is the first occasion I do so, I carry with me the happy thought that we began our work following the decision to constitute the Committee on Palestine at the 7th Summit of the Non-aligned Movement held in New Delhi in 1983.

When the Committee last met in Havana in April 2009, India renewed its commitment to the just cause of the Palestinian people and, indeed, to seeking progress in all tracks of the Middle East Peace Process.

The world has witnessed the Israeli incursion into Gaza, with all its attendant casualties, mainly of innocent civilians, including a large number of children and women, destruction of civilian infrastructure and further misery for a population already under occupation.

India condemned those developments. We are disappointed, also, at the lack of progress in the peace process and the encouragement that stalemate provides to the expansion of Israeli settlements on occupied Palestinian territories, including in Jerusalem.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to express our appreciation to the Government of Egypt for inviting India to the donors' conference held here in Sharm el-Sheikh on 2 March, 2009. I am pleased to announce that in keeping with India's response at Tehran to the presentation of the distinguished Foreign Minister of Palestine to this Committee, regarding the need for additional budgetary support, which were taken forward in discussions the immediate withdrawal of the Israeli Army from the Gaza Strip. It also called upon both sides to reaffirm their commitment to the truce agreement that they had signed in June 2008. Besides, it advocated the formation of a special international committee to monitor the Gaza Strip's border crossing points. The initiative also supported the convening of an international donors conference, so that adequate funds were available for Gaza's reconstruction. It supported Turkey's prominent role as a mediator between Hamas and Israel in future negotiations; a role that Egypt was performing till then.

between His Excellency, President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh in New Delhi in October, 2008, India has since concretized its pledges. In this regard, a sum equivalent to $ 10 million was transferred in March, 2009 as budget support to the Palestine National Authority.

I am equally pleased that the Palestine Embassy in New Delhi built as a gift of the Government and people of India is almost complete.

These exemplify India's continuing commitment to Palestine.

Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity to renew India's commitment to the work of this Committee, confident that under your guidance, we would contribute in ever-larger measure to the work of the Movement in support of the Palestinian people.

Thank you.

He (Prime Minister) met with President of the Palestinian National Authority Mahmoud Abbas for quite sometime. They discussed the situation in Palestine, in the Middle-East; and also talked of India's longstanding ties with the Palestinian people, what we have done, what we hope to do with them in the years to come. It was a very warm and friendly conversation. They have known each other for sometime. One of the things that was mentioned was the need, which President Abbas had picked up from Prime Minister's speech, to impart skills to young people, giving them the ability to go out and get jobs, work in today's world. He was very keen that we build on that idea. So, we will be working with the PNA to try and do that. President Abbas was still hoping that there would be progress in terms of the peace process itself, but he was not underestimating the difficulties. The Prime Minister reiterated our traditional position of support and commitment to the Palestinian cause, to the two States living side by side in peace and in security.

It has been decided to increase India's contribution to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) to $1 million. UNRWA is marking its 60th Anniversary this year and the enhanced contribution is in keeping with India's consistent and principled support for the people of Palestine. Minister of State for External Affairs Dr. Shashi Tharoor has, in a letter to the Commissioner General of UNRWA, Ms. Karen AbuZayd, conveyed the decision regarding this enhanced contribution. In January 2009, in response to an UNRWA Flash Appeal, the Government of India had made a special assistance of $1 million for relief work in Gaza Strip.

Chief Representative, League of Arab States Mission, Dr. Ahmed Salem Saleh Al-Wahishi

Director General of the Indian Council of World Affairs, Shri Sudhir Devare

Excellencies, distinguished invitees,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am greatly honoured to be here today amidst this august gathering to mark the important occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People. All of us present here, representing diverse nations, in our own ways are here to express solidarity with the people of Palestine in their struggle for their legitimate rights. Our gestures of support also convey that it is in the interest of the entire international community that a just and comprehensive solution can be achieved resulting in a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine living within secure and recognized borders with East Jerusalem as its Capital, side by side and at peace with the State of Israel, as endorsed in the Quartet Road Map and the United Nations Security Council Resolutions 1397 & 1515. India has also supported the Arab Peace Plan as outlined in the 2002 Arab Summit held in Beirut and the 2007 Arab Summit in Riyadh. In line with its backing of the UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, India supports a negotiated solution to the West Asian conflict, which, it is convinced, is essentially political in nature and cannot be resolved by force.

As a responsible member of the international community and as a country with long-established ties with West Asia, India also desires to see a resolution to tensions in the region through dialogue. Continued expansion of settlements is not helpful to the resumption of the peace process. We hope to see early resumption of negotiations. We are concerned and welcome efforts to invigorate the peace process. Although we do not play a role as such in the peace process as we have not been requested to do so, we have vital stakes in the process and in the West Asian region. India is closely monitoring the developments in the region which is also home to more than 4.5 million Indians and as Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru said in 1958 in a speech in the Lok Sabha, our "approach is not inimical to any country there".

Excellencies,

Palestine has always occupied a special place in the hearts of my countrymen. India's solidarity with the Palestinian people and its approach to the Palestinian question were guided by that apostle of peace, Mahatma Gandhi, and the struggle that he inspired for our independence. As early as in 1936, the Congress Working Committee sent greetings to Palestine and 27 September, 1936 was observed in India as Palestine Day. The 1939 Session of the Indian National Congress adopted a Resolution on Palestine and looked forward to the emergence of an independent democratic state in Palestine in which the rights of all communities would be protected. Our former Prime Minister Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru was a passionate advocate of the rights of the Palestinian people.

India was the first non-Arab State to recognize the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people in 1975 and in 1988 became one of the first countries to recognize the State of Palestine. India opened its Representative Office in Palestine in 1996 in Ramallah following the establishment of the Palestinian National Authority.

India has always stood by the Palestinian people in pursuit of their legitimate goals and their efforts aimed at economic and social development with dignity and self reliance. Since the opening of the Representative Office in Ramallah, India has also extended material assistance to the Palestinian National Authority. Such assistance has been utilized for humanitarian relief, development projects, establishment of educational and training facilities, budgetary support and so on. India has been proud to be involved with training a large number of Palestinian officials from economic, industrial and financial sectors and special courses for Palestinian diplomats have been conducted at our Foreign Service Institute. As you may be aware, this year the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, UNRWA, is celebrating its 60th anniversary. India has increased its annual contribution from twenty thousand dollars to one million dollars. I am also happy to note that the Palestinian Embassy Building in New Delhi is nearing completion. The foundation stone of the Building was laid in the presence of Hon'ble Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and His

Ladies and gentlemen,

Before I conclude, I would like to commend the Indian Council for World Affairs for organizing this event to mark the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People. In a message for the occasion organized at the United Nations in New York, the Prime Minister has said that India remains convinced that lasting peace in the region will contribute to global stability and prosperity. As Amb. Aziz has mentioned to us, no one quantifies the costs of the absence of peace in this vital region.

Thank you all also for being here today. I am looking forward to hearing the poetry of the late great Palestinian poet Mahmood Darwish of whom I am a great fan. But I will end with the words of another late Palestinian writer, my friend, Edward Said, who wrote in his essay "Overlapping Territories, Intertwined Histories", "Just as none of us is outside or beyond geography, none of us is completely free from the struggle over geography. That struggle is complex and interesting because it is not only about soldiers and cannons but also about ideas, about forms, about images and imaginings". Let us pay tribute to the idea of a free, secular, democratic Palestine that has featured in the "imaginings" of so many for the last six decades.

Thank you!

TAJIKISTAN*520. Speech by President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the inauguration of India - Tajikistan Business Forum.*Dushanbe, September 6, 2009.

Your Excellency President Rahmon,

Excellencies,

Members of the Indian and Tajik Business Delegations,

I am delighted to be here along with my friend and gracious host, President Rahmon of Tajikistan, to jointly address the India-Tajikistan Business Forum. We are united in our wish to build a strong economic and trade partnership between India and Tajikistan. I especially thank the Tajik Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Confederation of Indian Industries and our other trade organizations who have worked hard to realize this event.

It is a matter of satisfaction that our trade grew nearly 40% last year. However, we cannot overlook the fact that the total volume of direct trade is small at just around US $ 30 million. There is greater potential and we need to increase our trade. I am pleased that a number of small and medium Indian companies have opened operations in Dushanbe and a few Indian investments have also been made in Tajikistan. It is a good beginning which needs to be built upon. We have a legal framework in place in the form of Bilateral Investment Promotion Agreement signed in December 1995 and the Double Taxation Avoidance Agreement signed in November 2008. Our two countries enjoy excellent political, cultural and defence relations. Our trade and economic relations should also reflect this reality. I would, therefore, call on the businessmen to explore opportunities and you can be confident that you have the support of both Governments in this regard.

Our steady economic growth, combined with an extremely diversified agriculture and industrial base makes us an ideal partner for Tajikistan. We have quality goods, innovative ideas and appropriate technology to trade and share with our friends in Tajikistan. India's large pool of trained and skilled manpower offers attractive possibilities for forging beneficial partnerships in diverse areas.

Indian businesses are increasingly investing around the globe. It is natural that they should also take a look at our neighbourhood. It is not without reason that Tajikistan sat on the cross roads of the fabled Silk Route. Tajikistan offers some natural advantages as it is surrounded by neighbours with large populations and markets. Investors from India and Tajikistan can consider opportunities for bilateral investment in a number of promising areas and these include agriculture, mining, transport and infrastructure, hydropower as well as health and education. Agriculture, horticulture, fruits and vegetables, poultry and dairy are yet other areas where small and medium enterprises can flourish. Tajikistan's bilingual youth presents an opportunity for Indian IT companies which may be looking at new and emerging markets.

Tajikistan possesses a huge untapped hydropower potential. The challenge is to use this supply to cater to the demand for energy in South Asia, including India.

No doubt, establishment of direct air link is an urgent requirement for enabling greater people to people contacts, development of tourism and attracting investment. All of you have taken a circuitous route to reach Dushanbe even though the flying time from Delhi to Dushanbe is the same as Delhi to Kolkata. This lack of connectivity is a gap that needs to be filled quickly.

Our business leaders would be interacting over two days. I urge them to identify mutually beneficial areas for partnership. I am confident that given our combined will and your spirit of enterprise you would be successful in realizing our goals. I wish you success in your deliberations.

Thank you.

522. Speech of President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the State banquet hosted in her honour by the President of the Republic of Tajikistan Emomali Rahmon.

Dushanbe, September 7, 2009.

Your Excellency President Rahmon,

Distinguished Guests,

It is indeed a great pleasure to be in the breathtakingly beautiful city of Dushanbe - a city so reminiscent of its linkages to the East and West, located not far from the famous Silk Road. The links between India and Tajikistan, I am sure, can be traced back to many centuries. In fact, in some ways the sights of Dushanbe remind us of our own homeland and it does not seem foreign. The affection and warmth of your people is so overwhelming and I am touched by the kindness and hospitality extended to me and to the Members of my delegation.

I am very happy to learn that Dushanbe is one of the rapidly growing commercial, cultural and industrial centers of Tajikistan. We are aware of the difficult times faced by your country in the 1990s. However, it is a matter of pride that the people of Tajikistan with their determination and dedication have brought about the resurgence and impressive economic progress of their nation. Mahatma Gandhi had said 'Strength does not come from winning. Your struggles develop your strengths. When you go through hardships and decide not to surrender, that is strength'. Having struggled for our own independence and, thereafter, embarking on the path of nation building, we understand your achievements are by no means small or meager. We congratulate the people of Tajikistan on the progress attained and Your Excellency for your vision and your stewardship.

India and the countries of Central Asia have always been close neighbours. Since remote antiquity the two regions have been connected by trade routes across the Himalayas and the Pamir mountains. This movement of peoples and ideas is the foundation of the cultural relations that exist even today. One of the most valuable contributions of Tajikistan to India in the medieval times is Sufi thought and philosophy. The shrine of Sayyid Ali Hamadani at Kulab in Southern Tajikistan is a testimony to this rich legacy and is frequented by Indians as pilgrimage. I will be visiting the shrine tomorrow and pay my homage. He was very influential and had a major contribution in shaping the culture of the Kashmir Valley. The sublime poetry of Mirza Abdul Qadir Bedil is revered in India as in Tajikistan. These influences find a reflection in our ethos of inclusiveness, pluralism and tolerance even today, as we blend the traditional with the modern and take pride in unity in diversity.

Excellency,

India since its independence has made tremendous progress. India is today the fourth largest economy in the world in terms of purchasing power parity.

Despite the global impact of the recent economic crisis, which affected India also, India remains among the fastest growing economies of the world. We will continue to work for higher growth rates. To achieve this, a peaceful extended neighbourhood and a supportive international environment remains our fundamental foreign policy objective. India, as a responsible power, does and will engage actively with the world, while pursuing an independent and non-aligned foreign policy of peace and development.

India has gained entrepreneurial experience over the years in many areas which could be of relevance to the development of Tajikistan. These include mining, metallurgy, engineering, automobiles and consumer goods. There have been some success stories of Indian investments in the region in the textile, metals and construction sectors, which could be replicated. Cooperation in such sectors as leather, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, finance, capital markets and services can be explored. Besides, India offers a large market for all our neighbours. We need to identify ways of enhancing trade flows, which depend on physical connectivities, banking linkages, governmental regulation and administrative procedures. It would be in our common interest to promote these connectivities and inter-linkages amongst us. It is heartening to note that steps are being taken by both India and Tajikistan to expand and strengthen economic cooperation.

The visit of Your Excellency to India in August 2006 provided an impetus to our bilateral ties. India and Tajikistan are friends foremost and this friendship knows no bounds. Both our nations have strived to preserve the essence and spirit of this bond. I am optimistic that the future holds great promise for our continued closeness and I end with a couplet by Tajik poet, Mirzo Tursunzoda, on friendship:-

To tavoni doostonro goom makoon, Doostoni mehrubonro goom makoon.

which can be translated as -

Do not lose friends that you have,
Especially your affectionate and compassionate friends.

With this thought, Distinguished Guests, please join me in raising a toast to:

- the good health of his Excellency President Rahmon,
- a vibrant India-Tajikistan friendship; and
- peace and prosperity of the friendly people of Tajikistan.

Thank you.

523. Speech by President Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the National Day celebrations of Tajikistan.

Dushanbe, September 8, 2009.

H.E. President Emomali Rahmon

Excellencies,

Dear people of Tajikistan and fellow citizens of India.

I am delighted to be here today in beautiful Tajikistan. It is a matter of great pride and satisfaction to be celebrating the 18th Independence Day of Tajikistan with you all.

I bring to you all greetings and best wishes from the Government and more than one billion people of India. I also wish to extend to you the greetings for the holy month of Ramadan.

The close historical and cultural links between Tajikistan and India are well known to you. Since my arrival here two days ago, I have been struck by the extent of similarity between our two countries and its people. It feels like a homecoming.

I will describe my feelings in a couplet from a famous Indian poet:

All the houses look the same, the people too,

In an unknown city nothing appears unfamiliar

India and Tajikistan have shared the same political and cultural space in the past. These old links were frozen in time due to our respective histories. However, now both the Governments are working ceaselessly to re-establish these multifaceted links. We are happy that our bilateral relations are in an excellent state and we share mutual respect, trust, love and confidence.

At the same time by working together both our nations can be successful, just as yesterday when an Indian and Tajik joint mountaineering team scaled the Gulab Kangri Peak. I congratulate the team. I am all the more happy that this feat was achieved on the eve of Tajikistan's Independence Day.

I also wish to state that the book, "Tajikistan in the Mirror of History" (Tajik Itihas Ke Darpan Mein) written by President Rahmon, which has recently been translated will help in the understanding between our nations. I thank him for the efforts he has made.

Tajikistan is an old civilization, but a young nation. The process of nation building offers opportunities and challenges. I congratulate the people of Tajikistan for all their achievements in the last 18 years. Nation building involves joint effort of Governments and each child, woman and man, all of whom have to make a contribution.

The Tajik people have already shown their maturity and sagacity. You are an example of bringing to an end differences in society through peaceful negotiations and dialogue. I congratulate the people of Tajikistan, H.E. President Rahmon and the Government. Continuing peace is a pre-requisite for moving forward on the road to prosperity.

India wishes to see Tajikistan as a prosperous, progressive and peaceful country. We live in each others' extended neighbourhood. We rejoice in your success.

As I leave Tajikistan today, it will be the warmth of the friendship I have received from all of you that I will always cherish. I conclude with a verse written by the famous Tajik poet Rudaki:

"Hez shodi nest andar in zahon Behtar az didori rui duston"

Translated as:

"Nothing is more joyful in the world than meeting with friends"

Long live India-Tajikistan friendship!

Salamat Boshed

524. Statement of President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil on her way back to New Delhi after completing her State Visits to Russia and Tajikistan.

On Board the Special Aircraft, September 8, 2009.

We are returning to New Delhi at the completion of my State visits to Russia and Tajikistan. Our journeys to these friendly countries have been purposeful and productive, reflecting the deep rooted friendship we have with them.

When we left New Delhi, I had stated that we are visiting time tested friends. You too would have felt the warmth of hospitality and the affection that was displayed in the two countries.

My first State Visit to Russia was the second by an Indian President to that country. I visited both Moscow and St. Petersburg. I met President H.E. Mr. Dmitry Medvedev in the Kremlin in an atmosphere of trust and friendship, reflecting the Strategic Partnership between our two countries. We both acknowledged that the enduring relationship between India and Russian Federation has been marked by continuity, trust and mutual understanding. We reviewed ongoing bilateral cooperation in various fields and discussed ways and means to further diversifying and strengthening our engagement. We also exchanged views on regional and international issues of importance.

We noted with satisfaction the regular contacts between the political leadership of the two countries, particularly the practice of the Annual Summit meetings. My visit was thus a further consolidation of these contacts and a reiteration that links with Russia are special for India, which have strengthened across the twentieth into the twenty first century and across a generation.

On Wednesday 3rd September, we both attended the Gala Concert of Indian classical singing and folk and contemporary dances of India held under the auspices of the ongoing Year of India festival in Russia.

I also met Prime Minister H.E. Mr. Vladimir Putin. I conveyed to him that India really appreciated Russia's support in the economic, energy, defence and nuclear fields and that our relationship stood on its own, it had strong foundations and would not be affected by our relationship with other countries. He spoke in detail about the potential of co-operation, especially in energy.

The other leaders I met were the Chairman of the Federation Council and the Chairman of the State Duma. In St. Petersburg, I had meetings with President's Representative to the North-Western region and the Acting Governor of St. Petersburg. With these leaders too, my talks were invigorating and warm. Among the issues we discussed were the establishment of regular inter-Parliamentary exchanges and institutionalization of the mechanism of contacts between the executive and judicial bodies, and promoting co-operation across multiple fields. Our two countries are agreed that there is ample potential for expansion of cooperation in the fields of energy - including hydrocarbons and peaceful uses of nuclear energy, military technical cooperation, space and information technology.

The subject of bilateral trade came up on several occasions. We expressed satisfaction that the target of US$ 10 billion by 2010 appeared achievable despite the ongoing global financial crisis. We agreed that the existing level of bilateral economic cooperation was much below its potential given the size of our two economies.

I was also delighted to meet the teachers and students of the Embassy of India School in Moscow as well as the Russian school teaching Hindi in St. Petersburg on the eve of and on Teachers' Day itself respectively. I believe that teachers play a very important role in shaping the future of the nation and their contribution needs to be acknowledged and appreciated. I must say that these schools are doing very good work in imparting education and teaching children about Indian culture and values. The manner in which Russian students sang Indian songs and performed Indian classical dances was, indeed, extremely commendable. It is important that all efforts are made to develop linkages between the youth of our two countries, so that ties between India and the Russian Federation which are special, enduring and founded on civilizational and historical ties are carried forward.

Tajikistan remains an important partner for us in the Central Asian region which is our extended neighbourhood. While Tajikistan is a young nation, it is an old civilization and we have a number of common strands in our centuries old ties. My visit, the first ever by an Indian President to Tajikistan, has only renewed these age old ties. We were received with exceptional warmth. It was a historic moment when I got the opportunity to address the people of Tajikistan on their National Day and convey to them the greetings and best wishes of the people and Government of India for their progress and prosperity.

I had fruitful exchange of views on global and regional issues with President Rahmon, whom I have had the pleasure of hosting in Jaipur in August 2006. While reiterating our commitment to build on our close and cooperative relations, we have identified new areas for further diversifying our cooperation. I stated our commitment to assist Tajikistan in its efforts at nation building through sharing our experiences in human resource development, in agriculture, science and technology, Information Technology, health and education and in the areas of youth and sports. We both agreed on the need for establishing direct air links between New Delhi and Dushanbe. In response to an invitation extended, Tajikistan agreed to participate in the India International Garment Fair to be held in New Delhi in January 2010.

I understand that the trade delegation that traveled with me had fruitful discussions with their counterparts in Tajikistan and this is expected to lead to concrete outcomes. We would like to see a strong and vibrant trade and economic relationship, which reflects the close relations we share with Tajikistan in other spheres.

I visited Kuliob today to pay homage at the shrine of Sufi Saint Syed Hamadoni. He represents the ethos of tolerance and harmony that our two countries and societies are based on. Our visit there and the genuine manner in which we were greeted by both the old and young of Kuliob was a moving experience and an affirmation that the ancient ties continue to find resonance in our relationship, while contributing to the strengthening of our emotional bonds.

The Park dedicated to Mahatma Gandhi in Dushanbe illustrates the universal appeal of his principle of non-violence for maintaining peace in the world. I visited the Park and got the opportunity to thank the Government of Tajikistan for maintaining the park. I also saw the reclining Buddha at the Antiquities Museum yet another reminder of the common heritage of our two countries.

Russia and Tajikistan share the firm resolve of India to fight extremism and terrorism in the region. I thanked my interlocutors for their messages of support and condemnation of the Mumbai terrorist attacks. Our cooperation in this area will only grow in the months ahead.

Both in Russia and Tajikistan the desire of the leadership to build close and cooperative relations with India were clearly manifested. I was delighted to meet the members of the Indian community and friends of India in both countries, particularly the sizeable group of Indian students. We are proud of our diaspora's achievements. I was also impressed by the local students in both countries learning Hindi, Indian music and dance.

I had the pleasure of extending invitations to President Medvedev and President Rahmon to visit India. These invitations have been accepted and mutually convenient dates will be worked out through diplomatic channels. These visits would enable us to sustain the momentum of our ever increasing relations.

I return home satisfied with the visits and the outcomes. I also come back with the firm impression that there are many areas where there can be mutually beneficial co-operation. Given the immense possibilities, I am confident that existing sectors of co-operation would be strengthened further and new areas including energy needs, identified.

I express my deep gratitude to each one of you, members of the media, for accompanying me on my visit. I would like to say that you have been very good traveling companions and I hope you have enjoyed the visit as much as I have.

Thank you.

529. Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on the detention of the UAE Air Force Aircraft at Kolkata.

New Delhi, September 8, 2009.

The UAE Embassy had sought clearance for over flying and landing of their Air Force flight at Kolkata Airport en route to Xianyang, China. The flight arrived from Abu Dhabi at Kolkata Airport on 6th September 2009. The Captain of the flight Major Ibrahim Alshamsei filed a declaration to the Customs stating that the flight was carrying arms/ammunition/explosives. However, since at the time of initial application, no mention of the arms and ammunition was made, the authorities at Kolkata Airport detained the aircraft for further investigation. Accordingly, after the concurrence of the pilot-in-command of the aircraft, the Custom Officials entered the aircraft to inquire about the nature of cargo.

The UAE authorities both here and in Abu Dhabi have since formally regretted the omission in clearly indicating items carried by the aircraft and have described it as a 'technical error'. They have also provided details about the cargo which consists of Combat Missile.

In the light of the above, the matter will be resolved in the spirit of the close and friendly ties between India and the UAE, and we will facilitate early release of the aircraft.

(The flight was later allowed to leave after the verification of all the relevant facts.)

532. Address by External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee at India-Africa Business Partnership Summit.

New Delhi, January 19, 2009.

Your Excellency, Hon'ble Mr. Paul Kagame, President of the Republic of Rwanda and Chairman of the East African Community

Distinguished Ministers from Cape Verde, Chad, Congo, Democratic Republic of Congo, Zambia, Mali, Gabon, Ivory Coast, Kenya, Mozambique, Senegal, Uganda and Eretria

My Colleague, Shri Jairam Ramesh

Shri Nalin Surie, Secretary(West), Ministry of External Affairs

Shri Hardeep Puri, Secretary(Economic Relations), Ministry of External Affairs

Dr. Amit Mitra, Secretary General, FICCI

Delegates from Africa, Captains of Industry

Distinguished Guests, Media representatives

Ladies & Gentlemen:

In any gathering with delegates from Africa, I cannot, but admit, the feeling that it is a meeting of old friends!

I extend a very warm welcome to you all and extend my very best wishes for 2009. May the New Year spread peace, prosperity and goodwill and fulfill all your aspirations.

Excellencies & Ladies and Gentlemen, it is less than a year since we had the privilege to host the India-Africa Forum Summit in New Delhi. It was an occasion to celebrate our friendship and renew our commitment to the great continent of Africa. The Delhi Declaration and the Africa- India Framework for Cooperation adopted at the Summit now serve as the contours for our systematic engagement in the coming years.

India's ties with Africa are historic. Trade across the Indian Ocean has linked us for hundreds of years. We were fellow victims of colonialism in the 19th and 20th century. We inspired each other in the resolve to resist and defeat the forces of imperialism. Our shared kinship rejoiced every time a blow was struck by the Afro-Asian liberation movement. We have seen and shared a difficult past. It is only natural if we now choose to consolidate national gains and work together towards a prosperous future.

Excellencies, India and Africa are old civilizations but young nations learning as we grow. Today the Indian economy is over a trillion dollars with key strengths in the services, manufacturing and agricultural sectors. We have also made some advances in the core areas of health and education. Capacity building and human resources development in fact, have always been central to our cooperation with Africa since our independence. Success credited to us in economic growth and development areas is, as always, available for sharing with friends in Africa, within the limits of our capacities and capabilities. Our commitment to Africa is total and we look forward to a close partnership with Africa in its economic resurgence.

I would like to congratulate Dr. Mitra and his colleagues in FICCI for organizing this important Business Summit. Our appreciation also goes out to our distinguished guests and delegates from Africa for responding in fulsome measure to this event. I would also like to acknowledge the gracious presence of our very special guest, the President of Rwanda. Friends, a packed programme awaits you. I am pleased to see that sectors at the core of economic development and growth including - Railways, Road and Construction; Healthcare and Pharma; ICT; Power; Mining; and, Agriculture - have been carefully identified and selected for this summit.

For this to happen, trade, tariff and investment impediments will have to be vacated in a hurry. In this context, and as announced earlier, our "Duty-free preference scheme" for the Least Developed Countries, 34 of which are African countries, covers 94% of India's total tariff lines. It is also our commitment to more than double the amount on Lines of Credit to US$ 5.4 billion for the five-year period beginning 2008-09. US$ 500 million will also be provided over the next 5 to 6 years for projects in critical areas from the 'Aid to Africa' budget.

Ladies & Gentlemen, economic and commercial ties between India and Africa are not new. These exchanges have been ongoing for centuries across the Indian Ocean, and have benefited peoples from both sides. With positive changes and sustained economic development in both India and Africa, this economic and commercial interaction has diversified and deepened since the later part of the 20th century. Bilateral trade has grown from a small 5 billion dollars in 2001-02 to around 30 billion dollars presently, a six-fold growth. Investment levels have also increased across a wide range of sectors such as agriculture, small scale industry, mining, ICT, oil pipelines, automotive plants, chemical industry, power generation and transmission etc.. You will agree, however, that these existing trade and investment levels do not reflect the true potential. Less than 8% of India's exports are destined for Africa. Our imports from Africa are also around the same proportion of our global imports. After Asia, Africa is the second fastest growing region. We have signed trade agreements with almost 30 countries in Africa. I, therefore, call upon Indian and African business partners to step up their business engagements. Indian companies should accelerate their investments and technical tie-ups with African partners. Cost-effective and intermediate Indian technologies and our large human capital base give us a unique advantage.

The infrastructure needs of Africa are enormous. These also present good opportunities for Indian businesses, as do the growing demands in Africa for new technologies, engineering services and manufacturing capabilities for local value addition. There are millions of young people in Africa who can be employed in the manufacturing and services sectors. The communities of Indian origin in many parts of Africa are also an added advantage.

An important area of cooperation between India and Africa has been agriculture and food security. The India Africa Forum Summit laid a special emphasis on this sector. The Declaration of the India-Africa Framework for Cooperation involves programmes for agriculture. These include irrigation projects, opening up new lands for cultivation, exchange of seeds, technology, food processing, live stock development, water management, measures to confront the growing threat of climate change, capacity building and fisheries. Some Indian companies have already begun to explore opportunities in Africa in the production of pulses, cereals and oilseeds. I am confident that more will do so in collaboration with African enterprises and Governments. A number of Lines of Credit have already been extended by us for the agriculture sector. These should provide opportunities to Indian and African partners to undertake projects which will be of direct benefit to farming communities.

We are also exploring possibilities of comprehensive economic cooperation agreements with the Common Market of Southern Africa (COMESA) and the East African Community (EAC). We are, therefore, specially delighted and honoured to have among us today, President Paul Kagame of Rwanda, who is also the current Chairperson of the East African Community.

A draft framework agreement was recently initialed in Delhi for a Preferential Trading Arrangement with the South African Customs Union (SACU). With the South African Development Community (SADC), we are developing projects in a number of sectors.

These are fast changing times. In less than six months, a severe global financial crisis has morphed into global economic meltdown which may not have fully unraveled as yet. The repercussions are undoubtedly severe. While the crisis began in the West, the developing countries cannot remain unscathed. Estimates are that global growth and trade may grow at the slowest in over two decades. The financial regulatory framework in many countries will change as will economic expectations. It is no surprise that the model of international financial governance has also come into question.

The current crisis brings out global interconnectedness. India has over the last few years grown at about 9 percent per year which gave us the distinction of being the world's second fastest growing major economy of the world. Our economy is also exposed to the global market, and will therefore, not escape some slowdown. We are, however, better positioned to withstand the worst. Our economic fundamentals are principally domestic demand, domestic savings and investments. Indeed, India is one of the world's safest markets. We are confident that a 7 percent growth is not beyond us this year and that it shall not be long before we fully regain our growth momentum. We see our growth and development as an open opportunity for mutual gains with our African associates.

Friends, India-Africa relations have always been multi-focused, cutting across many international issues and challenges. It is our desire that on crucial global concerns like climate change, food and energy security, health, jihadist terrorism, marine piracy and democratization of international institutions we continue to enhance our cooperation and dialogue.

In conclusion, let me extend my very best wishes for a productive Summit. May the ensuing two-days of deliberations and business engagements give wing to our bilateral commercial ties.

I wish the India-Africa Business Partnership Summit all success. Jai Hind!

534. Press Release of the Ministry of External Affairs on the inauguration of the Government of India's Pan-African e-Network Project by External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee.

New Delhi, February 26, 2009.

One more significant and shining chapter in the history of India-Africa relationship was added, when the Pan-African e-Network Project was inaugurated on 26th Feb 2009 by Hon'ble Shri Pranab Mukherjee, External Affairs Minister at the TCIL Bhawan in New Delhi, amidst the presence of High Commissioners and Ambassadors of African countries.

With the commissioning of the Pan-African e-Network Project, former president Dr. A P J Abdul Kalam's vision of connecting India with all 53 countries of the African Union with a satellite and fibre optic network for sharing India's expertise in education and health care, has been translated into reality.

Describing the Pan-African e-Network Project as a shining example of South-South Cooperation, the External Affairs Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee said that under this project India has gifted a dedicated satellite for e-connectivity in sub-Saharan Africa to help bridge the digital divide. The Project aims to create significant linkages for tele-education and tele-medicine, making available the facilities and expertise of some of the best universities and super-specialty hospitals in India to the people of Africa.

The Minister added that the project is also equipped to support e-governance, e-commerce, infotainment, resource mapping and meteorological and other services in the African countries, besides providing VVIP connectivity among the Heads of State of the African countries through a highly secure closed satellite network.

He said that thirty three countries have already joined this Project and more are expected to join in the course of the coming months. Eleven countries have been covered in the first phase where both the Learning Centres for tele-education and Patient-end Hospitals for tele-medicine are ready. These include: Benin, Burkina Faso, Gabon, The Gambia, Ghana, Ethiopia, Mauritius, Nigeria, Rwanda, Senegal and Seychelles.

The External Affairs Minister assured that nine more countries namely Botswana, Burundi, Cameroon, Djibouti, Egypt, Malawi, Mozambique, Niger and Uganda would be covered in the second phase by March 2009. Another nine countries, namely Comoros, Cote D'Ivoire, Democratic Republic of Congo, Eritrea, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Tanzania, Togo and Zambia, would be covered by the network as part of Phase-III by 30th June 2009.

The External Affairs Minister had a brief online interaction on bilateral matters with each of the eleven ministers individually through the network. While addressing the ministers and other dignitaries online in eleven countries where the network was inaugurated today, Shri Mukherjee exhorted the countries to take advantage of the full range of services offered by India. He also asked the remaining countries to join the project early.

Citing the success of the Government of India's pilot project on tele-education and tele-medicine in Ethiopia, as a precursor to this mega project, the Minister said that 34 Ethiopian students are pursuing MBA course from IGNOU since 2007 and would be completing their final semester in June 2009 which would entitle them to get the MBA degree from IGNOU without having to move away from their country.

The Pan-African e-Network Project was approved by the Union Cabinet on 5th July 2007 at a budgeted cost of Rs. 542.90 crores which covers the cost of supply, installation, testing and commissioning of hardware and software, end-to-end connectivity, satellite bandwidth, O&M support, and providing the tele-education and tele-medicine services to 53 African countries for 5 years. The Ministry of External Affairs is the nodal ministry for the project while Telecommunications Consultants India Limited (TCIL) is implementing the project on a turnkey basis.

The Project aims at providing tele-education services to 10,000 African students to undertake Post-Graduate, Under-Graduate, PG Diploma and Diploma and skill enabling certification courses in subjects such as Business Administration, IT, International Business, Tourism and Finance. The following seven leading universities and educational institutions of India have been associated with the Project: Amity University, Noida; University of Madras, Chennai; Indira Gandhi National Open University (IGNOU), New Delhi; Birla Institute of Technology and Science (BITS), Pilani; University of Delhi; IIT Kanpur and Indian Institute of Science (IISc.) Bengaluru.

As part of the tele-medicine services, online medical consultation will be provided for one hour every day to each participating African country for a period of 5 years in various medical disciplines such as cardiology, neurology, urology, pathology, oncology, gynecology, infectious diseases/HIV-AIDS, ophthalmology, pediatrics etc. Twelve leading Indian Super Specialty Hospitals have been associated with the Project. These are: Apollo Hospital and Sri Ram Chandra Medical College and Research Institute in Chennai; AIIMS, Escorts Heart Institute and Moolchand Hospital in New Delhi, Fortis Hospital in Noida, KEM Hospital in Mumbai, Care Hospital in Hyderabad, Amrita Institute of Medical Sciences, Kochi; Manipal Hospital and Narayan Hrudayaylaya, Bengaluru and Santosh Hospital, Ghaziabad. With the commencement of the tele-medicine services, some of the best medical specialists of India would be available for consultations online for the African patients.

Another important element of tele-medicine services is the Continuing Medical Education (CME) in various specialties which is intended to update the knowledge and upgrade the clinical skills of the practicing physicians and paramedical staff in the African countries.

TCIL has established the network with a data centre in TCIL Bhawan, which acts as a gateway to the hub station in Dakar for connectivity of Indian institutions to the African sites.

New Delhi, March 23, 2009.

Your Excellencies, Honourable Ministers and dignitaries from Africa, Ambassadors & High Commissioners,

Mr. Sanjay Kirloskar, Chairman, Kirloskar Brothers Ltd.,

Mr. Chandrajit Banerjee, Director General of Confederation of Indian Industry,

Distinguished Guests, Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is my great privilege to be present amidst you today at this special plenary session of the 5th CII-EXIM Bank Conclave on the India-Africa Project Partnership 2009. This event has become a most prestigious gathering of government and business representatives from Africa and India. It is a reflection of our common desire to share each other's capabilities and capacities for mutual benefit and for the socio-economic development of our peoples.

I have been informed that this year's Conclave has generated overwhelming response with more than 450 participants registering from Africa and nearly 315 from India. I congratulate the Confederation of Indian Industry and EXIM Bank for this.

Such periodical gatherings not only give us an occasion to renew our acquaintance, but also enable us to take stock of the progress made in the implementation of our mutual commitments and to address our future needs.

Friends, the theme of this year's Conclave is "India-Africa: Celebrating the Partnership". The India-Africa partnership has evolved over decades with mutual respect for each other's traditions, cultures and the desire to ensure that the benefits of development are spread evenly and reach all our peoples, particularly the most disadvantaged.

The long and historic relationship between India and Africa has now evolved into a sustainable partnership. During our march together, we have traversed similar paths, shared similar values and cherished the same dreams.

Today, both India and Africa have emerged as strong and dependable partners, who are well positioned to confront the growing challenges facing humanity, be it combating the scourge of international terrorism, eradicating hunger and poverty, tackling global warming, or evolving new frameworks for international institutions.

Our time-tested and multifaceted relationship with Africa is based on the solid foundation of our steadfast commitment for the rapid growth and progress of Africa. The formalisation of an institutional mechanism for the India-Africa dialogue in the form of the India-Africa Forum Summit is a reflection of India's commitment to work with the continent to fulfil its aspirations.

International trade and market access are crucially important for development. Recognising this, Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh unilaterally announced India's Duty Free Tariff Preference Scheme (DFTP) in April last year in New Delhi for 49 Least Developed Countries (LDCs) of which 33 are from the African continent including the Cotton-4 countries, i.e. Burkina Faso, Benin, Chad and Mali. This Scheme covers 94% of India's total tariff lines. I would urge all LDCs in Africa to fully utilize this scheme. We are happy to provide them greater market access to India.

Since the inception of the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) Programme in 1964, capacity building and human resource development in Africa has been an area of high priority for the Government of India. The ITEC programme has benefited thousands of experts and students from Africa who came for training courses in professional institutions in India. These courses cover diverse fields such as agriculture and agro processing, entrepreneurship development, tool design, small business creation, promotion of rural industries and information technology. Our "Barefoot College" and the "Hole-in-the-Wall" programmes have received enthusiastic response from several countries. This year the Ministry of External Affairs has designed special courses for experts from Africa in the field of mining and new and renewable energy resources. We have increased the number of training slots for African countries from 1100 to 1600. I would like to urge all my friends from Africa to fully utilize these training courses.

I am happy to note that several thousand African students are currently studying in Indian universities and colleges. We have doubled the number of scholarships for the African countries to 500 this year.

Over the next five to six years India will also undertake in Africa, on a grant basis, projects in critical areas such as higher and vocational education, science, IT, agriculture and renewable energy. A sum of US$500 million has been allocated for this.

Government of India's Pan-African e-Network Project is another shining example of the India-Africa partnership. Under this project, India has provided a dedicated satellite link for e-connectivity to help bridge the digital divide in Africa. The project aims at linking major universities in different regions of Africa with major Indian universities and centres of excellence on the one hand, as also major hospitals in Africa with super-specialty hospitals in India, on the other. I had the privilege of inaugurating the first phase of this project last month which covers eleven countries. We hope to extend this to another 22 countries by the middle of this year. I am confident that this project would be immensely useful to our friends in their effort to disseminate higher education and modern medicine.

It is a matter of satisfaction to note that our bilateral trade with Africa has grown manifold and reached a level of US$36 billion in 2007-08, up from US$3 billion in 2000-01. Given the concrete opportunities that exist between the two sides, India-Africa trade could easily be doubled to US$70 billion over the next five years. I would urge this Conclave to accept this challenge and plan out strategies to achieve it.

Ladies and Gentlemen, it is important to supplement governmental efforts with those from industry, civil society and private institutions in order to widen and deepen the foundation of our growing partnership. I am confident that such empowered gatherings comprising of entrepreneurs, investors and business leaders would provide the necessary impetus to promote B2B interactions and public-private partnerships between the two sides.

I acknowledge, in this context, the pioneering role played by India's public and private sector in promoting joint ventures and investments in Africa in core sectors, particularly in the fields of agriculture, power generation, irrigation, pharmaceuticals, IT and health.

Of late, there have been further investments or plans for investment by both Indian public and private sector companies in the energy sector. These plans entail capacity development and value addition in a broader sense and are, therefore mutually beneficial and sustainable.

Ladies & Gentlemen, India is the world's largest importer of rough diamonds and exporter of cut and polished diamonds. Most of the raw diamonds for our cutting and polishing industry are sourced from Africa. As part of our philosophy of sharing our knowledge with others, and in pursuance of our policy to increase capacity building in Africa, our government has favourably considered the request of some African countries to set up Diamond Cutting and Polishing Institutes for training of their personnel in cutting/polishing skills.

The endeavours of the African Union towards regional economic integration and for building Pan-African institutions are truly commendable. We will continue our support for these efforts as well as those to meet the Millennium Development Goals, especially in the areas of human resource development and capacity building. We have an open mind on looking at new and innovative ideas and sectors in this regard. I would urge delegates here to give thought to this aspect.

Ladies and gentlemen, let me conclude by saying that the current global financial crisis and general economic downturn have impacted us all. However, it is our firm intention to continue to fulfil the commitments we announced towards Africa at the India-Africa Forum Summit last April.

Excellencies, in the post-colonial era, India and African countries have been together since their birth as independent nations. Our destinies and future remain closely intertwined. That is my message to you.

Thank you.

538. Address by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on the occasion of Launch of India-Africa Connect Website.

New Delhi, August 17, 2009.

Hon'ble Shri Shashi Tharoor, Minister of State for External Affairs,

Shri Nalin Surie, Secretary (West), Ministry of External Affairs

Excellencies Ambassadors and High Commissioners of African countries in New Delhi, Senior officials from the Government of India, ladies and gentlemen.

I am delighted to be present here to inaugurate the India Africa Connect Website, launched by my Ministry.

Excellencies, the Website is yet another indication of our commitment to further strengthen the relationship with Africa. Africa has always had an important position in our foreign policy. Our linkages with Africa go back centuries. We had interacted closely with each other across the Indian Ocean. Later we shared similar experiences when we were both struggling against the forces of imperialism, colonialism, racial discrimination and apartheid.

Our cooperation as independent nations deepened and diversified during the second half of the 20th Century. This cooperation was based on a similarity of challenges, problems and experiences as developing countries involved in nation building, poverty alleviation, human resource development and development of production capacities and infrastructure, food security and health. During this process of cooperation, India was ever willing to share its capacities and experiences with its partners in Africa. These included cost-effective and appropriate technologies, democratic model of development, capacity building programmes, and use of the knowledge sector. Over the years, a major portion of our technical assistance and capacity building programmes were directed towards Africa. In recent years this has been supplemented by greater trade and economic linkages, developed by both our public and private sectors.

The India Africa Forum Summit of April'08 took our relationship to a new level. It created a new architecture for our partnership in the 21st century. The new roadmap set out in this Summit seeks to bring greater depth and substance to our engagement with Africa. Through this Summit, India renewed its commitment to cooperate with Africa in its economic development process and to peace and security in the continent.

Our relationship with Africa is diversified, encompassing a wide range of sectors including political, economic, cultural, social and technological. Apart from the Government-to-Government contacts, we are happy to see growing people-to-people exchanges. There is now a greater movement of people including students, entrepreneurs and tourists on both sides.

The India-Africa Connect website that I am inaugurating today will be yet another link between the two sides, and will strengthen the existing relationship. It will help bridge the information gap that still unfortunately exists between us. It is our hope that this Website will emerge as a key portal for news, views and features on India and Africa covering subjects and areas of interest to both our sides, including on science and technology, agriculture, education, health, energy, tourism, besides fashion and culture. A section has also been provided for each African country, and we expect that we will receive inputs from each country to regularly update those pages. This should be a process of continuous interaction.

I am particularly pleased that general interest and success stories on 'Africa in India' and 'India in Africa' would feature in the Website.

I would like the site to become a vibrant and interactive vehicle for reaching out to each other.

Excellencies, through you, I would also like to request your respective Governments to collaborate in this pioneering venture and to make India-Africa Connect a success.

539. Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on the Launch of India-Africa Connect Website by the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna.

New Delhi, August 17, 2009.

External Affairs Minister Shri S. M. Krishna launched today in New Delhi the 'India-Africa Connect Website', which is devoted to India-Africa relations and hosts news, features and essential information on India and African countries, with special emphasis on development cooperation. Heads of diplomatic missions of African countries in India, senior political figures and officials as also Indian industrialists and leaders of apex industry and trade organisations engaged in cooperation with Africa were among those who attended the function for the launch of the website, which is developed and managed for the Ministry of External Affairs by Indo-Asian News Service (IANS).

Recalling the historically strong ties between India and the African nations, External Affairs Minister said that the development and the launch of the website represented the high importance which India attaches to developing its diversified relations with countries of the African continent. He pointed out that recent initiatives such as India Africa Forum Summit in April 2008 had taken this relationship to a new level, and added that the new roadmap seeks to bring greater depth and substance to India's engagement with Africa. EAM expressed the hope that by providing new avenues for exchange and dissemination of information, the site will become a vibrant and interactive vehicle for reaching out to each other and strengthen India-Africa relationship. Shri Nalin Surie, Secretary (West) in the Ministry of External Affairs, expressed the hope that the website will facilitate closer cooperation between India and Africa and thanked African diplomatic missions and IANS for extending valuable support to the project.

Sir Ramesh Jeewoolall, Chancellor of the University of Mauritius

Professor Sudarshan Jugessur, Pro-Chancellor and Chairman of the Council of the University of Mauritius

Professor Soonil Rughooputh, Pro-Vice Chancellor of the University of Mauritius

Excellencies,

Distinguished guests, Friends, Ladies and Gentlemen

I am greatly honoured to be asked to visit this historic building of the University of Mauritius. It is indeed a privilege to address a distinguished audience such as this on a subject which is close to my heart and which forms a central plank in the foreign policy of India.

The buildings of the University of Mauritius are steeped in history and are as old as this place itself. It is also significant that some of the Indian Universities and the University of Mauritius have been linked through the bonds of academia, and more importantly have worked together to provide a platform towards addressing issues of common concern and to providing guidance and direction to the future leaders of the 21st century.

I consider it a particular honour to be with you at a place where one of the highly respected Presidents of India, Professor A. P. J. Abdul Kalam had stood to address all of you when he had an inter-active session at this University in March 2006 during his State Visit to Mauritius.

I have been in Mauritius now for a little under two days. The purpose of my visit was to participate in the Aapravasi Diwas - a historic date which is steeped in poignant memory. The Aapravasi Ghat has a moving tale cast in each of its bricks and stones. History is unforgiving if we do not remember those forefathers of ours who sacrificed all to bequeath to us what we enjoy today. We should never forget their labour and toil lest we disconnect ourselves from something which should be cherished and recalled for the larger good of mankind. I congratulate Mauritius - its Government and the people - for retelling the world the memory of a set of people who converted what would have been a difficult environment for them in what today is a heavenly paradise. As for Mauritius, I am charmed by its beauty, delighted by the warmth of its people and touched by the generosity and hospitality of my hosts. It has been indeed a great pleasure being here.

This meeting with all you is perhaps my last official engagement during my brief stay in this wonderful country. And the subject of the address is very appropriate.

The India-Africa partnership has deep roots in history. Linked across the Indian Ocean, we have been neighbours and partners for thousands of years. There was regular interaction between communities and traders, especially from the West coast of Gujarat and parts of South India with Abyssinia, Somalia, Mombasa, Zanzibar and even Mozambique. These communities and groups played significant roles in the histories of both India and Africa. The advent of the Europeans and the colonial period disturbed these interactions but could not disrupt them. Later, both India and Africa shared the pain of subjugation and the joys of freedom and liberation. We worked shoulder to shoulder in the fight against apartheid and racial discrimination. Satyagraha, non-violence and active opposition to injustice and discrimination were first used by Mahatma Gandhi on the continent of Africa. Mahatma Gandhi always believed that so long as Africa was not free, India's own freedom would be incomplete. Our first Prime Minister, Pt. Jawahar Lal Nehru, was also a firm believer and practitioner of the principle of Afro-Asian solidarity and of support to the struggles of the people of Africa against discrimination and apartheid.

Therefore, after India achieved independence, we embarked on a path of close cooperation with the newly independent nations of Africa who shared similar problems of under-development, poverty and disease. India's cooperation with Africa was based on the principle of South-South cooperation, on similarities of circumstances and experiences. India was always open to sharing our strengths, our democratic model of development and our appropriate technologies that are cheap, yet effective. Africa became the largest partner of India's technical assistance and capacity building programmes. Many of you present here today would have studied in some Indian university. We are proud that tens of thousands of African students studied in various Indian universities and then returned home to contribute to the economic and social development of their respective countries. Some of them rose to hold high positions. In the first few decades of our independence and also those of our African partners, India extended over US $ 3 billion worth of concessional lines of credit to be used in those infrastructure and other development projects that were determined by our African partners.

There was also a continuous high level of interaction between the political leaderships of India and African nations. Indian leaders such as Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru, Smt. Indira Gandhi, Shri Rajiv Gandhi and other leaders are held in high esteem in Africa. So also were the leaders of Africa who always received a warm welcome in India. This continues even today.

These cooperation programmes and the guidance of our respective leaderships laid the foundation of a very strong political and economic partnership between India and Africa in the 20th century. On these foundations, a new architecture for structured engagement and cooperation for the 21st Century was designed at the first India Africa Forum Summit hosted by India in April 2008. The Summit provided an occasion for the leaderships of India and Africa to come together to chart out the roadmap for a systematic engagement. The India Africa Forum Summit adopted two historic documents, the Delhi Declaration and the India Africa Framework for Cooperation.

The Delhi Declaration which is a political document covers bilateral, regional and international issues. These include our common positions on UN reforms, climate change, WTO and international terrorism, etc. The India-Africa Framework for Cooperation spells out the agreed areas of cooperation. These areas span human resources and institutional capacity building, education, science & technology, agricultural productivity and food security, industrial growth, small & medium enterprises and minerals, health sector, development of infrastructure, and ICT.

Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh also announced at the Summit the Duty Free Tariff Preferential Scheme for the 50 least developed countries, 34 of whom are in Africa. This will cover 94% of India's total tariff lines and, more importantly provide preferential market access on tariff lines for 92.5% of the global exports of all LDCs. We hope that by providing increased access to African products to Indian markets, the Duty Free Tariff Preferential Scheme will increase trade flows between India and Africa.

Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh also announced our decision to double the amount for lines of credit to US$ 5.4 billion for the next five-years i.e. over one billion each year. These lines of credit will be for projects prioritized by African nations and could include such crucial sectors as infrastructure, including agriculture and food security, IT, telecom, power-generation, physical connectivity and small, medium and micro enterprises, water-management, capacity-building in agriculture and building institutions dedicated to agricultural research.

At the India Africa Forum Summit, India also announced a grant of US$ 500 million for the next five to six years to undertake projects in human resource development and capacity-building. Long-term scholarships for undergraduates, postgraduates and higher courses have been doubled and the number of slots under the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation Programme (ITEC) increased from 1100 to 1600 every year. We have also offered to share with our African friends our experience in using remote-sensing and satellite-imagery for weather-forecasting, natural resources management, land use and land-cover mapping and a variety of other applications.

We are happy to see the Indian private sector increasingly engage in Africa. Indian companies have made large investments in Africa running into several billion dollars in industry, agriculture, infrastructure and human resource development. India's trade with Africa has been growing rapidly. Two-way trade has risen to over 36 billion dollars in 2008-09, which represents an almost six-fold increase in as many years. Even so, the true potential is much greater and the spread and composition of the trade has to be substantially diversified.

A successful partnership programme between India and Africa have been the CII-EXIM Bank Conclaves. These Conclaves are intended to create and provide platforms for decision makers from African countries and relevant multilateral, regional and national funding agencies to meet and interact with the entire range of Indian companies involved in engineering consultancy, turnkey projects, construction and supply of project goods.

So far, five Annual Conclaves in India (two in 2005, one each in 2006, 2008, 2009) have been held. Indian participation has grown from 200 industry members to 500 members. Participation has grown from 153 African delegates to 483. Eleven Regional Conclaves in Africa (in Zambia, Ethiopia, Ghana, two in South Africa, Uganda, Mozambique, Ivory Coast, Senegal, Tanzania and Nigeria) were held.

There is a growing demand in Africa for developing infrastructure, new technologies, engineering services and manufacturing capabilities for local value addition. These offer excellent opportunities to Indian businesses in Africa, and to millions of young people in Africa who can be employed in the manufacturing and services sectors.

The Pan African E-network project that seeks to bridge the 'digital divide' between Africa and the rest of the world is one of the most far-reaching initiatives undertaken by India. Already 42 countries have joined this programme which is intended to provide E-services with priority on tele-education and tele-medicine services and VVIP connectivity by satellite and fibre optic network amongst the Heads of State of all 53 countries. The Project would give major benefits to Africa in capacity building through skill and knowledge development of students, medical specialists and for medical consultation.

India has also been extensively involved in peacekeeping efforts in Africa over the past six decades. At present, India has over 7000 peacekeepers serving in Africa, including a 5000 strong contingent in the Democratic Republic of Congo. India's first full all-female formed police unit is currently deployed in Liberia. In addition to peacekeeping, this unit has been successful in reaching out to the most vulnerable sections of the society i.e. women and children and in inspiring women who have so often been victim of war to see themselves also as sources of succour and strength in this recently war torn society.

A vibrant India and a resurgent Africa are thus witnessing an intensification of relations and growing convergence of interests in their common quest for sustainable economic growth and development. Our partnership encompasses priority sectors integral to the developmental goals of Africa in the 21st century.

In conclusion, I would like to state that India envisions an Africa that is self-reliant, economically vibrant and at peace with itself and the world. While highlighting the vitality of African continent, the first Prime Minister of India, Pt. Jawaharlal Nehru, had said, "Of one thing there can be no doubt, and that is the vitality of the people of Africa. Therefore, with the vitality of her people and the great resources available in this great continent, there can be no doubt that the future holds a great promise for the people of Africa."

It is this promise that our Partnership with Africa seeks to fulfill. India will offer its fullest cooperation to harness the great potential of the African people for the cause of Africa's progress and development.

Shri S. Sundareshan and Shri Sunil Jain of the Ministry of Petroleum and Natural Gas Delegates from India,

Excellencies, Distinguished Guests, Media representatives,

Ladies and Gentlemen:

It is always a pleasure to be amongst friends from Africa. Ladies and Gentlemen, it is with pride that I say that our relations with Africa are sourced in history and that we are neighbours across the Indian Ocean. India acknowledges the role played by Africa in shaping the early outlook of a young Indian lawyer, Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi, who became the father of our nation. The solidarity we shared during the period of colonialism and the dark phase of racism is legendary. There is a strong emotive connect between us. I am here reminded of what Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, our first Prime Minister, said at the Asian-Africa Conference at Bandung, Indonesia in 1954:

I quote "We have met here because of an irrepressible urge amongst the people of Asia and Africa. We have met because mighty forces are at work in these great continents, moving millions of people, creating in their minds urges and passions and desires for a change in their condition...We are determined not to fail. We are determined, in this new phase of Asia and Africa, to make good". Unquote

Friends, India continues to be inspired by the same irrepressible urge to make good with Africa and its peoples. Our common legacy nurtures a close alignment on major international issues and an abundance of socio-political goodwill gives our bilateral relations a strong foundation. The future beckons that we build on this solid foundation of goodwill and friendship, a superstructure of mutually beneficial economic and commercial cooperation.

To this effect, last year, you will recollect, we successfully hosted the India-Africa Forum Summit in New Delhi. The Delhi Declaration and the Africa-India Framework for Cooperation adopted at that Summit highlighted our shared political vision and worldview and signaled with full intent, a determination to build a new partnership, with Africa in the 21st century. The Prime Minister of India had then announced US$ 5.4 billion in loans for the development of Africa, supported by US$ 500 million in grants for capacity building processes, doubling of scholarships, increasing capacity building positions under our International Technical and Economic Programme and a Duty-Free Tariff Preferences Scheme. We are happy that many of these are already under successful implementation. I am also pleased to note that after two major business events earlier in the year, this Conference is the third event with African countries hosted in New Delhi in 2009.

Friends, we meet at a very crucial time. The global economy is yet to fully emerge from its biggest crisis which also caused considerable collateral damage to the global energy and food security. Emerging and developing countries were not the cause, but we were condemned to reap the repercussions of this crisis.

We in India are now past the worst of this global downturn. The fundamentals of the Indian economy are strong and our economic prospects are durable. Our growth is closing in on 7% and we are confident that before long our economy would scale the 9% growth trajectory achieved before the economic downturn.

Even as we meet here, the Conference of Parties to the UN Convention against Climate Change is kicking off in Copenhagen, an event which could influence global energy production and consumption patterns. We remain hopeful of success at Copenhagen in achieving an outcome, containing substantive and enforceable commitments which are equitable and supportive of economic growth, especially in developing countries. India has conceived its response to Climate Change, as part of a broader strategy for ensuring sustainable development. Our objective is to bring about changes in the kinds of energy we produce and consume, while remaining mindful of our resources constraints, environmental concerns and imperatives of economic development.

Friends, global energy trends are already suggesting that the demand for oil has peaked in the developed world. The new global claimants for oil are now located in Asia, including India, where a rapidly growing economy is driving our demand for energy. India would need to depend upon 90% oil and 60% gas imports by 2030-31. Presently, about 15 percent of India's crude oil imports came from Africa, but we can do with more.

Apart from being an obvious long-term market for African hydrocarbons, India is also globally recognized as a hub for business opportunities spread across the entire hydrocarbon production cycle. India is a oil refining centre, exporter of petroleum products and home to competitive hydrocarbon multinationals, which have made their presence felt all over the world, including in Africa. As the fastest growing democracy we offer a complementary and mutually advantageous hand of partnership to our friends in Africa's hydrocarbon sector.

Ladies and Gentlemen, the spread of global hydrocarbon reserves is uneven. Most countries of the world are hydrocarbon deficit, including many in Africa. From the 20th century crude oil was increasingly seen as a strategic commodity and this vitiated international relations. The choice is in our hands and here I leave a thought with you. Do we continue to treat hydrocarbon assets as a zero-sum game or in the true spirit of globalization ensure that they become part of a truly global, integrated, open and competitive energy market for the mutual and long term benefit of producers and consumers?

Friends, this is a rich gathering of government leaders, policy makers, senior executives, energy consultants and investors. I would like to conclude by suggesting that during your interactions you may also address issues like - the volatility in the oil and gas markets; promoting energy trade and investments; the information gap between energy suppliers and consumers, and protecting the transportation and transit of oil and gas.

I congratulate my good friend Shri Murli Deora, the Minister for Petroleum and Natural Gas, his colleagues, our public sector companies and FICCI for organizing this important event. I wish the Second India-Africa Hydrocarbon Conference all success.

- Ladies and Gentlemen, friends:

It is my pleasure and privilege to deliver the Valedictory Address at the conclusion of the second edition of the India-Africa Hydrocarbon Conference.

2. History, Ladies and Gentlemen, it has been said, is subject to Geology. The bounty of mother earth - in the form of its soil, water, metals and energy resources - has shaped civilizations depending on how these resources were owned and used. Our demand for and appropriation of these vital and finite inputs has, however, always had an unpredictable strategic impact, which has sometimes increased the divide between nations or even redrawn the shape of countries on the map.

3. This hunger for natural resources and its behavioral consequences, I am happy to note, has never cast a shadow on India-Africa relations. As Mr. Sundareshan reminded us with his quotes from Mahatma Gandhi, we have always stood for and we have stood with Africa, driven by a primordial and abiding commitment. Our links are civilizational yet contemporary. Indeed, one of the grandest narratives of the anti-colonial movement has been of the brotherly solidarity between India and Africa. The colonial days of extraneous and overt political domination are behind us. The calling now is for nation-building, economic growth, development and welfare.

4. However cordial and close state-to-state relations are, they are painted with a broad brush; the gaps and finer touches have to be filled in by civil society and increasingly by private business and economic interests. Agents of business and commerce play a particularly indispensable role in this process. I am pleased that this gathering has brought together government leaders, policy makers, entrepreneurs, corporate leaders and professionals from India and Africa on a common platform to further advance their cooperation in the energy sector. At this juncture of economic globalization, the role of the private sector and industry becomes more important than ever.

5. Yet, the forces of globalization cut both ways. After years of continuous and rapid growth, the global economy hit a speed breaker and lost momentum. Similarly, just over a year ago, when crude oil prices, the main reference driver for other energy sources, touched record highs of US$ 147 a barrel, energy security was a worldwide and disturbing concern. Today, we derive some comfort as oil prices hover around US$ 75 to 80 a barrel. But complacency on energy issues has a greater price.

6. Energy security concerns will continue to challenge us. As the international economy regains its full balance, oil demand will pick up and suck up the supply overhang. Global crude oil prices are condemned to be volatile until both the oil producers and oil consumers follow the same script. An oil consuming country wants low and assured prices; the oil producer seeks predictability of demand at attractive prices. The oil market is defined by this asymmetry. Strategic and market-unfriendly oil deals further muddy the waters by either over or under-valuing oil assets.

7. The collective good is best served by enlarging the size of the global energy market so that greater quantities of energy resources, like crude oil, are available through transparent and open transactions. The imperative of closer cooperation and interdependence between producers and consumers of oil and gas has never been more obvious. I am happy that this Conference serves this broad principle by bringing together the oil and gas producers of Africa and the Indian hydrocarbon market.

8. Ladies and Gentlemen, India is widely hailed as one of the engines of global growth. But India is, and is also likely to remain, an energy-deficit country for years to come. Friends and guests from Africa, let me emphasize that India is your long-term bet as a partner for cooperation in the energy sector. Consuming over 2.8 million barrels per day, India is the fourth biggest global consumer of crude oil. In the fiscal year 2008-09, India imported oil worth about US$ 75 billion. As a major consumer of crude oil and increasingly of gas, we guarantee demand in the buyer-seller equation.

9. But, as you would have discovered during this Conference, this is not the complete story of what India brings to the energy table. India is a globally recognized state-of-the art refining centre. Our energy companies, both in the private and public sectors, have proven expertise in the entire oil and natural gas value chain. We offer ourselves as both a huge market for energy products as also an investment and technology partner in the oil and gas sector.

10. Let me here also emphasize that our approach to African resources is not a one-way street. Over the last decade Africa has been seen in a new light by many because its oil yields have "out-produced the North Sea." But, constrained by the pace of its economic growth, Africa consumes only about 40% of the oil it produces. We will draw equal satisfaction when African oil fuels Africa's own development and growth. Our long standing priority is to serve as a partner in Africa's economic development. To this effect, capacity building and knowledge and skills enhancement have driven our bilateral assistance to Africa. We are proud to train, educate and broaden the horizons of African citizens.

11. Between the first and second India-Africa Conference the global oil market has gone through a crisis. It is exactly in such testing times that conferences like ours rebuild confidence in the global energy sector. Over the last two days, you have had an opportunity to share information, discuss and exchange notes on the whole gamut of issues in the oil and gas sector, including exploration and production, policy and regulations, as well as business opportunities and consultancy possibilities. I am confident that your deliberations have resulted in identifying mutually beneficial opportunities in a sector which in many ways is the force multiplier for economic growth and development. I, therefore, congratulate, in full measure, the Ministry of Petroleum and Natural Gas and FICCI for organizing this event. And the Ministry of External Affairs is pleased and honoured to have been associated with this Conference. I wish our foreign delegates a safe return home. Let us now focus on the concrete steps to be taken to act upon and give effect to the insights acquired during this Conference.

544. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Petroleum and Natural Gas on the India - Africa Hydro-Carbon Conference.

New Delhi, December 8, 2009.

The second India Africa Hydrocarbons Conference concluded here today with the signing of an umbrella MoU between India and Sudan for further expanding cooperation in the oil and gas sector. The MoU was signed by Shri Jitin Prasada, Minister of State for Petroleum & Natural Gas on behalf of India and by Ms. Angelina Jany Teny, Minister for Energy & Mining, Republic of Sudan which provides a broad framework to take forward the existing cooperation between the two countries. Speaking on the occasion Shri Prasada outlined the initiatives taken by Indian companies including an investment of 2.5 billion dollars in Sudan by OVL.

He also elaborated five thrust areas in the oil and gas sector for cooperation with the African countries. These include; buy more crude from Africa, invest more in upstream opportunities on bilateral basis in Africa as well as in third countries, explore opportunities to source more LNG from Africa, make available our skills, talent and technology in cost-effective manner for the benefit of Africa. While pursuing mutually beneficial projects in Africa, we will also take up community development programmes there for inclusive growth.

The Minister of State for External Affairs Shri Shashi Tharoor called for closer cooperation and inter-dependence between producers and consumers of oil and gas. Delivering his valedictory address he assured that India's approach to African resources is not a one way street. The Minister added, "We will draw equal satisfaction when African oil fuels Africa's own development and growth. Our long standing priority is to serve as a partner in Africa's development".

Shri S. Sundareshan, Addl. Secretary, Ministry of Petroleum & Natural Gas provided a Conference Review on the occasion. He identified six areas of opportunities for collaboration to the benefit of both India and the African countries. These are:

1. Investment by Indian Companies in E&P Opportunities in Africa. They should aggressively widely participate in the various rounds in African Countries which are rich in resources. The countries have evolved their own processes. Indian companies should in the first instance, develop expertise in understanding the African procedures and dealing with the African processes.

2. In several countries there are opportunities in investment in the downstream sector. There could be an opportunity for setting up small refineries. From the African side, there should be a system of providing downstream marketing rights.
3. There exists openings for upgradation of facilities by the Indian companies particularly in the project management. Indian companies should participate in such opportunities for petroleum infrastructure upgradation.
4. The Government of India would like to offer facilities for upgradation of human resources. This could be for students, executives and training for trainers. This could be suited to the specific requirements of the countries. We welcome proposals in this regard.
5. There could be formation of joint ventures between India and African companies. This could be in the areas of E&P and downstream projects. Joint venture could also be formed for exploring specific assets and ventures. The African side should design this.
6. The service providing sector also offers significant opportunities. The African countries are welcome to let us know the areas of infrastructure development, services and any bundling of opportunities they would like in the oil & gas sector and Government of India would facilitate in activating the interest of the Indian companies.

Your Excellency President Dr. Boni Yayi,

Madame Yayi,

Distinguished Guests,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It gives me great pleasure in welcoming Your Excellency and the distinguished members of your delegation to India. Your historic visit is a manifestation of our shared keenness to pursue a more substantive bilateral agenda.

As the world's largest democracy, India has been impressed by the emergence of the Republic of Benin over the past two decades as a functioning democracy in Africa, with a peaceful and orderly polity and freedom of the press.

Excellency,

We share the high importance you attach to India-Benin relations and rejoice at their steady growth. There are concrete opportunities for bilateral synergy in the sectors of agriculture, food-processing, small and medium enterprises, mining, pharmaceuticals, infrastructure, automobiles and others, which need to be utilized fully for mutual benefit. Our bilateral trade, which is in the range of US$ 350 million, does not reflect the true potential existing between our countries. We are pleased to note that Benin has conveyed its letter of intent to avail of the benefits under the Duty Free Tariff Preference Scheme offered by India to African countries. This would certainly give a boost to Benin's exports to our country.

We look forward to further expansion and deepening of our bilateral engagement*. The agreements signed today would help provide the enabling

We are also confident that your engagements with potential Indian stakeholders during this visit would open new vistas for bilateral co-operation through investments, joint ventures and transfer of technology.

India and Benin share commonality of views on major international issues. We appreciate your consistent support to India at various international fora. We value your strong support to India's candidature for permanent membership on an expanded UN Security Council. We welcome your forthright condemnation of the recent Mumbai terrorist attack. We join you, Excellency, in calling for cooperation and collaboration among all states to fight the scourge of international terrorism.

Excellency,

A cornerstone of India's policy on external relations is to help our friends in Africa with their socio-economic development and for the continent of Africa to emerge as a vibrant entity, well integrated with the world economy. India is committed to extending its support and cooperation to Africa within its capabilities and capacities.

In several countries in Africa, projects undertaken by India have started showing a visible impact in key economic and social sectors. We expect this impact to grow progressively in the years to come. The Delhi Declaration issued after the first India-Africa Forum Summit held in New Delhi in April 2008, serves as a road map for giving a new momentum and dynamism to relations between India and Africa.

The Government of India's Pan-Africa e-Network Project, the first phase of which was commissioned a few days ago, is our humble attempt to help Africa bridge the digital divide. The project aims to create linkages for tele-education and tele-medicine by making available the expertise of some of the best universities and hospitals in India to the people of Africa. We are particularly pleased that Benin has joined this prestigious Project in the first phase.

India has in the past gifted 100 tractors and agricultural implements, as well as, extended a US$18.8 million Line of Credit for rural electrification to Benin. The country regularly avails of training facilities under the ITEC programme in various fields. It has also subscribed to the Duty Free Tariff Preference (DFTP) Scheme announced by India in April 2008. India's bilateral trade with Benin is currently US$350 million.

Benin was included in the first group of countries in the Government of India's Pan-African e-network project, which was officially inaugurated by the External Affairs Minister last week.

Excellency,

I am confident that your visit to India would open a new chapter in this saga of our friendship.

May I now request Your Excellencies, Distinguished Guests, Ladies and Gentlemen, to join me in raising a toast to:-

- the good health and happiness of President Dr. Boni Yayi and Madame Yayi;
- the continued growth in friendship and co-operation between India and Benin and;
- the success of this historic visit.

Thank you!

546. Remarks of the Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor to the press on arrival at the Cotonu airport.

Cotonou, (Benin), October 21, 2009.

Ladies and Gentlemen, I am delighted to be here in your wonderful lovely scenic country for the first meeting of the Joint Commission between India and Benin. Republic of Benin is indeed a shining example of a tolerant, progressive multi-ethnic and multi-religious society with a multi-party democracy. India, world's largest democracy, rejoices at Benin success in this regard.

The forthcoming Joint Commission* Meeting is an important platform for the two countries to accelerate the pace of good relations, not only in the political field, but also in trade and commercial matters, education and culture.

The recent historic State visit of His Excellency President Boni Yayi to India in March 2009 had laid the foundations for this Meeting, when India and Benin had signed the Agreement for the creation of the India-Benin Joint Committee for Political, Economic, Scientific, Technical and Cultural Cooperation. During this first session of the Joint Commission, we will work towards concretizing areas of cooperation and to build forward on our earlier initiatives taken.

The following development projects have already been agreed during the visit of the President which are under active implementation : (i) Projects proposed by Benin under $ 15 million line of credit; (ii) setting up an Information Technology Centre of Excellence (CETI) in Benin, on grant basis; (iii) Setting up a centre for Technology Demonstration in Benin, on grant basis; (iv) Undertake two mutually agreed projects each for one million dollars in health and education sectors, on grant basis.

I am happy that MOU on Cultural cooperation would be signed on 23 October during the JCM, which would go a long way in building the bridges of cultural understanding and promoting people-to-people interaction between the two countries.

I would also like to mention that we had in the recent past donated 100

* The Agreement to establish the India-Benin Joint Commission on political, economic, scientific, technical and cultural cooperation was signed during the first-ever State Visit to India (3-7 March 2009) by Dr. Boni Yayi, President of the Republic of Benin.

A Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on the visit on October 20 described India - Benin relations as friendly and characterized by democracy and secularism. The Press release recalling the visit of the Benin President in March 2009 said "close convergence of opinions at the highest political levels was noted" at that time. It gratefully accepted the unflinching support of Benin to India in its bid for a Permanent Seat at the UN Security Council as also for the non-permanent seat for the years 2011-12. President Boni Yayi had also "expressed solidarity with India in its efforts to tackle the scourge of terrorism, which has become the biggest threat to international tractors, and a further donation of 100 tractors is in advanced stages of implementation.

India-Benin bilateral trade has been showing an upward trend during the past few years, and has shown a healthy increase from $ 126 million in 2005 to $ 310. million in 2007-08, which is a growth of 145%. We are sure that, with increased cooperation between the two nations, this figure will go even higher.

India on its part is ready to support the efforts of the Government of Benin in achieving this goal. India sees Benin as a partner in progress and is ready to offer her expertise in the field of agriculture, science and technology, ICT pharmaceuticals and infrastructure. I am sure that with institutional framework like the Joint Commission in place, and with regular interaction, the bilateral relations between the two countries will be further strengthened.

We also share high values such as democracy, tolerant pluralist society and adherence to the UN Charter and we deeply thank Excellency President Dr Boni Yavi and his government for his clear articulation of support of India's claim to the permanent membership of an expanded UN Security Council. We are particularly appreciated the Government of Benin for their commitment to support our candidature for the non-permanent seat for 2011-12 for which elections are to be held in 2010.

I would like to express India's profound appreciation and gratitude to Excellency President Dr Boni Yayi's patronage of Indo-Benin relations and I am looking forward to pay a courtesy call on the President. I have come here assure Government of India's continued support and cooperation to Benin in its quest for socio-economic development and to advance our shared interests.

My special gratitude and thanks to your dynamic Foreign Minister Excellency Mr. Jean Marie Ehouzou, Benin Foreign Minister who has been my close friend for the past years and we had the privilege of working together in UN fora peace and security in the current times". Benin has been the recipient of bilateral assistance from India in the form of agricultural equipment, water pumps for irrigation, tractors and essential medicines including anti-retroviral drugs. Prime Minister had during the visit of President Yayi "announced a US$2 million grant" which Benin is utilizing to get medical equipment, buses and computers from India. Concessional Lines of Credit worth US$33.80 million have been extended to Benin for rural electrification, purchase of railway equipment, agricultural equipment, and to undertake feasibility study for a cyber-city. Benin has also joined the Pan-African e-Network project of the Government of India and is availing the tele-medicine and tele-education facilities.

Cotonou, (Benin), October 22, 2009.

Your Excellency Mr. Jean-Marie Ehouzou, Minister of Foreign Affairs,

Your Excellency Mr. Ataou Soufiano, President, Benin Chamber of Commerce and Industry,

Distinguished Delegates,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

At the outset, I would like to express my gratitude for arranging this important Business to business interaction during my current visit to Republic of Benin. Benin is our deeply valued bilateral partner and both official and business engagements and our interactions today not only complement the first session of the Joint Commission but also reinforces an important dimension of our country to country relations.

This interaction is also an significant follow up of the recent State visit to my country by His Excellency Dr Boni Yayi, President of the Republic of Benin which had a very strong business to business component. I understand that a large delegation of Benin Chamber participated in the visit. Indeed, through his visit, President had strongly encouraged Indian businessmen to come to Benin for a day of India" in Cotonou and I am glad that my business colleagues from India have responded to this high call. I am very glad to have a multi-sectoral large business delegation comprising of not less than 16 members representing such diversified sectors as construction, IT, transportation and agriculture. I believe that following the state visit, Benin's business community is also keen to discover India and to engage these and other Indian businesses in mutually rewarding endeavours.

While both India and Benin are developing countries, we do have strong sense of economic complimentarity. This manifests itself in mutual desire for working together to fulfil Benin's own national priorities in sectors such as infrastructure development, agriculture, healthcare, transportation, telecom and human resources development. While the two Governments are committed to support these B2B interactions, it should be our endeavour to go beyond the economic activity supported by the two governments. To this end, we should try to be innovative and explore bringing in the concepts such as private public partnership raising funds from various private and public sources and acquiring criticality through joint action based on possible utilisation of current and future resources. As an overarching priority to this B2B cooperation we also need to also focus on human resources building, improvement of skill sets and other human capacity building avenues.

Benin's exports to India have been growing consistently to become third largest market abroad with more than 106 million dollar exports to India for the year ended on March 31 2009. The cashew nut export accounted for nearly 70% of Benin's exports to India followed by metal scraps and wood & wooden products. On the other hand, Indian exports to Benin have also been rising through the years and during the same period stood at 203 million dollars. These comprising of manufactured materials, pharmaceutical products and various textile items. While the bilateral trade affected by the regional and global downturn during the last year, the overall trend is showing growth and diversified. If trade through third destinations is to be taken into account the figure is to likely go up considerably.

The economic operators of both sides need to take encouragement from the bilateral trade and take steps to expand and consolidate. There is a good possibility of increasing the bilateral trade along the existing areas. There is also possibility of the trade in new areas such as transportation, pharmaceuticals, ICT, telecom, rural development, small and medium industries, agriculture and agro based industry and human resource development.

Benin is relatively new to Indian product exporters however the success of TCIL in the past has shown that considerable potential does exist in this direction. I also understand that possibility in infrastructure development, transportation, local assembly and human resource development are currently being discussed.

While Benin presents Indian operators as an excellent market in its own right, its strategic economic location at the cross road of both coastal West Africa and central African hinterland makes it a strategic base for supply and local manufacturing to such diversified markets as ECOWAS and Francophone Central Africa. I do believe that India is still unrepresented in this huge swath of market and our presence in Benin can tap ameliorate this gap.

Realising the unfulfilled trade and economic cooperation potential, the two Heads of Governments decided to set up various structures during the State visit to India by His Excellency Dr Boni Yayi. These include the Joint Commission, Foreign Office Consultation and various projects in railways, agriculture, education and new technology sectors. In parallel, CII and Benin Chambers of Commerce and Industry have also signed a MoU on cooperation. We do hope that these instruments will help in expanding economic space to entrepreneurs of both countries to make a good beginning.

I would like to suggest that the potential provided by Benin's small but economically active Indian community be utilised to the full extent possible. They can act as a bridge for two entrepreneurs to work together.

In Conclusion, I would like to re-emphasise our interest in promoting bilateral economic synergy between the business communities on two sides and hope that interactions such as today would not only continue but become a more regular feature of the bilateral economic landscape.

Thank You!

CONGO*548. Joint Statement issued on the visit of Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Alexis Thambwe Mwamba.*New Delhi, October 29, 2009.

H.E. Mr. Alexis Thambwe Mwamba, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Democratic Republic of the Congo paid an official visit to India from 27 to 30 October, 2009. He was accompanied by a high-level delegation comprising of H.E. Mr. Oliver Kamitatu Etsu, Minister of Planning and H.E. Ms. Louise Munga Mesozi, Minister of Posts, Telephones and Telecommunications, besides senior advisors from key ministries.

The visiting Congolese Foreign Minister held extensive discussions with External Affairs Minister Shri S.M. Krishna, during which both the leaders reviewed the entire gamut of bilateral relations between the two countries, besides exchanging views on important international and regional issues of common interest such as expansion of UN Security Council, combating international terrorism, climate change, energy security and the Doha Development Round of the World Trade Organisation.

The visiting Foreign Minister conveyed the complete solidarity of the government and people of Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) with India and its people in their resolve to combat the scourge of terrorism. Democratic Republic of the Congo has pledged to work with India at the international, regional and bilateral levels to tackle the growing menace of terrorism. The two sides also agreed to collaborate within the framework of the United Nations for the early adoption of the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism.

While appreciating the leadership role played by India in promoting peace at regional and international levels, the DRC Foreign Minister reiterated the support of his government for India's bid for a Permanent Seat in the expanded UNSC as well as India's candidature for the Non-Permanent Seat for the term 2011-12 from the Asian Group, for which elections would be held in October 2010.

The DRC side recognised the pioneering and consistent support and cooperation extended by India to the African countries within the framework of South-South Cooperation, which has been enhanced significantly after the India-Africa Forum Summit held in April 2008.

Recalling India's significant contribution to international peace-keeping efforts in general and in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in particular since the early sixties, the DRC Foreign Minister lauded the services of the 5000-strong Indian contingent in MONUC, which has not only engaged in peace-keeping but also carried out significant humanitarian work for the Congolese people.

The two leaders noted with satisfaction that the bilateral relations between the two countries gained a new momentum and direction following the visit of President Joseph Kabila in April 2008. The two sides recognised the great potential for further expansion and strengthening of bilateral economic relations, particularly in the fields of agriculture, mining, energy, infrastructure, railways, ICT, food processing, health, education and SMEs. The Indian side proposed that technical delegations would visit DR Congo to identify specific areas of cooperation in the mining sector. Both the sides pledged to find ways and means of enhancing bilateral trade and promoting mutually beneficial joint ventures.

The Indian side gave an assurance of its continued support and cooperation to the Democratic Republic of the Congo in its quest for rapid economic development through technical cooperation and financial & material aid. EAM announced approval of fresh Lines of Credit to the tune of US$263 million for three projects, viz:

- (i) US$45 million Kakobola Hydro-electric power project;
- (ii) US$168 million Katende Hydro-electric power (60MW) project; &
- (iii) US$50 million Kinshasa City Urban Railway System Rehabilitation project.

EAM also announced further assistance in the form of grants in the following fields:-

1. Setting up an IT Centre of Excellence in Kinshasa
2. Setting up three learning stations under the Hole-in-the-Wall computer education project
3. Offer special slots to DR Congolese women for training in solar electrification and water harvesting courses in the Barefoot College, Rajasthan.

The two Foreign Ministers inked a Cultural Cooperation Agreement at the end of their official talks.

The visit to Liberia was the first bilateral visit in thirty-eight years from the Indian side. The last visit was by then Foreign Minister late Sardar Swaran Singh in 1971. A Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on September 16 said: "India and Liberia have close and cordial relations dating back to early seventies, both the countries being members of the Non Aligned Movement (NAM) and sharing democratic values. India has contributed in the UN peace keeping operations in Liberia in the form of a 125-member strong Female Armed Police Unit (FFPU) which is the first ever women contingent in the history of UN peace keeping". Dr Tharoor also visited the FFPU, which was helping maintain law and order in Liberia besides providing armed back up to the Liberian police and security to President Sirleaf.

A 15-member business delegation organised by the Confederation of Indian Industry (CII) representing diverse sectors accompanied Dr Tharoor on the visit. Liberia has rich mineral resources, particularly iron ore, gold, diamonds, copper and nickel. Rubber, Coffee and Cocoa are among its agricultural resources. Several Indian private sector companies are interested in participating in various economic sectors of Liberia and contribute to its economic development.

Dr. Vijayalakshmi Teelock, Chairman of the Aapravasi Ghat Trust Fund, Vice Chairperson and Members of Aapravasi Ghat Trust Fund,

Distinguished Guests, Ladies and Gentlemen:

It is indeed a great honour and privilege to be present with you today on this august and auspicious occasion. I bring to you the greetings and good wishes of the Government and the people of India.

As we commemorate the 175th anniversary of the day of arrival of the indentured labourers from India, I join you in paying homage to your forefathers who landed on this historic site 175 years ago. By celebrating this event, we emphasise that history never forgives those who forget it. By remembering the historic date of November 2, 1834 we offer homage to those forebears who through their sweat and sacrifice, toil and tears enabled us in later generations to live in comfort and security.

A little under a century and three quarters ago a group of people was herded on board the M.V. Atlas to arrive in Mauritius on this day, in what was then a rocky land, inhospitable both from nature's fury and human cruelty, to face lives of unimaginable torment and drudgery, where providing for one's kith and kin was seen as an existential requirement but had to be undertaken in suffering, cruelty and despair. When they left the shores of India, the first group of indentured labourers was lost in the turbulence of the sea and consumed by fear of the unknown. And yet those who landed on these shores became the hardy forebears of a successful future. Their indomitable courage allowed them triumph over darkness, misery and uncertainty that enshrouded their arrival. They found the will to overcome.

The history of these Aapravasis is a story worth telling - one which encapsulates the spirit of humankind embodied in a dedicated, motivated and disciplined group of human beings. The Aapravasi Ghat, which today is inscribed among the list of World Heritage Sites is a living testimony of the legendary details of the legacy of that generation for all the generations that have followed and are yet to come.

Having served in the United Nations for many years as an Aapravasi, I can understand the significance and import of the inscription of the Aapravasi Ghat as a World Heritage Site. The Aapravasi Ghat brings out most poignantly the pain, anguish and sorrow of those resolute personalities and enshrines those first foot-falls which have led to the confident footprint of a resurgent Mauritius.

Mauritius today reflects a success every country -- not only in Africa but globally-- yearns for. We in India take great pride in your many successes and celebrate your many achievements. Your recent recognition by the Ibrahim Foundation as No. 1 for governance in Africa is merely the latest such accomplishment for which we are all thankful to those unheralded and unsung heroes of folklore who came to this Island 175 years ago.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

Mauritius had a role in India's struggle for freedom. The Father of the Indian Nation, Mahatma Gandhi visited Mauritius in 1901, which led to the later visit of Manilal Doctor and the impetus to address the conditions of the labourers and give importance to the need for education. The Father of the Mauritian Nation, Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam, was himself a contemporary in London of the leaders of India's national movement. Since then every Indian Prime Minister, Indian Government and the people of India have enjoyed a special and unique relationship with Mauritius.

India and Mauritius enjoy traditional bonds of friendship and kinship founded on a historical and shared cultural heritage. We are both pluralistic societies where democratic values are cherished and where we give importance to the creative ability and entrepreneurial skills of our citizens. We have opened our doors and windows to the many winds of globalisation but have ensured that we are not swept off our feet by them. Both our countries have striven to promote equality, harmony and peaceful coexistence in our societies with respect for all creeds and faiths. The right of the ordinary citizen is recognised and opportunities are equally available to all. Unity in diversity is the hallmark of both our societies.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen, as we celebrate the successes of Mauritius, I would like to reflect very briefly on the affinities you share with India. India today is the world's largest democracy; it is a vibrant economy; a country with strong sense of social belonging, and with a deep sense of unity in purpose and thought. We have progressed economically and we are ready to share our many successes with our friends and partners to make the world a safe and secure place for future generations.

We in India are grateful to Mauritius for its strong support on issues of cardinal importance to us. We particularly appreciate the support we received from your leaders and your people nearly a year ago when Mumbai was the target of a heinous and dastardly terrorist attack, where one of your own was a victim.

India is ready to share its experience with Mauritius and move towards consolidation and expansion of its multi-dimensional partnership. We are committed to a comprehensive engagement which is mutually beneficial, guided by the thought that we too could leave the world we live in with greater security and prosperity for future generations as those who these shores 175 years ago today.

Vive l'amitié Indo-Mauricienne

Port Louis, November 2, 2009.

Your Excellency Dr. the Hon. Arvin Boolell, Minister for Foreign Affairs, Regional Integration and International Trade

Reputed Ministers of the Government of Mauritius

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

This has been my first visit to Mauritius and I am overwhelmed with the beauty of the place and the warmth and hospitality of the people. I am sure that every visitor to the island would carry the same impression as I do and it is not surprising that Mauritius is one of the most popular tourist destinations in the world. As your new logo rightly says, "c'est vraiment un plaisir". No wonder Mark Twain was bowled over. And as a fond lover of cricket, which I hope Mauritians will take a liking to, I would add that my delegation and I have been totally bowled over by your gracious and generous hospitality.

Diplomatic relations between India and Mauritius were established in 1948. We have come a long way, in fighting together against global challenges, in supporting each other in times of need and in the international forums, in marching hand in hand towards progress and in sharing our resources to ensure mutual safety, security and prosperity. This is not a small achievement given that the world around us has changed and problems have multiplied while solutions have halved. Maintaining a smooth and steady pace consistently in bilateral interactions without ups and downs is the most difficult task of all, given that people come and go and perspectives and priorities change over time. I am happy and I feel honoured to state that Mauritius has been a great and trusted friend of India throughout the years and I hope that you will continue to remain so in the future as well. In fact, even the events of the day which I had the privilege of attending today symbolised the continuity in change in our ever expanding partnership. My day started with the visit to the Samadhi of the Father of your Nation, Sir Seewoosagar Ramgoolam. I was thereafter able to pay homage to your valiant forebears at the Aapravasi Ghat. I followed this by a visit to the Ganga Talao. I was indeed happy to visit Le Morne, the site where the spectrum of Mauritianness stands in full to embody the unity in diversity of your rainbow nation. And it is my pleasure to be with you tonight.

I understand that this year has seen important milestones in bilateral ties, inter alia, the signing of the Intergovernmental MOU and the Agreement between Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd. and the Government of the Republic of Mauritius for the supply of Advanced Light Helicopter Dhruv which will be handed over officially tomorrow. Tomorrow, the MOU and Agreement relating to the supply of Coastal Surveillance Radar System to Mauritius will be signed. I hope the Offshore Patrol Vessel will also be in Mauritius soon. On other issues of primordial concern to both of us, I would say that as mature democracies with pluralistic traditions and a rich history, we will be able to find our way forward. We will give considerable attention to providing scholarships to Mauritian students in our educational institutions and our assistance under ITEC has been enhanced. We will always give due attention to your needs and requirements.

We thank the Government of Mauritius for reiterating your support of India's candidature as a permanent member of the UN Security Council. In the meantime we are grateful for your vote for the non-permanent seat that India is contesting next year for the term 2011-2013. There is close cooperation in multilateral fora such as Indian Ocean Rim - Association for Regional Co-operation which we have to emergize - I am visiting the IOR-ARC Secretariat tomorrow. Terrorism, maritime piracy and climate change pose common challenges and it is important that as partners in development, India and Mauritius should arrive at a common platform at the international forums to address these issues. Reviving this Organisation is a shared interest for both of us. And on the subject of terrorism, may I say how grateful we are that Mauritius has stood with us all along and has been unwavering and unequivocal in condemning the 26/11 Mumbai attack where, Mr. Minister, you so tragically lost one of your own.

Excellencies, if might digress a bit to touch upon developments in India. We had a successful general election this year. The United Progressive Alliance of Prime Minister Manmohan Singh was returned back to office with a greater majority. This will allow us to focus on our primary objective of ensuring that the fruits of the economic success percolate down towards the poor and those in the rural areas. We are also giving greater attention towards the youth in the country. The Government of Dr. Manmohan Singh is committed to the socio-economic upliftment of the broad masses of the people. On the economic front, even though not greatly affected by the global economic crisis, we have seen a drop in our growth rate. However, we have seen a turnaround and are confident that the next year will see us moving back to higher growth rates.

Our biggest challenge is confronting the hidden enemy from without and within. We have not been fully satisfied with the cooperation extended by Pakistan on the 26/11 inquiries. They have been stalling and this been a matter of concern. During his visit to Jammu & Kashmir, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh said that he was ready to discuss all issues with Pakistan - not because of weakness but from a position of strength. All the progress that we achieved has been repeatedly thwarted by acts of terrorism. We will press the Government of Pakistan to curb the activities of those elements that are engaging in terrorism in India. We hope that the Government of Pakistan will take the ongoing actions against the terrorist groups to their logical conclusion. PM Singh called upon the people and Government of Pakistan to show their sincerity and good faith and that India will not be found wanting in its response.

Our relations with China are making progress. The meeting between our Prime Ministers in Bangkok and between the Foreign Ministers in Bengaluru went off well. With the US our strategic partnership has moved significantly forward and PM Manmohan Singh will be on a State Visit to Washington later this month. Our all-encompassing relations with Russia continue to be strong.

India's relations with Africa are strong and consistent. We are partners in progress. India's commitment towards Africa is unbreakable. And in this regard, our partnership with Mauritius occupies a central role - it is pivotal.

I thank Your Excellency for the memorable evening. The tone for my calls on your leaders tomorrow has been well set and I look forward to these meetings and discussions.

Thank you!

555. Remarks by Minister of State Dr Shashi Tharoor during the Handing Over/Commissioning function of the "Dhruv" Advanced Light Helicopter .

Port Louis, November 3, 2009.

Your Excellency Dr. the Hon. Arvin Boolell, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Regional Integration & International Trade of the Government of the Republic of Mauritius

Hon'ble Ministers,

Commissioner of Police,

Commanding Officer of the Special Mobile Force,

Commanding Officer of the Police Helicopter Squadron,

Friends from the Media,

Ladies and Gentlemen

I am extremely happy to be here today to participate in the function relating to the handing over and commissioning of the "Dhruv" Advanced Light Helicopter into the Police Helicopter Squadron of the Mauritius Police Force. "Dhruv" in Sanskrit means the Pole Star. "Dhruv" in the contemporary context of the Advanced Light Helicopter symbolises the beacon light which will further guide the vast expanse of India-Mauritius relations.

Excellency, the commissioning of the "Dhruv" Advanced Light Helicopter today culminates in the fulfilment of the high level agreement in October 2005 during your State Visit to India. It characterises the very essence and content of our cooperation which is extensive in nature and comprehensive in scope. The induction of the "Dhruv" into the Police Helicopter Squadron will not only allow passive patrolling and active search and rescue operations but also will provide an eye in the sky for Mauritius. It would result in an extensive enhancement of the present search and rescue capability and provide strategic depth to policing your extensive Exclusive Economic Zone (EEZ).

The conception and manufacture of "Dhruv" was aimed at providing India with a multi-role, multi-mission, new generation helicopter which would meet International Aviation Regulations and at the same time respond to civil and military operational requirements. The "Dhruv" helicopter is designed both for utility and armed roles with a capability to land on ships in high sea conditions and also on small and restricted helipads. The helicopter is also ideally suited for VIP transport. It could also be associated with disaster relief, emergency medical missions. In the Mauritian context, I am told that the "Dhruv" would be able to fly to some of the islands of Mauritius territory including St. Brandon.

Excellency, Ladies and Gentlemen, the links between India and Mauritius stretch back in time. India takes genuine pride in the many achievements and advances made by Mauritius. India is happy to associate itself in a comprehensive engagement with Mauritius which provides for constant and continuous commitment as we move ahead in our multi dimensional cooperation. We had the pleasure of signing the agreement for providing the Coastal Surveillance Radar System today morning. Indian Naval and Coast Guard Ships have been actively associated in the surveillance of Mauritian waters and shores. Hydrographic surveys have been carried out by Indian Naval Ships. The Offshore Patrol Vessel should join the ranks of the Mauritius Coast Guard in the not too distant future. Today the "Dhruv" joins the ranks of the Dornier and the Chetaks in your Air Squadrons.

India is committed in reaching out to the friendly developing countries in Africa in which Mauritius holds a prominent position. We will work with Mauritius in providing for the security of her land, water and skies so as to ensure that our children and grandchildren are able to live a life which is safe, secure and stable and prosperous. And the "Dhruv" will be able to provide that additional strength in fulfilling this objective.

Vive l'amitié Indo-Mauricienne

Jai Hind! Jai Mauritius!

Thank you for your attention

MOZAMBIQUE*557. Joint Press Interaction of Minister of State for External Affairs Anand Sharma and Minister of Foreign Affairs of Republic of Mozambique Oldemiro Baloi.*New Delhi, February 19, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good evening to all of you and welcome to the Joint Press Interaction. Minister of State for External Affairs would be making an opening statement. Next, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Republic of Mozambique would be making a statement.

Sir, the floor is yours.

Minister of State for External Affairs (Shri Anand Sharma): Mr. Oldemiro Baloi, the Hon. Minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation of Mozambique; distinguished members of the Mozambique Delegation; Secretary, Ministry of External Affairs Shri Nalin Surie; members of the Indian Delegation; and members of the media:

This is the second Joint Commission between India and Mozambique which has concluded today. The senior officials of the two Governments were engaged in discussing the cooperation and also to identify the priority sectors to further deepen and diversify an engagement which is strong, based on trust and friendship.

Our relationship in recent years goes back to the struggle for freedom in Mozambique. India's consistent support and solidarity and after that an abiding commitment to be a true friend and partner in fulfilling, or helping to fulfill the developmental aspirations of Mozambique and its people. We have good understanding between our two countries; and our working together is in the true spirit of South-South cooperation. The various areas of engagement are from agriculture to energy, to rail and coal sector, infrastructure and also, if I may add, what is of importance is capacity building, human resource development through the ITEC programme and the ICCR scholarships of India. We have also been extending lines of credit for specific projects in these sectors which I have mentioned.

We have so far, before this Joint Commission, extended lines of credit of US $ 115 million. We have today made another offer of 25 million as additional line of credit; and another US $ 1 million as a grant from the Government of the Republic of India. There is enormous potential of enhancing the cooperation, which we view as important, in other sectors and expanding (it) when we talk of energy sector as also in oil and gas where Indian majors have evinced interest. Many of our public and private sector corporates have presence; and we do hope that their engagement will further increase. We will also be encouraging more investments in agriculture sector and value addition.

You would know that in April last year we had the first India-Africa Summit. At the Summit, a Framework Cooperation Agreement was adopted which opens new pathways of cooperation between India and Africa, particularly sub-Saharan Africa. At that Summit, Dr. Manmohan Singh, the Hon. Prime Minister of India, had made some major announcements. One of the announcements was on the duty-free and tariff preference access to Indian markets for fifty least-developed countries, which include Mozambique, giving access to the huge Indian market for the products manufactured in Mozambique. We hope that this will help in small and medium enterprises in your country. We would also like to reaffirm our commitment to share our developmental experiences, our technology, in these sectors which we have discussed and identified.

We have also had good cooperation between the two countries in the multilateral forums. We have shared views on the restructuring and the orderly transformation of the political and economic architecture in the world, including the expansion of the Security Council so that it reflects the contemporary realities and is truly representative and democratic.

The Foreign Minister of Mozambique, His Excellency Mr. Baloi has, during our discussions and the Joint Commission meeting, conveyed the sympathies and strong solidarity of the people and Government of Mozambique over the dastardly terrorist carnage in Mumbai; and we deeply appreciate the strong position which has been taken by the Government of Mozambique, by the Africa Union, and our friends throughout the world.

With these remarks, I would like now to invite the Foreign Minister of Mozambique Mr. Baloi to make his statement.

Minister of Foreign Affairs of Republic of Mozambique (Mr. Oldemiro Baloi): Your Excellency Minister Sharma, Minister of State of Foreign Affairs of India; distinguished Indian Delegation; the press; Mozambiquan Delegation; ladies and gentlemen:

Mr. Sharma made a very comprehensive statement that reflects accurately what has been going on during these days. For Mozambique, India is among the strategic partners. We are used to learn from India how to liberate a country from the oppressors, how to move from poverty to development, how to extend friendship and solidarity towards friends, and openness towards the non-friends. So, all those experiences of India are a source of inspiration for Mozambique.

By coming here, we are just willing to give a boost to the excellent relationship that the two countries enjoy. The areas covered by this cooperation cover the whole spectrum of politics, economy, culture and you name it. So, we do not have any kind of hidden space when it comes to cooperation between our countries.

It is touching for Mozambique to see that in spite of the fact that India is facing some daunting challenges in terms of security, which is financially demanding, it still finds space, resources, to keep helping Mozambique. This is really touching for us and we are grateful indeed for the consistent way India has been assisting Mozambique.

But we are basically partners. We also have things to offer in several fields one of them being, for example, the energy sector. We have coal, we have gas; and if we would be lucky, we may have oil one of these days. So, these are resources to be shared with those who have been sharing with us many important things. You are experienced in railways. India is involved in one big project at this point in time. We, most of the time, call it the project due to the huge impact it is going to have on the economy of Mozambique and that of the region.

We are happy with the cooperation with India because it meets the four pillars that we are focusing on to address the issue of eliminating poverty, that is, infrastructure, human resource development. In this regard, particularly, vocational training, improving the skills of the people so that they can at grassroots level, in remote areas and rural areas uplift the standard of living of the poor population there. Third, is the development of the private sector. And fourth, last but not least, is the promotion and attraction of foreign investment. India is involved, heavily involved, in these four pillars. That is why we, among other things, consider India to be among our strategic partners. So, as I was saying, by coming here we want to boost, we want to consolidate this kind of relationship and move as fast as we can to a even better win-win situation.

We also play a joint role. Usually we share the points of view of the positions in the international arena. Now we have a big challenge of taking care or moving on with the reform of the United Nations, particularly of Security Council. At this point in time, we have different groups of friends spread in different positions. We have the Group of 4; we have the Consensus Group; and we have the African Group as well and we usually abide by the African position. So, we think that there are a lot of things to be done yet so that we come closer to a position that is bound to win when we discuss with those who are already there because we have a double challenge here. One is to have a consensus among ourselves, and the other one, the most difficult, is to persuade those who are already there at Security Council that they have to open the space for others. So, this double challenge is something to be won for sure. And for that purpose we fully count on India, its experience, its commitment and determination to go ahead with this.

Once again, I would like to, on my behalf and on behalf of my delegation, thank you for your warm welcome and hospitality. I thank you all.

Official Spokesperson: Excellency, thank you very much for your remarks. The Ministers will now be taking a few questions. I would request you to please introduce yourself and your organization, and also indicate whom the question is addressed to.

Question (Mr Manish Chand, Indo Asian News Service): This question is addressed to Mozambique Foreign Minister. Excellency, what is your view of recent terror attacks in India; and when you speak about strategic partnership how can India and Mozambique and India and Africa as a whole solidify strategic partnership, security partnership, counter-terror cooperation between the two sides?

Minister of Foreign Affairs of Republic of Mozambique: For us, a tragedy in India is a tragedy for Mozambique. As you know, we had to fight hard for our Independence. It was bloodshed, war. A few years after Independence we started being attacked by the apartheid regime, by the Rhodesian regime; and later on we had 16 years of stabilization war. So, we know quite well what suffering is, what bloodshed is all about. This is one issue.

The other one is that the ties with India are so close that whatever happens to India of good, we celebrate; whatever sad we share the sorrow. So, we strongly condemn those attacked. I repeat we strongly condemn those attacks. To the victims and their families, we convey our message of courage and of successful efforts to prevent this from happening again.

Strategically what we have to do is to continue striving in international arena for a world safer and more stable. That is what we will keep doing. We did not address specifically the measures to be taken. This is a very specific field of activity. But the Ambassadors of Mozambique worldwide have received instructions to take a strong position whenever this issue is brought to any table.

Question (Mr Royden D'Souza, NewsX): My first question is to Foreign Minister Baloi. Sir, now that the Bilateral Investment Promotion Agreement has been signed, you have touched upon various areas of joint cooperation and development. Could you point out the main sectors you now hope that India will help Mozambique in?

My second question is to Mr. Anand Sharma. Sir, now Pakistan has acknowledged the nationality of Kasab but there does remain the unanswered questions of their stand on the remaining nine terrorists whose bodies are lying in India. They have not got back to us with very much on that front. I would like to know your views on that, Sir. Thank you.

Minister of Foreign Affairs of Republic of Mozambique: We are in dire need of investments. So, the investment in whatever areas will be welcome. But taking into account the signs we have got from India, or our assessment of India's potential and capabilities, the mineral area, the mining is one area, the textile industry is another one. And very recently we have put forward additional incentives to attract people to that area. We are cotton producers. We export and some one else adds value and sells it back to us. This is ridiculous, while we have friends who have the ability to add value in our own country for common benefit. We would like also to see this kind of investment in areas related to micro, small and medium enterprises because what gives sustainability to an economy is to have an activity that promotes jobs and thus contribute to the fight against poverty.

Minister of State of Ministry of External Affairs: In response to your question, it is very clear from day one where the perpetrators came from. Kasab is the only one who was caught alive, thanks to the courage and sacrifice of Inspector Tukaram Omble. But all others have been identified and named. India has given a comprehensive dossier to Pakistan, the same dossier which Shri Pranab Mukherjee, the EAM had sent to his counterparts in all the countries. Besides India, there are other countries which had specific information. It is not for nothing that the United Nations Security Council identified and named the organization responsible, proscribing, that is banning, the terror outfits, and also identifying and naming the key conspirators who plotted and assisted in carrying out that barbaric attack. Pakistan has reverted to India; they have made admissions about the culpability also about the part of the conspiracy that was hatched in Pakistan.

There are ongoing investigations in India where the charge sheets will be filed. Pakistan has started its investigations. I have no doubt in my mind that once they sincerely implement what they have committed, the investigations would only confirm the painful truth about the identity, about the plotters and about the outfits.

Question (Mr Srinjoy Choudhury, Times Now): Question for Mr Sharma. Sir, just 80 days after the Mumbai attack which you spoke of, there appears to be a ceasefire between the Taliban and the Pakistani Government in the Swat area. The Taliban was held responsible for Benazir Bhutto's assassination, if you remember. First, how does India view this? Also there appears to be a Bangladeshi angle that is coming in the 26/11. Could you tell us a little about that; and if the FIA is actually going to be involved in investigations here, as Mr. Gilani has said yesterday?

Minister of State for External Affairs: As we have said, whatever information and details we can, we will be sharing. Whatever clarifications are sought, we shall give with the very clear expectation that there will be firm, sincere and demonstrated action by the Government and the State of Pakistan to dismantle the infrastructure of the terror outfits and to neutralize those which pose a threat to peace and stability in this region and are a menace to the entire world.

Regarding the Taliban and other outfits, which propagate a cult of violence and terror. The forces which represent religious intolerance and take away the most precious of all the human rights that is the right to life, have to be confronted and defeated because there is no cause which can justify terror and violence against innocent and defenceless people, nor there is any religion which gives sanction to such barbarism. They cannot be, in our view, any differentiation when it comes to such organizations. There cannot be a brutal Taliban and a benign Taliban. Terrorism in all its manifestations, forces of intolerance wherever they are, must be defeated.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you.

559. Statement by the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to the media during visit of President of Namibia.

New Delhi, August 31, 2009.

I am delighted to welcome His Excellency President Pohamba and his delegation to India. This is President Pohamba's first visit to India, and the first State visit to India in the second term of our Government.

Our relations with Namibia have strong historical roots, which predate Namibia's independence. They are warm, cooperative and based on profound understanding of each other's aspirations.

I have had detailed and forward-looking discussions with President Pohamba. We reviewed the current state of our relations and have set out the roadmap for the future. We have decided to inject fresh dynamism in our cooperation in areas such as human resource development, capacity building, trade and economic exchanges, agriculture, transportation, defence, information technology, health, energy and mining.

I renewed India's commitment to cooperate with Namibia within our capacities and capabilities in its economic, social, human and infrastructure development. I conveyed to the President that India stands ready to share its experience with Namibia as it implements its ambitious 'Vision 2030' policy document.

Our partnership with Namibia is an important component of our desire to revitalize our historical and civilizational ties with Africa in keeping with the requirements of the twenty first century. We will work with Namibia to implement the outcomes jointly arrived at the India-Africa Forum Summit held in Delhi in April, 2008.

Finally, I would like to pay a tribute to the vision and enlightened leadership of President Pohamba as he leads his great country towards a better future. I applaud his vision for strengthening India-Namibia friendship.

Based on our discussions and identity of views on major regional and international issues, and the bilateral agreements that have been signed, I have no hesitation to say that his visit constitutes a new milestone in our longstanding relations.

560. Speech of President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patial at the Banquet in honour of the President of Namibia Hifikepunye Pohamba.

New Delhi, August 31, 2009.

Your Excellency President Hifikepunye Pohamba,

Madam Pohamba,

Distinguished Guests,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It gives me great pleasure to welcome Your Excellency, Madam Pohamba, and other distinguished members of your delegation to India. Your historic visit is a manifestation of our shared keenness to build on our historic partnership and pursue a more substantive bilateral agenda.

As the world's largest democracy, we in India, have long viewed with admiration Namibia's continuous march as a standard bearer of unity, plural democracy, social cohesion and stability. Under your able leadership, Namibia is setting an example in securing justice and equity for its citizenry. We laud your efforts to ensure peace, promote development and above all, create opportunities for all to progress under Namibia's "Vision 2030" and the Millennium Development Goals.

Namibia and India enjoy very warm and mutually supportive ties. Our relations are based on a profound understanding and appreciation of each other's concerns and we rejoice at their steady growth. Our two countries have been working hard to broaden and deepen our bilateral engagements. The volume of trade and investment, though small, is growing steadily. It is our desire to continue building a stronger partnership with Namibia. I am confident that your visit to India would open up many more new opportunities for cooperation between our two countries. The MoUs and Agreements signed earlier in the day would contribute to building an enabling framework for further deepening of our political, economic and commercial relations.

India is committed to setting up a number of projects in education, health, agriculture, mining, infrastructure, industry and ITC in Namibia under the grants of the Government of India and Lines of Credit. We will further strengthen our cooperation in human resource development and capacity building under ITEC and other schemes.

Excellency,

Our bilateral relations have been further consolidated through our harmonious interaction at various international fora such as the UN, the Non-Aligned Movement, the Commonwealth and the World Trade Organization. India and Namibia share a commonality of views on major international issues and on combating international terrorism. We welcome your forthright condemnation of the Mumbai terrorist attack and the strong expression of solidarity with India. The fight against terrorism must be given priority and it should be recognized that there is no justification whatsoever for terrorism.

We sincerely appreciate Namibia's consistent and unequivocal support for India's candidature for permanent membership on an expanded UN Security Council. International institutions must reflect contemporary reality.

India greatly values the important regional role being played by Southern Africa Development Community and deeply appreciates Namibia hosting the inaugural India-SADC Forum in 2006. We attach importance to developing our relations with that Forum.

Excellency, a cornerstone of India's foreign policy is to help friends in Africa with their socio-economic development and for the continent of Africa to be at peace and gain its rightful place in the comity of nations. The Delhi Declaration issued after the India-Africa Forum Summit held in New Delhi in April 2008 provides a road map for giving new momentum and dynamism to relations between India and Africa.

Excellencies and Distinguished Guests may I now request you to join me in raising a toast to:-

- the good health of His Excellency President Pohamba and Madam Pohamba; and
- the further strengthening of the bonds of cooperation and friendship between India and Namibia.

SIERRA LEONE

563. Press Release of the Ministry of External Affairs on the visit of Minister of State Anand Sharma to Sierra Leone and Ivory Coast.

New Delhi, January 15, 2009.

Minister of State for External Affairs and Information & Broadcasting, Mr. Anand Sharma, paid successful and highly productive official visits to two West African countries, namely Sierra Leone and Ivory Coast, from January 12-15, 2009. The visits have lent the much-required political thrust to India's bilateral relations with these countries. The warmth and enthusiasm with which the Presidents of both the countries received the Minister is reflective of the significance they attach to their ties with India, as also the high esteem in which they hold our country. The President of Ivory Coast, Mr. Laurent Gbagbo's impromptu decision to confer upon the Minister their highest civilian award, namely the Commander of the National Order of Merit, is in recognition of his distinct role in strengthening India's relationship with Ivory Coast and the African continent.

The Minister's hectic schedule in both the countries was marked by his meetings with their Presidents, Foreign Ministers and other key Cabinet Ministers. Deliberations with them centered around India's growing economic ties, a broad congruence of views on multilateral issues, principally the UN reform and UNSC expansion, reshaping of global financial architecture, and above all, the vociferous condemnation of the Mumbai terror attack and the forces behind it and expression of solidarity with India in its combat against terror.

Recognition of India's leadership role, its economic strength, and above all, its willingness to share its expertise, technology and development experience was clearly evident during Minister's visit to the two West African countries. India's wide-ranging programmes of bilateral aid and assistance for them, encompassing areas like agriculture, education, health, capacity building, infrastructure and IT etc. have benefited large segments of their societies and have evoked a wide recognition of India's contribution to their socio-economic development. An IT & BT Park, being set up in Ivory Coast with India's assistance, and named after Mahatma Gandhi by the President of Ivory Coast, will likely emerge as a shining example of the Indo-Ivorian co-operation.

The signing of a Joint Technical and Economic Co-operation Agreement by the Minister and his Sierra Leonean counterpart, Mrs. Zainab Hawa Bangura; the handing over of the 200 military barracks (out of 400) to Sierra Leone as the Government of India's gift, and participation in the inauguration of the Ministry of External Affairs-funded Centre for Demonstration and Promotion of Technologies in Abidjan were some of the highlights of the Minister's visit to the two countries.

SOUTH AFRICA

564. Media Briefing by Official Spokesperson on the visit of Vice President Hamid Ansari to South Africa.

New Delhi, May 6, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good evening. Welcome to the Media Hall.

First of all, let me introduce my colleague who is here, Joint Secretary P. Harish. He is with the Office of the Vice-President. I would brief you about the visit of Vice-President to South Africa.

Vice-President leaves on the 8th of May to attend the formal inauguration of His Excellency President Jacob Zuma who is the fourth elected President of South Africa. Vice-President would be accompanied by his spouse and also a number of senior officials including Secretary (West) Mr. Nalin Surie; Secretary to Vice-President Mr. Sheriff; and a number of other officials.

You are aware of the historical and multi-faceted ties between India and South Africa. I would particularly like to note that there is a large presence of people of Indian origin in South Africa currently estimated at 1.5 million, which is close to 2.5 per cent of the South African population.

Talking history for a moment, you are all aware that India had been at the forefront of the international community's efforts in supporting the struggle against apartheid. We were the first foreign country to impose an embargo, complete embargo, in 1946 against the then regime. I would like to recall that the African National Congress set up a Rep Office in New Delhi as early as in the 1960s.

Soon after the talks opened between ANC and the then Government of South Africa, in May 1993, the Indian Cultural Centre was set up at Johannesburg. In November 1993, full diplomatic and consular relations were restored between India and South Africa.

Relations have since gone from strength to strength. In 1997, a strategic partnership was initiated between India and South Africa which covers a whole gamut of areas. Some of these areas - I would touch upon them now or I could cover them in questions later - include trade and investments, culture, health, human resource development, tourism, science and technology, sports. While talking sports, let us not forget cricket. I think this is a shared love between India and South Africa.

I am happy to note that India and South Africa enjoy common or similar perceptions on a number of major issues, international issues of interest to both our countries. South Africa, along with India and Brazil, is a member of IBSA. You would recall that the Third IBSA Summit was held in New Delhi in October last year when the then South African President had paid a visit.

South Africa is one of our largest trading partners in the African continent. In the Financial Year 2007-08 our trade had already crossed 6.25 billion dollars. While the figures are awaited, I understand that in the Financial Year 2008-09 the trade has gone up a further ten per cent. So, we are looking at something like seven billion dollars. India is also a significant investor in South Africa. South African companies are also present in India and investing. A number of Indian banks are present and operating in South Africa.

In broad terms this is the nature of cooperation that we have with South Africa which is multi-faceted. Both countries are constantly looking at opportunities of deepening this engagement which is a mutually beneficial engagement. The visit of Hon'ble Vice-President at this important occasion underlines the historic bonds and abiding friendship between our two countries as well as a common determination to add more content and depth to our strategic partnership.

I would walk you through very briefly the programme of the Vice-President. He leaves for Johannesburg on the 8th forenoon. In the evening, they are in Johannesburg. Next day, he leaves for Pretoria to participate in the formal inauguration ceremony. A number of Heads of State and Government are also coming to attend the inauguration. We are awaiting details. We have some details, more are coming in. There will be an informal interaction between the visiting Heads of State and Government. On Sunday the May 10th, the Vice-President leaves for New Delhi. Late in the night on the 10th, he is back in New Delhi. That in a nutshell is the programme.

If there are any questions on the visit, I would be happy to try and address them.

Question: Will there be any bilateral meetings other than the general programme?

Official Spokesperson: There will be a number of informal interactions. The programme will come to you as it is being finalized. As you can see, the window that is available is rather small. As we see it, there will be a number of informal interactions, pull-asides, meetings and so on. That is how it is being conceived at the moment. But, let us see. The programme is evolving. We will see how it plays out.

Question: Will the Vice-President be calling on the South African President?

Official Spokesperson: Let us see how it plays out. The programme is evolving. We see a number of informal interactions in particular happening. But the programme is evolving.

TANZANIA*566. Press Release of the Ministry of External Affairs on the 7th India - Tanzania Joint Commission meeting on Economic, Technical and Scientific Cooperation.*New Delhi, January 15, 2009.

India has set up a Small Scale Industry Centre in Dar es Salaam recently, and IT Centre is expected to be ready by mid- 2009.

567. Speech of Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor at the Valedictory Function of the India-Latin American & Caribbean Conference on Cooperation for Sustainable Food Security. New Delhi, December 1, 2009.

It gives me great pleasure to be present here for the valedictory session of this very timely and important Conference on Cooperation for Sustainable Food Security. At the outset, I would like to congratulate IFFCO for taking this extraordinary initiative. I believe this is IFFCO's third international conference on this most pertinent topic that is drawing global attention today.

2. The High Level Conference on World Food Security in June 2008 at FAO Rome has reiterated that the food situation is indeed deteriorating in the face of mounting challenges of high food prices and climate change variations. The Conference pledged to undertake immediate as well as long term measures to diffuse the situation. It also pledged to enhance food security as a matter of national policy.

3. India and Latin America are today faced with common prospects and challenges in their endeavour to achieve food security. Both the regions are largely agricultural economies where the people are dependent on land; both are endowed with rich bio-diversity, fertile lands, variable cropping patterns, and abundant rainfall. But equally, hunger, poverty, diminishing returns on land, erratic climate patterns and access to capital are common problems. It is, therefore, only natural that our two regions come together to cooperate and collaborate in fulfilling our long term objective of food security.

4. India is home to nearly 1/5th of the world's population. About two-thirds of India's population, nearly 700 million people are directly dependent on agriculture for their livelihood. But ironically the share of agriculture in our national GDP has declined to just around 18% while the share of other sectors such as manufacturing and services has appreciably increased. The Green Revolution of the sixties had tripled food production and had helped our country to achieve a food surplus. But after nearly three decades since its initial success, the fall in agricultural productivity levels seems to indicate that either the Green Revolution has run its course or we have failed in giving it the continued attention it deserved. Erratic monsoons, floods and cyclones in our part of the world as well as in Latin America & the Caribbean constantly threaten food production. The decline in farmers' income is adding to their misery and prompting them to abandon their agriculture practices and choose alternative livelihoods such as laborers and construction workers, resulting in migration, a growing urban-rural divide and disruption in family ties and community bonds. While paying tribute to the father of the Green Revolution, Dr Normal Borlaug who passed away recently in September 2009, I recall here his prophetic words delivered in his 1970 Nobel Peace Prize acceptance speech, when he thanked the Nobel commendation Committee for their "perspicacity and wisdom to recognize the actual and potential contributions of agricultural production to prosperity and peace among the nations and peoples of the world." Even today, almost 40 years hence, this is a vital part of what we continue to seek to accomplish.

5. Therefore the challenge before us is immense. At the outset we need to refocus on the centrality of agriculture in the development process in order to tackle poverty and hunger once again. This demands that our governments make conscious efforts to introduce policies that incentivize agricultural production. It means greater public investments in agriculture, enhanced support and procurement prices, the provision of easy access to credit, including micro-credit, lab-to-land research and timely delivery mechanisms. These are not easy solutions and will require political will on the part of the governments and greater public awareness.

6. In the recent past, our government has made enormous efforts to alleviate the sufferings of small and marginal farmers who constitute more than 50% of the agricultural community. In an extraordinary effort in 2008, the government has waived nearly Rs.60,000 crores of farmers' loans - equivalent to over $12 billion - held by small and marginal farmers. Although this is no small measure, it only provides temporary relief to our farmers. We need new agricultural strategies and technologies that ensure enhanced agriculture production against depleting water resources and shrinking cultivable land. India has only 4% of the world's available fresh water resources and 140 million hectares of cultivable land. The changing lifestyles of the vast majority of our middle classes, rapid urbanization and construction activities are eating up the land as well as depleting water resources. Unpredictable monsoons are drying up ponds, lakes and diminishing water flows in our rivers. Inter-state river disputes are becoming a common feature of our national political life because of the scarcity of water. Our two regions will need to cooperate and collaborate on ways and means to recharge ground water and at the same time to introduce drought-resistant crops.

7. There are bilateral mechanisms with individual countries that facilitate cooperation in agriculture and agricultural research. Some of the agricultural research and practices currently prevalent in Latin America and the Caribbean - relating to production, distribution and consumption - are widely acknowledged to be highly efficient, enabling some economies to achieve higher agricultural growth rates with a contribution to GDP as high as 30%. Our bilateral cooperation mechanisms should look into exchanging best practices for our mutual benefit. We should also encourage our entrepreneurs to explore the possibility of joint farming in those regions where large surplus land-tracts are awaiting investments. India could be an important market for agricultural products from Latin America for cereals, pulses, vegetable oils, and other commodities. The demand will only grow with projected higher economic growth rates. Keeping this in view, it would be beneficial if governments in the region reoriented their investment policies so as to permit, indeed facilitate, greater Indian investments in agriculture in Latin America and the Caribbean.

8. The cornerstone of the WTO's Doha round is the agriculture sector where the developed and the developing countries are working to achieve common ground on agricultural subsidies. It is important to understand the linkages amongst poverty, hunger and market access. Market access for the agricultural products of the developing countries is directly proportional to income generation in the agricultural economies. This distortion needs to be corrected. Climate Change is another issue that calls for our continued collective engagement and cooperation, whatever be the outcome of the Copenhagen conference next week. While we will voluntarily introduce methods and measures to protect our environment and the rich bio-diversity of the region, we should insist on the principle of 'common but differentiated responsibilities' of the developed and developing countries on emissions. As the increase in food prices is linked to high fuel costs, we should also evolve a suitable integrated energy policy that involves the use of bio-fuels and renewable energy sources. In this regard our two regions could cooperate and collaborate in clean energy technologies.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

9. My Ministry, the Ministry of External Affairs, is fully supportive of the 'Focus Latin America' strategy. We will support all initiatives that will strengthen our linkages with this important region where there is enormous potential for cooperation between us. I am confident that this three-day Conference on food security has deliberated in depth on all the vital aspects of our long term strategy of ensuring food security for our two regions. I am also confident that the Action Plan drawn up by this Conference will be successfully implemented with the support of both industry and Government. I offer the full support of the Ministry of External Affairs, the Latin America and Caribbean Division of the Ministry and my own personal commitment towards achieving our goals of heightened cooperation between India and the Latin American and Caribbean countries in joint agricultural development. Mahatma Gandhi had said, "To a man with an empty stomach, food is god." Let us make this our mantra for action on food production.

Thank you.

Both sides recognized that negotiations must respect core Ministerial mandates such as Special and Differential treatment for developing countries, less than Full Reciprocity (LTFR) in tariff reduction commitments and a comparable level of ambition in Agriculture and Non Agriculture Market Access (NAMA). Argentina and India remain committed to engage constructively for reaching a fair and balanced result in the Doha Round. They called on developed countries to show greater flexibility for resumption of negotiations to enable successful conclusion of the Round.

29. The two sides recognized that Climate Change is a global challenge with strong economic, environmental and social dimensions. It impacts all countries, but is particularly severe for developing countries, given their vulnerabilities, inadequate means and limited capacities to adapt to its effects.

30. They agreed that, in the fight against climate change, priority has to be given to mitigation and adaptation and this has to be supported by developed countries in terms of transfer of technology and finance to meet the incremental costs of adaptation and mitigation projects in developing countries.

31. Both sides reaffirmed their commitment to addressing Climate Change in accordance with the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change [UNFCCC] and enhanced implementation of the Convention under the Bali Action Plan, so as to reach an agreed outcome at COP15 of the UNFCCC in Copenhagen.

569. Speech by President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Banquet in honour of the President of Argentina Dr. Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner.

New Delhi, October 14, 2009.

Your Excellency President Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner,

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

We are privileged to have in our midst the President of the Argentine Republic, a country with which we have had traditionally warm and friendly relations. It is a country that Nobel Laureate Rabindranath Tagore visited in 1924-25 and which inspired him to write a number of poems which were published in his work "Purabi".

We are particularly pleased, Excellency, that you have chosen India for your first visit to Asia since you assumed the Presidency of your great country in December, 2007.

We have watched with admiration, your untiring efforts and that of your distinguished predecessor, President Nestor Kirchner, in the service of your people and the success you achieved in taking your great country forward. Argentina's achievements in agriculture and allied fields, in industry, in science and technology have been remarkable.

Your visit is taking place at a time when we also mark the 60th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between our two countries. It is an appropriate moment in our relations, therefore, to chart a new and substantive partnership between our two countries. I am confident that following your visit, our cooperation in trade, industry, investment, culture, agriculture, hydrocarbons, science & technology, and outer space will be strengthened. We are happy that our two sides have agreed to set a trade target of US$ 3 billion to be achieved by 2012. It is our hope that the current international economic and financial crisis notwithstanding, we would, in fact, be able to exceed this target over the next three years.

For the effective development of our bilateral relations it is equally important that we enhance cultural, youth and parliamentary exchanges. Our film industries can collaborate more effectively and sporting exchanges enhanced. Argentine skills in football and polo are acknowledged all over the world. Your sports persons, especially in football, have large fan followings in India. I understand that India's ancient and rejuvenating practice of Yoga and Ayurveda has a good following among your people. Both countries could greatly benefit by intensifying cooperation in these spheres.

India and Argentina have a tradition of cooperation in international organizations - in the United Nations, WTO and the G-20. In the context of the current international financial and economic crisis, it is particularly necessary for us to ensure that the development prospects of developing countries are not adversely affected. It is also crucial that developing countries have an effective say in decision-making processes so that their developmental imperatives find strong support.

Terrorism is an international scourge. India has been a victim of terrorism for over two decades. The vibrant city of Mumbai was subjected to violent terrorist attacks last year which were masterminded from outside. We appreciate Argentina's condemnation of the Mumbai terrorist attacks and the expression of solidarity with India. Our Mission in Kabul has been attacked twice. The second attack occurred only a few days ago. Such terrorist incidents are now being indiscriminately perpetrated all over the world. The world community must work collectively to resolutely defeat the forces of terrorism and we look forward to jointly working with Argentina in combating international terrorism.

Excellency,

We are two democracies with shared values and principles. We have similar approaches to many global issues and are committed to the socio-economic development of our people and to social justice. We have clear commonalities and complementarities in our economic systems and a commitment to convert these into concrete cooperative activities. We must not lose any more time in grasping opportunities and strengthening our partnership.

Before I conclude, I would like to share with you the lines written by Rabindranath Tagore during his stay in Buenos Aires in the early 20th Century in his poem 'Bideshi Phul' or 'Alien Flower'.

"O alien flower, when I asked,
What may be your name,
You smiled and nodded, and I realized
In a name what was there.
In nothing else

But in your smile is all that we have need

To know you."

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

I would now invite you to join me in a toast to:

- the health and well-being of President Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner;
- the prosperity and well-being of the friendly people of Argentina; and
- a strong and long-term partnership between India and Argentina.

BRAZIL*570. Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on the External Affairs Minister's meeting with Business Community at Sao Paulo (Brazil).*New Delhi, August 31, 2009.

CANADA*571. Remarks of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Joint Press Interaction with the Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.*New Delhi, November 17, 2009.

His Excellency Prime Minister Stephen Harper,

Ladies and Gentlemen.

It is a great honour for me to extend a very warm welcome to Prime Minister Stephen Harper on his first visit to India as the Prime Minister of Canada. This had been a long overdue visit and we are extremely honoured that Prime Minister Harper has been able to accept our invitation.

Relations between India and Canada are of a long standing nature. They derive their strength from our shared values of democracy, respect for fundamental human rights and multiculturalism. Canada is host to a large Indian origin community of over one million. This reflects the strong people-to-people links that exist between us, and which have enriched our relationship.

Our bilateral relations have greatly strengthened since Prime Minister Harper assumed office. This is particularly true in the areas of trade and investment. A large number of Indian corporate entities have invested in Canada and several Canadian companies have entered the Indian market. There are however vast opportunities for doing much more.

There is significant scope for greater investments by Canadian companies in areas of high technology and infrastructure development, and enhancing cooperation in the areas of science and technology, agriculture, mining, natural resources, education, and energy. The Memorandum of Understanding we have signed on Energy will facilitate greater cooperation in this very wide area. We look forward to cooperation in the field of civil nuclear energy.

To further boost our trade, which is currently below 5 billion US dollars, we have decided to set up a Joint Study Group to examine the possibility of a bilateral Comprehensive Economic Partnership Agreement. We are also working to further strengthen the institutional mechanisms for cooperation such as a Bilateral Investment Protection and Promotion Agreement and a Social Security Agreement.

We have decided to organize a year-long Festival of India in Canada in 2011 to showcase India's culture and economic progress, and have invited Canada to organise a similar Festival in India.

We reviewed the process of global economic recovery and how we can prepare for the next G-20 Summit which Canada will host. We had a useful exchange of views on climate change, energy security, nuclear disarmament and regional issues.

I conveyed to Prime Minister Harper India's grave concern over the scourge of international terrorism and the threat posed to pluralistic societies like India from extremist ideologies. We reaffirmed our commitment to deepen our cooperation to counter these threats.

Prime Minister Harper's visit has imparted a fresh momentum to India-Canada relationship. We will take all the necessary steps to further intensify our interaction in all areas.

Thank you.

US Secretary of State, Mrs. Hillary Clinton, made a telephone call to External Affairs Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee today.

The call, which was to take place yesterday, could not materialize as the External Affairs Minister was away to Kabul and took place at 8.00 p.m. on January 23, 2009 (9.30 a.m. Washington time).

Both Ministers agreed that they would like to further strengthen the excellent bilateral relationship between India and the USA.

EAM conveyed his best wishes and invited Secretary Clinton to visit India at a mutually convenient date.

583. Media Report on the visit of Foreign Secretary Shivshankar Menon to Washington.*Washington, March 11, 2009.

The daily Hindu quoting the Press Trust of India from Washington, reported on March 12 that the new Obama administration on March 11 assured India that "it will proceed with the landmark India-U.S. nuclear deal, signed during George W. Bush's tenure, and said the two countries needed to ramp up cooperation in counter-terrorism and global issues such as climate change." Senior State Department officials gave the assurance to Foreign Secretary Shiv Shankar Menon, who was on a four-day official visit to Washington.

On March 9, Mr. Menon met Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and discussed the nuclear deal, counter-terrorism cooperation, bilateral issues, Sri Lankan conflict and bringing the situation under control in war-torn Afghanistan. During his talks with Under-Secretary for Political Affairs Nicolas Burns on March 11, Mr. Menon discussed the landmark civil nuclear deal and other bilateral issues.

Ms. Clinton told Mr. Menon that the two countries needed to ramp up their cooperation in bilateral and global issues. "The India-U.S. civilian nuclear deal, its current status and the way forward too were discussed during the meeting," State Department Acting Spokesman Robert Wood told reporters. "I think there was a bit of a discussion on the additional protocol that was just worked out with the IAEA [International Atomic Energy Agency]," Mr. Wood said.

"It was a very, very good meeting - very warm meeting," Mr. Wood said referring to the first high-level meeting between the two countries. The Mumbai terror attack also figured during Mr. Menon's talks with Ms. Clinton, Mr. Burns and National Security Adviser General James Jones. "I think the way they discussed the issue was the fact that we've got to do what we can to try to prevent these types of attacks from happening again."

"I think you can view it in the overall level of cooperation that both the United States and India are involved in," Wood said. The spokesman said there were a number of issues where the U.S. and India could work together. Ms. Clinton and Mr. Menon also talked a bit about Afghanistan and what needed to be done. "Secretary was very interested in hearing Foreign Secretary Menon's views on this subject as well as a host of others," he said.

On Afghanistan, Ms. Clinton listened to the Indian viewpoint and did not ask India to do something specific. "It wasn't so much that we were asking India to do anything specifically. But the Secretary wanted to hear the Foreign Secretary's views on the best way forward in Afghanistan, from the Indian point of view. That was, in essence, the basis of the discussion," Mr. Wood said.

On climate change, Ms. Clinton and Mr. Menon talked in general about the importance of working together to try to deal with the issue of climate change and global warming, said Mr. Wood, who was present during the meeting. Mr. Menon met key Congressional leaders Jim McDermott, co-chair of the India caucus at the Congress; Howard L. Berman, Chairman of House Committee on Foreign Affairs; and Senator Richard Lugar.

London, April 2, 2009.

President Obama: I just wanted to say a brief word about the importance of relationship between the United States and India. We are the world's two largest democracies. India, like America is full of diversity, full of energy and it is a complicated place like the United States is complicated.

But there are very few countries that have such a strong affection and affinity between the two as between India and the United States. What is also true is that, I think, the United States sees India as a global power, and a critical partner in helping deal with the challenges of twenty first century. Everything from climate change, to poverty, to trade, to science and innovation.

Much of the growth and rise of India I think can be attributed to the wisdom of its Prime Minister, who helped to unleash the economic power of India, and is now guiding it to a host of challenges, to a host of opportunities.

So I just wanted to express my admiration for Prime Minister Singh. I am grateful for the time that I have with him here in London. I hope that by the time the summit is over, I can call him a friend.

And I look forward to him visiting the United States, and I look forward to visiting India. Thank you.

Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh: Mr. President, your wisdom and transformatory leadership has aroused hope and expectation all over the world. For young people in diverse lands, you are a role model. I mentioned to you that when I was coming here, my daughter said she wanted a favour from me and I said, what is that favour? She brought a book of yours and she said I would cherish if you could persuade President Obama to autograph this book. And you were gracious enough to do that.

Mr. President, there is enormous respect and admiration for you as an individual, for the values that you stand and the ray of hope you have imparted to oppressed people in all parts of the world. We in India respect you enormously, and I bring you greetings from our President, Mrs. Pratibha Patil, the Government and the people of our country and I have every reason to believe that under your distinguished and visionary leadership, India's relationship with United States would grow from strength to strength. As you have said, we are two democracies. We have common value systems. We believe in individual freedom, we believe in respect of fundamental human rights, we believe in the rule of law. And over the year our two societies, the civil societies- have grown to like each other enormously.

Today Mr President, eighty thousand students of India are studying in the United States. There is hardly a middle-class family in India, which does not have a son, a brother or a brother-in-law working in the United States. These are permanent bonds which bind our countries together.

Our relations with the United States are very good and Sir, in the last five years that I have been the Prime Minister, it has been my top priority to work to strengthen our relationship with the United States in every possible area. I said our relations are very good, we are strategic partners, but we cannot be satisfied with the status quo. And under your distinguished leadership, we are going to chart out a new path of collaboration in diverse fields- in economics, in dealing with the challenges of climate change, in dealing with the challenges of energy security, in dealing with the challenges of terror, how to make this world secure from the menace of terror, to work together in bilateral fora, to work together in multilateral fora. We share your vision.

Mr President, you wrote a letter to me before you became the President on 23rd of September, and I think that's a beautiful agenda for our two countries to work together, to realise our dreams of closer and closer relationship with the United States under your distinguished leadership.

And I do look forward to- the people of India would love to have you with us, your gracious wife, your children, and I sincerely hope you can plan to visit India early enough. A very very warm welcome awaits you Sir.

* In reply to a question, the Prime Minister said he raised the issue of protectionism in general but did not go into specifics such as H1B visas for Indian software professionals. Mr. Obama replying to a question said that they discussed terrorism emanating not only from Pakistan but also from Afghanistan. Mr. Obama went on to suggest that "it may make sense to create an effective dialogue between India and Pakistan in this nuclear age and at a time when perhaps the greatest enemy" of the two countries should be poverty.

India and USA will be setting up a Joint Working Group in education headed by the Union Minister of Human Resource Development of India and its equivalent from the USA. This was decided in the meeting between Shri Kapil Sibal, Hon'ble HRM and Mr. William J Burns, Under Secretary, Political Affairs, US State Development who had a meeting today. The Joint Working Group will meet once every year alternately in India and USA and will focus on institutional linkages in the field of Secondary Education, Higher Education and Vocational Education. The US side expressed keen interest in pursuing a Bilateral Education Dialogue with India for fruitful cooperation in the field of education.

Shri Kapil Sibal, while interacting with US delegation stated that the 21st Century will be a Knowledge Century and India with its young population, will be a major provider of trained workforce to the entire world. He was looking forward to cooperating with the US in the education sector. The HRD Minister underlined that one of his focus areas would be bringing up the gross enrolment ratio to even beyond 15 as envisaged in this plan. He also clearly stated that fly by night operators would not be tolerated in the education sector.

India tops the list of countries sending students to USA for studies. Nearly 90,000 students annually go to US from India for studies as per estimates available in recent years.

587. Press Release issued by the Embassy of India in Washington on the talks on India - United States bilateral cooperation in the Civil Aviation Sector.

Washington, DC, June 12, 2009.

Mr. Madhavan Nambiar, Secretary, Ministry of Civil Aviation, Government of India, accompanied by Director General of Civil Aviation, Dr. Nasim Zaidi; Chairman, Airports Authority of India, Mr. V.P. Agrawal and other officials, visited Washington DC during June 10-12, 2009. They held useful meetings with officials of the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA), the Department of Transportation (DoT) and the US Trade & Development Agency (USTDA). The delegation was the first foreign delegation to meet with Mr. Randolph Babbitt, who was appointed earlier this month as the Administrator of FAA.

The objective of the visit was to review the progress in implementation of the Open Skies Agreement signed in April 2005 and the Aviation Cooperation Programme (ACP) signed in June 2007 and to discuss issues of mutual concern.

In the meetings, Secretary Nambiar recalled the steady increase of air traffic between the two countries since the signing of the Open Skies Agreement stimulating the bilateral economic partnership and strengthening people to people contacts. The two sides discussed the future direction of the bilateral cooperation and agreed to work towards making ACP more productive for India in its efforts to modernize the civil aviation Industry and to meet the challenges of its rapid expansion in terms of safety, technology and communication support and air space management.

It was agreed that the next India - US Aviation Summit would be held in the US on mutually convenient dates in December 2009.

During the visit, an agreement was signed between the US Trade & Development Agency and Directorate General of Civil Aviation of India to fund a number of projects under the US - India Aviation Cooperation Programme.

This was the first senior-level official visit from India after the elections. This also reflects the leading role of the civil aviation sector in the commercial and economic relationship between the two countries. Over 2004-07, India imported more than $11 billion worth of aviation-related products from the United States.

589. Joint Statement after the meeting of the U.S.-India Counterterrorism Joint Working Group.

Washington, DC, June 17, 2009.

Delegates from the United States and India held the 11th US-India Counterterrorism Joint Working Group today to discuss efforts to coordinate global counterterrorism initiatives. Ambassador Daniel Benjamin, the Secretary of State's Coordinator for Counterterrorism, hosted the event and the Indian delegation was led by Mr. Vivek Katju, Special Secretary for International Organizations at the Ministry of External Affairs.

India and the United States strongly condemned terrorism in all of its forms and manifestations, recognizing it as a major threat to democracy, international peace, and security. They reiterated that there can be no justification for any act of terrorism on any grounds. It is imperative for the international community to come together to combat terrorism in a long-term, sustained, and comprehensive manner. India and the United States also called upon all states to abide by their commitments under the UN Global Counter Terrorism Strategy adopted by the UN General Assembly in September 2006.

Sessions during this year's meeting focused on assessing the global terrorist threat, fighting terrorism through technological advancements, and counterterrorism cooperation between India and the United States. Other issues discussed included terrorist finance and money laundering, capacity building, and expanded information sharing. Both sides agreed to identify measures to strengthen institutional linkages leading to closer interaction and cooperation.

The Next Meeting of the Joint Working Group will take place in India on a mutually convenient date.

Washington, DC, June 17, 2009.

Commerce and Industry Minister Mr. Anand Sharma met with Secretary of State Hillary Clinton today. She said that the Obama administration was keen to work on developing a more comprehensive and intensive bilateral relationship to build on the progress over the last fifteen years*. The discussions covered the effect of the economic downturn on the two economies and the way ahead for WTO negotiations. The Minister said that while a perfect solution may be elusive, it should be possible to find a fair solution acceptable to all parties, while keeping in mind that development was central to the Doha Round. He also briefed Secretary Clinton about the programmes being undertaken by the Government to stimulate domestic demand while providing a social security net to the most vulnerable sections of the society, including through the successful implementation of the national Rural Employment Guarantee Programme. The Minister said that the Government was looking forward to the forthcoming visit of Secretary of State to India and expressed confidence that her leadership would give a special impetus to the relations between the two countries.

Speaking at the Annual Summit of the United States India Business Council, which was also addressed by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the Minister underlined that the existing level of trade and economic engagement was not commensurate with the potential which existed in the wake of India's far-reaching economic liberalization. Citing the findings of the study entitled "Contribution of the Indian industry to the US economy" prepared for the India Brand Equity Foundation which he released at the Summit, the Minister mentioned that over 2004-07, Indian industry had contributed USD 105 billion to the US economy and created 300,000 jobs. This, he said, revealed a story of commitment to optimize and to invest in the future of the relationship. He underlined that India and the US were partners in progress and could together shape the 21st century.

* Another press release of the Embassy issued a day earlier underlined the importance of the India-US economic relations and said: "Trade & economic relations are core elements of the India-US strategic partnership. Trade has grown rapidly since 2004. The Value of bilateral trade increased from $ 21.7 billion [US exports -$ 6.1 billion & Indian exports - $ 15.6 billion] to $ 41.7 billion in 2007 [US exports -$ 17.6 billion & Indian exports $ 24.1 billion]. Despite the economic crisis, trade continued to grow in 2008, though at a slower rate -the total value reached $ 43.4 billion [US exports - $17.7 billion & Indian exports -$ 25.70 billion]. Major items of export from US include Machinery, Aviation & aircraft, Precious stones & metals, Electrical Machinery and Fertilizers. Major items of export from India include: Textiles, Precious stones & metals, Iron & Steel products, Organic Chemicals, Machinery (including Electrical Machinery) and Pharmaceutical products.

Other senior US Government officials who participated in the Summit were the US Commerce Secretary Gary Locke and US Trade Representative Ambassador Ron Kirk.

The Minister interacted with key leaders of US and Indian industry during the Summit which attracted an attendance of over five hundred.

Later in the day, Minister met United States Trade Representative Ambassador Ron Kirk. This was his second meeting with Ambassador Kirk; the two had met on the sidelines of the Cairns Ministerial Group meeting in Bali. Both sides discussed bilateral issues of mutual interest and explored the ways and means for increasing bilateral trade and investment. They agreed to revive the dialogue on trade issues and to focus on resolving them to the extent feasible. The Minister emphasized that there were numerous opportunities that could be harnessed in the bilateral economic relationship even against the background of the global downturn. They welcomed the move towards resumption of Doha talks and agreed to work together towards resolving outstanding issues. Minister Sharma invited Ambassador Kirk to visit India for the meeting of the G 20 Trade Ministers as well as for bilateral discussions.

Services trade in 2007 (latest data available), was $19 billion in two-way trade which was fairly evenly balanced. U.S. exports of private commercial services (i.e., excluding military and government) to India were $9.4 billion in 2007; an increase of 37.1 percent over 2006, other private services (education), and travel categories accounted for the largest proportion of U.S. exports in 2007. U.S. imports of private commercial services from India were $9.6 billion in 2007, an increase of 25.6 percent over 2006. The other private services (business, professional, and technical services) and the travel categories accounted for most of U.S. services imports from India.

Investment has increased in both directions in recent years. U.S. is one of the largest foreign direct investors in India. Cumulative FDI inflows from USA till July 2008 were $7.96 billion. FDI inflows from USA constitute about 8 percent of actual FDI inflows into India in rupee terms. The sectors attracting FDI from USA are: Fuels (Power & Oil Refinery), Telecommunications (radio paging, cellular mobile & basic telephone services), Electrical Equipment (including Computer Software & Electronics) Food Processing Industries (Food products & marine products), and Service Sector (Financial & Non-financial Services).

The Minister also had a meeting at the US Congress with the leadership of the Sub-Committee on Trade of the House Ways and Means Committee. In his meeting with Chairman of the Sub-Committee on Trade Representative Sander Levin and Ranking Member Kevin Brady, the focus was on the Doha Round. The Minister shared with the congressmen some details of the steady growth in Indian investments in the United States.

Ambassador Meera Shankar hosted a dinner reception in honour of the Commerce and Industry Minister in the evening, which was attended by a number of Congressmen, officials and business leaders from India and the U.S.

Tomorrow Minister Sharma is scheduled to have bilateral meeting with United States Commerce Secretary Mr. Gary Locke. He is also scheduled to deliver an address at the Peterson Institute for International Economics on "India in a Globalised World".

Indian investments have grown rapidly in the last 5 years. Over 2004-08, Indian companies entered into investment deals amounting to over $ 18 billion in diverse sectors such as steel, aluminum, oil, pharmaceutical, engineering, hotel and information technology sectors.

In recognition of the importance of the economic and commercial dimension of the relationship, a number of bilateral dialogues have been institutionalized between the two countries. These include inter-governmental forums like the Economic Dialogue, the Trade Policy Forum and the Commercial Dialogue as well as private sector initiatives like the India-US CEOs' Forum and the Private Sector Advisory Group."

591. Press Conference by Commerce & Industry Minister Anand Sharma at Willard Inter Continental Centre, Washington, DC
Washington, DC, June 18, 2009.

MODERATOR: (Mr. Rahul Chhabra) - It's give me great pleasure to welcome Mr. Anand Sharma, Commerce & Industry Minister. He's been here in Washington for less than two days. As you're aware, he arrived the day before. He's had several bilateral meetings. He's met his counterpart; he's met Secretary Clinton and several others. He's attended several events in Washington. You saw the press release that was issued last night.

We also have Ambassador Meera Shankar here today with us. Welcome, ma'am. At this moment, just in case you haven't already turned your cell phones to silent, please do turn them off to silent. And the minister is leaving straight from here; in fact, he's leaving for New York. So without any further ado, may be we could go straight to questions. He's ready to take questions right off. Thank you. Please introduce yourselves and the organizations you represent before you pose questions. Yes, please.

Q: Jim Berger from the Washington Trade Daily. Your predecessor talked a lot about not jeopardizing the welfare of the rural poor in India, which you also discussed today. Yet you indicated that there's a possibility of a compromise in the Doha round. I just wonder if you can explain if there's any movement on the special safeguard mechanism, which was designed to protect rural poor farmers.

ANAND SHARMA: You see, there's a very clear position. The Doha round is dedicated to developing countries. So development is at the core of the Doha process. Why the need was felt, both by the developed and the developing countries, has to be put in a historical perspective. It was to correct accepted distortions in global trade, which denied access and a level playing field to the developing countries. There are many issues, which were involved, and as the discussions progressed, other areas got covered.

But when it comes to the issues pertaining to the weak, the poor, the vulnerable, especially in the least developed countries or the developing countries - where perhaps two-third of the population is dependent on agriculture for subsistence - it is subsistence agriculture, not commercial agriculture. That distinction was recognized as the round developed.

So that is where we stand and I'm sure that those sensitivities have been taken onboard by everyone. If those sensitivities had not registered, we would not have moved forward and reached the stage where we did. And let me add here that it is also important for the world to remember that three-fourths of the agricultural workforce of the world comes from the poor countries.

Q: Thank you. Mr. Minister, Shobana Chandra from Bloomberg News. With exports declining for the past seven months, the government has already announced a bunch of measures to help out exporters. Do you agree that more relief measures are needed now, on top of the ones that have been announced? And also, do you have an estimate for how many jobs may have already been lost in the whole process? Thank you.

MR. SHARMA: As I said, the present economic crisis has affected countries across continents - some more adversely, some less adversely. Without quantifying in specific details, India may be one of the countries which is less adversely affected because of the sound fundamentals of its economy. That is the reason, perhaps, that why we have the FDI flows, which are encouraging. In the month of May itself, we have 2 billion (dollars) of FII money coming into India. It's because of the stability and strength of the Indian economy, which is reassuring to the investors.

Having said that, it's also very clear that we have been affected adversely, our exports have been. And there has been average shortfall, or decline, of over 30 percent, which we need to correct. And for that, one has to make our exports attractive and competitive, both - price-wise, too, because many of the exports, which have been impacted, are directly connected to labor-intensive industry, leading to loss of jobs. This is the duty of the political leadership and the government to correct that. We will do everything that is possible.

We have had detailed consultations with all the stakeholders - the chamber of commerce and industry - and with our officials. Based on that, I have discussed this matter with the Finance Minister, Pranab Mukherjee, and his team, only this Monday. We have given our recommendations and suggestions. I hope much of that will get reflected in the budget.

There were two stimulus packages which were earlier given. We want the continuation of some, including interest intervention, easy availability of credits, rollover of credits, duty drawbacks, DEPBs. Plus we will see what more can be done. At the same time, we will be having a real re-look at the foreign trade policy after the budget is presented. What more can be done beyond that will come in the foreign trade policy, which I will be unveiling in August.

Q: Chidanand Rajghatta, the Times of India. Minister, just to follow up on Jim's question, there's a sense that you and the current government are a little more flexible on Doha. I know your statement shows you intend to re-engage. So I'm wondering, is this because the government has returned with a stronger mandate and feels emboldened to re-engage? Or do you have any specific assurances, as you said, that you hope your sensitivities have registered with the developed countries - so, do you have assurances? Also, can you give us a sense - do you feel less burdened by being a Rajya Sabha member, whereas your predecessor -

MR. SHARMA: I think that's not a fair question at all.

Q: Can I finish the question, sir?

MR. SHARMA: Yes. You've made an observation.

Q: I was asking. It was a question.

MR. SHARMA: Okay. Now let me come to that. The last one - the first. As somebody who's been in public life for all his adult life, I'm rooted to Indian realities, sensitivities and national priorities no less, if not more. So it's not a question of individuals. Nation-states' policies are not determined by individuals, but by the leadership of the countries. Here, we have, in Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh a leader with a vision, comprehension, understanding of what the global situation is, what India's own priorities are.

Second, when it comes to our statement about resumption of the Doha process, India had never said that it should collapse. Yes, it hit a logjam - that is part of history. Now, either we dissect that and keep on analyzing and reanalyzing, or try to pick up from where we had reached and move it forward. A practical and correct approach is not to let it go waste what was invested over the years, but to accept the progress, which is substantial and significant. It's like a marathon. It is a 25-miles marathon. The first 24 miles consumes a lot of energy. By the time you reach there, you are exhausted. And the last lap looks difficult and everybody wants to surge. But that's where we are. We would like, now, to shore up the energy reserves and cover the last lap. There's no change when it comes to issues and concerns.

When it comes to flexibility - your question - flexibility has to be there in the first place. If you are inflexible, you cannot walk and sit on a negotiating table for a global treaty, particularly this one, where three-fourths of the world was seeking correction of distortions, which were established and accepted.

So when you sit on that table, you have to be open. You have to be flexible. It's not a question of who's more flexible and who's less flexible. You must not lose sight that it is to correct the infirmities. And particularly, for the developing countries. I don't think that when positions are taken by nation-states, those positions are divorced from the larger picture. It would also be not fair to take governmental positions as individual positions. The logjam that we had hit is unfortunate. That was because of non-convergence on many issues.

And I would not like to go into specifics. Many of you who are sitting here are aware that non-convergence was not on one issue but on many issues. We hope that we'll find a common meeting ground. As I have said to my interlocutors - both in Bali, at the Cairns Group meeting, yesterday and today - that we must try and harmonize the respective positions. That is important. You must understand, when countries come as sovereign nations to a negotiating table (they come) with different perspectives, positions, different levels of development, different level of challenges and aspirations, each country - developed and developing. Why do the negotiations have to take place? When the countries come together, the leadership of the countries agree that there is a need to correct the distortions and to harmonize the respective positions. And that can only be done by give and take to find the middle ground. And I see that; that is what we intend to do; that is what is achievable. If you remain rooted and frozen in the pre-negotiating position then no negotiation for global treaties is possible, what is the need of the hour is a rule-based multilateral trading regime which takes on board the developmental aspirations of the poor countries at the same time ensuring better access for all and that's what we shall be striving for.

I've been speaking to my counterparts, ministers from other countries including USTR Ron Kirk whom I met in Bali and now again yesterday and ministers of other countries. We'll be meeting again, I'll be meeting with Peter Mandelson and the EU trade commissioner hopefully in London within a few days, and then we meet again by next week in Paris on the margins of the OECD ministerial. We must kick-start (the round). I would again make another addition here. The present dismal global economic scenario is a challenge and an opportunity. The countries who can play a role, who can define the roadmap must work with sincerity and openness to give a hope to millions across the globe. When there is a tendency to raise protectionist barriers that we will allow free movement of people, free movement of trade and services.

Q: This is Lalit Jha from Press Trust of India. You are the first cabinet minister to come to the U.S. after the formation of the new government. And the last two days you had a series of meetings with the Obama administration, with congressmen too. What is the sense you are getting, what is the focus of the new administration towards Indo-U.S. relationship? And what will be the main focus for the next five years?

MR. SHARMA: Well, I have no doubt in my mind that President Obama and his administration attach enormous significance in engaging India. Not only I find that there is a healthy respect for India, the values that it espouses, but also the vision and the policies of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh. Especially when it comes to the global crisis, given his sound understanding of the international economics, his counsel is much sought. India and America are two largest democracies on this planet: multiracial, multicultural, in every sense pluralistic. Our two countries can contribute a lot because we are constitutional democracies. And even when it comes to the roles which nations play, though it cannot be compartmentalized purely on trade and economics, is the history, the respect, the economics, and much more is related to that. But I found not only respect but hope and commitment. And I'm sure that both countries have the shared wish and commitment to take it forward.

Well, in our opinion, protectionism is counterproductive for any country because protectionism at a time when we are talking of kick-starting the Doha development process would actually go against that spirit. Protectionism in any legal format would also subvert the multilateral processes. Protectionism, any protectionist barrier, would prolong the present economic recession and further delay any turnaround.

Q: *Natasha Israni with Times Now. Moving ahead on the line of protectionism, again, was this a topic of discussion specifically in your talks here in Washington, D.C., and also are there any specific steps that the Indian government is thinking of taking to counteract any negative effects of protectionism?

MR. SHARMA: Well, all the countries do eventually take action in policy measures to uphold the supreme national interests. But at the same time, India is committed to multilateralism; we are against any protectionist barriers. There are some issues which are there, which we have raised it with my interlocutors. And I'm sure that has registered.

Some of the areas that I feel that there is lack of comprehension or information because, particularly when you look at the services sector, it's an important component when it forms a major component of the Indian exports. What is perhaps not fully appreciated, that our outflow of services is evenly matched by the inflow of services.

So that is what is important and through our friends in the media for me to communicate. Also when you have the Fortune 500 companies, a hundred of them have their R&D hubs in India, 220 of them source their software from India. And don't forget, if India has such a huge IT industry, where does the hardware come from?

So that's why any protectionist barrier is dangerous. Indian industry has brought, in five preceding years excluding the last one, over $106 billion in economic activity and created 300,000 jobs. IT industry alone has created - Indian IT industry - 250,000 jobs in America. So when it comes to H1-B visas, it's only 24,000, one can stretch it to 30,000. But it is reciprocity which has to be acknowledged and appreciated. And that's why I said any kind of protectionism will not only be counterproductive but deepen the recession, delay the recovery.

Q: If I can just do a follow-up on that, you said at the beginning that there are steps that every government would take to counteract any negative effects. Can you talk specifically with what kind of steps can the Indian government -

MR. SHARMA: Like we are taking in the form of stimulus to our industry, particularly labor intensive industry by giving them loans at reduced rates or credit rollovers. So that's what any government would do; you have stimulus packages being rolled out by every country. But those are not protectionist. Those are protectionists in a different sense.

MODERATOR: The gentleman at the back.

Q: Mr. Minister, my name is Brian Yang, based at Pharm Asia News. I have two questions related to pharmaceutical companies in India. One is regarding the EU, one is regarding the U.S. The EU is seizing the Indian generic drugs and the Indian government is thinking to take the issue to the World Trade Organization. What is your opinion on this?

MR. SHARMA: Can you expand more on that?

Q: On June the 12th, the Indian government is looking at the World Trade Organization, the WTO, to talk about the Europeans who are taking the Indian generic drugs, the shipment. You know, the Indian generic drugs, they are shipped to other countries including the European countries. And the EU has taken those drugs under control and the Indian government -

MR. SHARMA: So you are talking about the seizures in Netherlands.

Q: Yes, right. Thank you, exactly what I was talking about. Another question is about FDA, because FDA -

MR. SHARMA: No, let me first answer this. Now, when it comes to Indian generics, let me put this in a correct perspective. The arrival of Indian generics changed the pharmaceutical discourse globally. Before the arrival of the Indian generics, there was a suffocating stranglehold of multinational cartels particularly on anti-retrovirals and lifesaving drugs which were beyond the reach of poor countries.

This issue was ethical, not commercial. It was first fought on the soil of Africa, in South Africa. When the issue of Indian anti-retrovirals came up, and at that time the cost of ARVs per person per annum was between 13,000 to $15,000. It was brought down in one stroke to $1200; today it is in the vicinity of $600. That is a huge contribution.

At that time, this was litigated, the multinational cartels went to the court in South Africa and they lost. So let's put in a proper perspective: We know that there have been many attempts to discredit Indian generics because they have posed a larger challenge. I put it more in the ethical perspective than the commercial one. But even if you have to look at the commerce, then commerce should be favoring the poor and the vulnerable.

I come from a country where the father of my country had said two things among the seven sins which he listed way back in 1929. And that was: science without humanity and commerce without morality. So you have to be very clear - this entire debate or the questions which are raised on the seizures are not on the validity or the authenticity; it's pure commercial considerations.

And let me go a step forward. I know that I am going to touch the hornet's nest. Recently, when there were appeals worldwide because of the pandemic - the swine flu having been upgraded, unfortunately, to category six - with those who have the vaccine, the Tamiflu, to make it available on concessional rate - without my naming it; you name them - these are the same forces, same multinationals who have refused to lower the price. It is as recent as day before yesterday. Now, let the world judge.

Q: Sam Gilston with Washington Tariff and Trade Letter. If positions in the Doha round are a matter of national positions rather than individuals or personalities and you didn't indicate that there was any new mandate from the election from the Singh government in the Doha round, why should we expect any different change in the outcome of these talks than we've seen for the last seven years? There was no change then, at all, that we can see besides the very fond comments that Mr. Kirk had about you yesterday.

MR. SHARMA: Let me put it this way: Did we fight elections in America or in India on Doha round?

MR. SHARMA: No, I'm afraid not. Neither President Obama nor Prime Minister Manmohan Singh - no, we didn't. Sorry but the non-convergence was not linked either to our elections or to American elections. To be fair to both, both had issues, and other countries, too, had issues. Why you can have the hope is because you have strong governments in position. My prime minister has a very clear commitment that this round being dedicated to development must be taken to its successful conclusion.

That's the mandate which I have from my Prime Minister, who feels that in the present economic crisis which the world is facing, this will be a positive message for global trade barriers to be broken down further and global trade to move, which will help economies across the globe. And I'm sure that President Obama wishes the same and that's the feeling what I got from Ron Kirk. You see, when political leaders discuss issues, we would paint the larger canvas, not be bogged down by smaller details. If you have the larger picture firmly in mind and you are committed to take it forward, the details can always be filled in. I'm optimistic.

Q: Just a follow-up: Did Mr. Singh not have that position in July - last July? Did Mr. Singh not have that commitment to completion of the round last July when they were close to an agreement?

MR. SHARMA: India never lacked that commitment. I said there was non-convergence on many issues, not only confined to India.

Q: Thank you, sir. Raghubir Goyal for India Globe and Asia Today. Mr. Minister, two quick questions: one, as far as trade between the two countries - last year we had some problems like in November, December during the Bush administration -

MR. SHARMA: Which paper do you represent?

Q: India Globe and Asia Today. There were some problems last year between USTR during the Bush administration and India because they were saying that India is not fair as far as trade between the two countries. What I'm asking is - also there was a mango diplomacy that time. One, if we are going to see again those mangoes in the U.S. markets, which I presented to last year to President Bush and also this year to President Obama -

MR. SHARMA: Okay, okay.

Q: And second, sir, as far as creating jobs and economics are concerned, as for nuclear issues concerns, that you think would bring more jobs in both countries and will bring more economics, where is this issue in our standing as far as between the two countries because one paper which was -

MR. SHARMA: Learn to ask crisper questions. I have understood your question.

Q: Yes, sir. Thank you.

MR. SHARMA: First, mango diplomacy must continue; it's always sweet. (Laughter.) And this time the crop is small but I hope it continues. Mangoes of different varieties come in alternate seasons. Secondly, when it comes to trade, I would refrain firmly from commenting on personalities or specific periods.

Thirdly, nuclear commerce will generate employment in both the countries - more in America. More revenue for this country. I'm sure the U.S. administration, the former president and the present one recognize it with clarity. Engaging with India in nuclear commerce is not only sound economics but a sound investment in the future of humankind addressing the twin issues of energy security and climate change.

Q: My name is Has Mukh Shah.

MR. SHARMA: I know you.

(Laughter)

Q: Thank you, sir. Your visit over here has created a lot of optimism among the U.S. companies, because yesterday -

MR. SHARMA: I'm happy to hear that. I hope in the U.S. government, too.

(Laughter.)

Q: Although - but they have - like India, they have their own political compunction, as you know, especially outsourcing. Now, there are two major issues between the two countries bilaterally: One is outsourcing, another is the so-called trade and tariff barriers in India and free entry into the agriculture sector - the U.S. and developed countries wants to enter it. But you have expressed optimism that despite all those things, the Doha round of talks must succeed. So can you see our perception about this?

MR. SHARMA: You see, bilaterally, our economic relations are very satisfactory and sound and that exchange will continue. We'll look at other areas where we can expand. When it comes to multilateral trading regimes, those issues are not addressed bilaterally. We have - we exchange notes, we take each others' sensitivities on board. When it comes to outsourcing, it would be, to my mind, not the right thing to look at it negatively. As I mentioned, that outsourcing has generated more employment in America itself.

Indian industry, Indian FDI in America is more than America's FDI in India. Indian investments are more. Globally, if you look at acquisitions and mergers in the last one decade, it is India which takes the lead. In America, if we have taken 24,000, 30,000 to put it maximum, H-1B visas, then we have also created huge employment. Things have to be put in a proper perspective and you in the media should help in communicating the correct picture because sometimes we in politics do not get it.

MR. SHARMA: Last one.

Q: Thanks so much. You talked about, you know, possibly wanting continuation of some stimulus measures for exporters. Would you say it's too early yet to say that the worst of the export declines is over for India? Or - are you getting any sense at all? Industrial production we saw a slight improvement. What about just the -

MR. SHARMA: I'll put it very honestly: The green shoots which were being talked about in March have shriveled, globally. So there is no confirmation as to when it gets bottomed out. In India, there is an increase in demand of the capital goods and our economy's again on a positive trajectory. All the projections for Indian economy have been updated, not by India but by the international agencies. We've recorded 6.7 percent as the figures came out last month. We will only go up. I'm confident that we will cross 7 percent threshold soon and will end the year at 8 percent so - which is good. Prime minister hopes by 2011 we'll again take it back to 9 percent-plus.

One factor has been the growth in the domestic demand, primarily because of the increased expenditure. It's not a knee-jerk reaction to the global economic crisis. There are many national initiatives in place, which have only been expanded where public spending has been there; that has led to a spurt in growth, particularly for capital goods. We have lost jobs in exports. We have lost foreign exchange earnings in exports. I'm not in a position to make any forecast as to when the present recession will bottom out in major markets, the preferred and the traditional destinations for Indian exporters.

We will continue to hope that these markets get revived and we are able to expand our exports to these markets, particularly in those sectors which are important, labor-intensive where we are critically engaged, not only IT. I'm talking of those concerning really the common people in India - the leather exports, the handicrafts, the garments, the textiles - we would look at that. At the same time, we are also clear of the need for market diversifications.

There are markets as well in the world where we are engaged, like any country is, engaged globally, which are doing well and we would be looking at every possible measures to give us stimulus and to revive exports. But one thing we are very clear: There must be a distinction between stimulus as an incentive or a legislative protectionist measure as a stimulus. That must not be confused.

MODERATOR: Thank you. Thank you so much. Thank you, Minister.

592. Press Release on the visit of the US National Security Adviser to India.

New Delhi, June 26, 2009.

US National Security Adviser General James L Jones visited New Delhi at the invitation of Shri M. K. Narayanan, National Security Adviser on June 25-26, 2009. This was General Jones' first visit to India. Dialogue between the National Security Advisers of India and the USA is one of the several bilateral mechanisms in the India-US relationship. The visit provided an opportunity for both sides to review the current state and future growth of the India-US partnership.

General James Jones conveyed President Obama's commitment to expanding bilateral relations* in all areas, and the importance attached by the US Administration in working with India in shaping events in the twenty first century at the regional and global level. Shri M.K. Narayanan conveyed the desire of the Government of India to build a wide-ranging and mutually beneficial relationship with the United States, based on the successes of the past, our shared values and converging interests.

Apart from bilateral issues, the situation in Afghanistan and Pakistan, and global issues such as terrorism were discussed.

During his visit, General James Jones also called on the Prime Minister and Defence Minister.

* Since the take over of the US Administration by President Obama it was the first visit by the senior most Obama official who on arrival said: "We intend to continue where the previous administration left off." The daily The Hindu quoted Indian officials to say that Gen. Jones's focus was on the big picture. "The broad message General Jones brought with him was that they want to continue what was done earlier and build up the relationship." Topics covered included the situation in Afghanistan, Pakistan and terrorism. A U.S. embassy release said the two sides also talked about the post-election situation in Iran, energy and developing closer economic and trade links as well as defence ties between India and the U.S.

Asked whether the U.S. side had also sought to push India towards a dialogue on Kashmir with Pakistan -something the Pakistani Prime Minister's office had advertised General Jones's mission to include - the officials said this was not the case. A senior Indian official clarifying the mandate of the visit was quoted by media to say: "I think the American effort, in fact, was to bracket us with the larger set of global issues and see what we can do together, rather than to narrow the bracket to the region.....Afghanistan and Pakistan also came up, but mainly because of our security concerns." Speaking to The Hindu, Mike Hammer, spokesman of the U.S. National Security Council - the White House inter-agency coordination body and 'think tank' which General Jones heads - said the NSC had recently been restructured to enable a more focused approach to India. The region of South Asia had been split with a separate director now responsible for Afghanistan and Pakistan and another, Donald Camp, looking after India.

593. Press Release of the Ministry of Defence on the meeting between the US National Security Advisor and the Minister of Defence A. K. Antony.

New Delhi, June 26, 2009.

India and the US have called upon the International community to jointly fight terrorism. These views were expressed during a meeting between the visiting US National Security Advisor General James Jones and the Defence Minister Shri AK Antony here today. The two leaders expressed satisfaction at the progress in various aspects of bilateral relations. The US National Security Advisor said that Washington was eager to consolidate its relations with New Delhi in all spheres. Terming India as an emerging global power, General Jones said that the Indo-US partnership will be crucial to regional and global peace and stability.

594. Extract from the Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary during the G-8 Summit.

L'Aquila (Italy), July 9, 2009.

* * * * *

Question: Mr. Menon, anything more on bilateral meetings? With President Obama? Can you tell us something more?

Foreign Secretary: I told you what they discussed. They discussed bilateral relationship; they discussed how to enhance partnership; what we will do; how we are preparing for Secretary Clinton's visit. We are now at the stage where frankly we do not have issues that divide us. We have issues that we are working on together to try and take them forward. So, it is very hard to give you that kind of story.

Question: Pakistan?

Foreign Secretary: Pakistan was mentioned but very briefly.

Question: Nuclear cooperation?

Foreign Secretary: Nuclear cooperation, not between them. We will discuss it when Secretary Clinton comes.

Question: Will the Prime Minister go on a bilateral visit to the US?

Foreign Secretary: Nothing was decided. There is an invitation for him to go. There is also an invitation to President Obama to come to India. Both have been accepted. PM has also been invited to the G-20 in Pittsburg also. So, let us see. There is talk possibly of an MEF meeting. The UN General Assembly is holding a special session on climate change also just before the General Assembly session. So, there is a lot of possibility but nothing is certain right now.

595. Joint Press Interaction by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna and US Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton.

New Delhi, July 20, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Vishnu Prakash): Good evening and welcome to the joint press interaction. EAM will be making an opening statement. Next Secretary of State would be making a statement. Sir the floor is yours.

External Affairs Minister (Shri S M Krishna): -- Ladies and Gentlemen of the Press, it is my pleasure to welcome her Excellency, Secretary of State of the United States of America, Madam Hillary Clinton and distinguished members of her delegation.

Secretary Clinton is no stranger to India. Her deep and abiding interest and commitment to India has helped shape the US policy of close engagement with India. Secretary Clinton not only had a key role in the founding of the India Caucus in the US Congress, the largest congressional grouping focused on strengthening relations with any foreign country, but she has been a staunch and sincere advocate of the strengthening of US-India relations.

She was one of the key supporters of the historic agreement between our two countries on Civil Nuclear Cooperation which was realized through a bipartisan effort in the US Congress and the desire to add qualitative substance to the US-India relationship.

Our talks covered a comprehensive agenda encompassing the full range of global and bilateral issues of mutual concern and interest.

India and the United States of America regard each other as global partners. Our two democracies can play a leading and constructive role on the global level in addressing the urgent global challenges of our times. The agenda of our dialogue today reflects this global dimension of our partnership. With that vision to guide our path, we have created new forums for meaningful dialogue on climate change, disarmament and non-proliferation. We also recognize the importance of ensuring that the steps planned to revive the global economy should safeguard the priorities of sustainable development and the goals of poverty alleviation in the developing world. Ours is a shared commitment to a rule-based multilateral trading system and we will continue to speak out against protectionism. Cooperation, trade and investment between India and the United States can play a constructive role in the revival of the world economy.

We have held useful discussions on the situation in our region. In our discussions today, she and I also reaffirmed the unequivocal commitment of both our countries to resist the threats to our two democracies from the scourge of terrorism.

In our bilateral partnership, Secretary Clinton and I have focused on the new agenda for US-India "3.0" in which we will build on the excellent economic and political partnerships that already exist, redefine some of our dialogues to make them more result oriented and create new dialogues for achieving shared objectives in areas of mutual interest.

Our Governments have concluded three important agreements (i) on creation of a Science & Technology Endowment Board (ii) a Technical Safeguards Agreement which will permit the launch of civil or non-commercial satellites containing US components on Indian space launch vehicles and (iii) we have agreed on the end-use monitoring arrangements that will henceforth be referred to in letters of acceptance for Indian procurement of US defence technology and equipment.

The new dialogues that Secretary Clinton and I announce today - on health, education, science & technology and women's empowerment - will impact positively on areas of vital interest and concern to the daily lives of our two peoples.

We have issued a Joint Statement on all these initiatives. A fact sheet on the new bilateral dialogue architecture has also been put out. We will now have frequent high level contacts to reinforce these dialogues.

Before I invite Secretary Clinton to say a few words, I would like to say what a pleasure it has been to receive her here; I am more than confident that with her commitment and leadership of the dialogue process from the US side and our equal enthusiasm and commitment, the initiatives that our Governments will work on will benefit both our peoples.

US Secretary of State (Mrs. Hillary Rodham Clinton): Thank you so much Minister Krishna for the warm welcome that your country has shown me and for the very productive conversations that we have had today.

As I told the Minister and Prime Minister Singh earlier, I have come to India deeply committed to building a stronger partnership between India and the United States, a partnership based on common interests, shared values and mutual respect. President Obama and I share this commitment, and he sends his greetings. We believe that cooperation between our two countries will be a driver of progress in the 21st century.

Since I arrived here, people have asked me, "Can you pledge to maintain the positive US-India relations that President Clinton and President Bush worked to build?" And I tell them that I can pledge more than that. We will work not just to maintain our good relationship but also to broaden and deepen it. To that end, our Governments have agreed to a strategic dialogue built on the five pillars in our Joint Statement. Minister Krishna and I will co-chair this dialogue and we have asked senior officials across both of our Governments to take the lead on each of these subjects.

A significant part of the President's Cabinet will participate - the Secretaries of Agriculture, and Trade, and Energy, and Education, and Finance, and Health and Human Services, and Homeland Security and more. We do not, however, intend for this to be a dialogue between Ministers, or even between Governments, but between our nations and our peoples, our scientists and business leaders, our civil society activists and academics, charitable foundations, farmers, educators, doctors, entrepreneurs, and the whole range of each of our countries. Nor do we see this dialogue simply as a forum for discussing important issues. We believe it must be a forum for action; that the Indian people and the American people share many traits; and one of them is that we like to roll up our sleeves and get things done. We look to this dialogue to deliver results that will benefit the people we represent as well as regional and global progress.

We have shown progress already by finalizing important agreements today including an End-use Monitoring Agreement that will pave the way for greater defence cooperation between our countries and a Technology Safeguards Agreement that will set up commercial partnerships in space, as well as a science and technology agreement.

I am also pleased that Prime Minister Singh told me that sites for two nuclear parks for US companies have been approved by the Government. These parks will advance the aims of the US-India Civil Nuclear Agreement, facilitate billions of dollars in US reactor exports, and create jobs in both countries, as well as generate much needed energy for the Indian people. We hope that India will be able to approve the liability legislation that will enable our US companies to seize these important opportunities.

These meetings today were a very productive precursor to the new strategic dialogue. We discussed every important matter, particularly our shared efforts to fight terrorism and violent extremism. We talked about pragmatic approaches to climate change and clean energy and how we can build on areas of common ground while narrowing areas of disagreement, moving toward Copenhagen. We will do our part to confront the threats that we face and we will hope to deepen the commitment that both of us already have to meeting these threats.

We discussed our common vision of a world without nuclear weapons and the practical steps that our countries can take to strengthen the goal of nonproliferation. And I affirmed the Obama Administration's strong commitment to completing all of the remaining elements of our Civil Nuclear Deal.

We also know that both of our countries play a critical role in the G20 discussions about how to spur global economic growth and recovery, expand trade and commerce, reduce protectionism, and create fair global trading rules. Each of our countries, as you would expect, have different perspectives about the problems we face and how we will solve them. But as the oldest democracy and the largest democracy in the world, we believe we can work through these differences in our perspectives and focus on shared objectives and concrete results. I hope that an expanded partnership between the US and India will be one of the signature accomplishments of both of our Governments. And I plan to make this a personal priority, Minister Krishna.

As a sign of the importance of this relationship to the United States, I was pleased to extend an invitation earlier today to Prime Minister Singh from President Obama, inviting Prime Minister Singh to Washington on November 24th for the first state visit of our new Administration.

At a time when the headlines are filled with challenges, the relationship between the United States and India is a good news story. And I believe, Minister, that it is going to get even better. Thank you very much.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you, Madam Secretary. The Ministers would be happy to take two questions from each side. When your name is announced please introduce yourself and your organization. I would also request that you may please limit yourself to one question either to the External Affairs Minister or to the Secretary of State.

Question: Mr. Krishna, there have been dramatic developments in the 26/11 case today with Ajmal Kasab confessing in court; and it seems to be like the pieces of a jigsaw falling into place with a number of developments over the last few days - the Pakistani dossier, we understand the Indian side has been very pleased with that, the charge-sheet in the case. Do you think that finally some substantial steps are being taken by Pakistan with regard to this case?

And Madam Secretary, I wanted to ask you whether it is your Administration's policy to prevent the transfer of enrichment and reprocessing technology at the Nuclear Suppliers Group. If so, do not you think that that would undermine the spirit of the nuclear deal?

External Affairs Minister: Thank you very much. We would like to have a friendly relationship with Pakistan. We would like to be good neighbours. India is willing to do everything possible to make that happen. But, unfortunately, the attacks unleashed on Mumbai caused a great setback to the Composite Dialogue which was going on between India and Pakistan. Well, since then at the highest level there have been political exchanges. Prime Minister of our country has spoken to the President of Pakistan. Very recently he has had an interaction with the Prime Minister of Pakistan. As a result of that we look forward that when the United Nations General Assembly meets there would be an opportunity for the Foreign Ministers of these two countries to continue this dialogue.

US Secretary of State: As I understand your question, it was whether we oppose the transfer of processing and enrichment technology, well, clearly we do not. We have just completed a civil nuclear deal with India. So, if it is done within the appropriate channels and carefully safeguarded, as it is in the case of India, then that is appropriate. But we are very much opposed to unauthorized and inappropriate transfers that unfortunately can take place by certain countries or non-state actors doing so. So, there is a right way to do it and there is a very wrong way. We are seeking the advice and suggestions from India about how we can prevent the unauthorized and dangerous transfer of nuclear technology and material which poses a threat to the entire world.

Question: Madam, there has been an accumulation of grim news in Afghanistan this month. There was a capture of the American soldier, there was the Taliban video of him in captivity, there was a bit of fast-rising death toll among coalition forces, the number of American troops killed this month already is the highest for any month since the war began almost eight years ago. I wonder if you take the responsibility for a diplomatic failure to get more assistance and support from allies and coalition partners. And if I may ask you a related question on Pakistan, you said just today that some of the people associated with the 9/11 attacks are hiding in Pakistan. Today the Pakistani Government denied that. I wonder if you could just say what makes you so sure that they are in Pakistan.

US Secretary of State: To the first question, it is deeply regrettable and tragic that we have had the loss of life by our Marines and soldiers in the last week since they have aggressively pursued the Taliban in Southern Afghanistan. We are very concerned about the kidnapping of our American soldier, and are working to do all we can to obtain his safe release. But I think it is unfair to link the tragic loss of Americans in the battle against the Taliban and their associated terrorist allies with a failure by our allies. The last weeks also brought the largest loss of life for British soldiers. Others of our allies are engaged in combat not only in the South, but are upholding the line in the North. And I think that the commitment by ISAF and others to support this offensive against the Taliban is commendable. We are bearing the brunt of the battle because we have put more troops into it. But we are very grateful for the contributions and the sacrifice of so many who have come to the aid of Afghanistan and the Afghans themselves who are also on the frontlines sacrificing to try to bring peace and stability to their country. This is a very difficult battle. But it is one that we feel must be waged and we have a strategy that the President has approved and we are implementing it.

With respect to the location of those who were part of the planning and execution of the attacks of 9/11 against our country, we firmly believe that a significant number of them are in the border area of Pakistan. We have conveyed that to the Pakistani Government and others. We are actively looking for additional information that would lead us to them.

Question: Madam Secretary, as far as the Bush Administration was concerned and now the new Obama Administration is concerned, we have seen that there is a sense of feeling that this new Administration is more concerned and inclined towards deepening its relationship with China and Pakistan. Do you share that thought? What is your comment on that?

US Secretary of State: My comments have demonstrated very clearly the significance and importance of our relationship with India. We enriched this relationship to broaden and deepen it as partners already on the world stage. What we have outlined today will be a significant expansion of our bilateral relationship. We also have a very important set of issues that we are pursuing with Pakistan, with China, and with many other countries around the world. But I do not think you can understate the significance of our relationship as two democracies. We understand the difficulties of decision-making in democracies; and we respect the vibrancy of each other's democracy. That is a much stronger base for a relationship than any other in the world because it is democracies that are able to expand an understanding of common interests and show mutual respect; and that is what is at the core of broadening relationship between us.

Yes, of course, we have relations with other countries. You know, the United States is called upon to act globally every single hour of every single day. But, as the invitation to Prime Minister Singh - the first State Visit in the Obama Administration - demonstrates, we are very committed to this relationship.

Question: Secretary Clinton, did you specifically discuss, either with External Affairs Minister Krishna or with Prime Minister Singh or with other Indian officials, the possibility of restricting exports of gasoline and other refined petroleum products to Iran?

The other day you told us that you were looking forward to hearing the perspectives of Indian officials and appeared to differ somewhat on the threat of the possibility of Iraq getting a nuclear weapon. Did you hear anything on that that estranged your views on the matter?

US Secretary of State: There is no difference between us on our position. Prime Minister Singh is on the public record as saying that India does not want to see Iran obtaining nuclear weapon. They have exactly the same position as we do. In the discussions today and the discussions to come, we are going to be exploring with India their approach and perspectives toward Iran, and any advice that they can contribute to what is now an international consensus that the danger is posed to global stability, if Iran were to become a nuclear weapons power. So, there is a lot to discuss and we intend to do so. But, our policy is in sync. Neither of us wants to see Iran obtain nuclear weapons.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you. The interaction now draws to a close.

597. Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna in Parliament on the visit of the US Secretary of State Mrs. Hillary Clinton.

New Delhi, July 21, 2009.

Sir, I rise to inform the House of the visit of the U.S Secretary of State Ms. Hillary Clinton to India. Secretary of State Clinton held talks with me, and called on the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition yesterday.

During the visit, we held productive and constructive discussions on global issues, the situation in our region and on how to enhance our bilateral partnership.

Our Governments have concluded two important agreements: (i) on creation of a Science and Technology Endowment Board; and, (ii) a Technical Safeguards Agreement which will permit the launch of civil or non-commercial satellites containing US components on Indian space launch vehicles.

We have also agreed on the end-use monitoring arrangements that will henceforth be referred to in letters of acceptance for Indian procurement of US defence technology and equipment. This, Mr. Chairman, Sir, systematizes ad hoc arrangements for individual defence procurements from the USA entered into by previous Governments.

We have also agreed on a new bilateral dialogue architecture within which we will continue discussions between our two countries on a wide range of issues.

The visit has helped to broaden and deepen our bilateral relationship and to set the terms of future engagement between India and the United States of America.

A copy of the joint statement issued after our discussions is placed on the Table of the House. (See Document No.596)

The Government statement came after several members had in the morning expressed their apprehensions on the implications of the agreement on the end-use monitoring arrangement that would henceforth be referred to in the letters of acceptance for Indian procurement of US defence technology and equipment. The Minister of Finance Shri Pranab Mukherjee had then promised that a statement would indeed be made before the House rose for the day.

After the statement by the External Affairs Minister several members expressed dissatisfaction that the statement did not answer all their questions and apprehensions.

Shri L. K. Advani leader of the Opposition who was particularly critical, said: "I wish to say that we had not asked for a full statement on the visit of the Secretary of State of US. This morning, an issue was raised by my colleague Shri Yashwant Sinha and almost the entire Opposition endorsed what he had said. We said that we would like to have this matter (regarding end-use) clarified today itself. Otherwise, we are going to have a structured debate on various matters relating to foreign affairs including the India - Pakistan Joint Statement. We are going to have it, and we will ask all other questions including some of those that have been mentioned here. But today we expected that the External Affairs Minister would come out with a clarification on this point where he has said that we have also agreed on the end-use monitoring arrangements that will henceforth be referred to in letters of acceptance for Indian procurement of US defence technology and equipment. Not only that. He goes on to say that this systematizes ad hoc arrangements for individual defence procurements from the USA entered into by previous Governments also so that it is in a way trying to have end-use arrangements made into a formal systematic arrangement even in respect of earlier matters. This is something very disturbing. Therefore, I expected that the questions that have been raised by several colleagues from this side would be answered by the External Affairs Minister. I think that in view of what has just been said in this statement, you allow a debate to go on right now so that all questions are addressed. If that is going to happen, I would stop here. Otherwise, in this House, because there has been no practice of asking questions as is there in the other House, today I would think that as a matter of protest, my Party would like to register a walk out."

Shri Basu Deb Acharia of the CPI (M) too expressed his dissatisfaction and said: "None of the questions that we raised today in the morning has been clarified by the Minister while making the statement. We did not want this statement. The points we raised were about why we wanted a statement. That is why we demanded a statement. We demanded a clarification from the Government. Why did the Government of India agree for end use monitoring by the United States of America? And they want to formalize the system! This is nothing but surrendering to the United States of America. So, none of the questions that had been raised by the entire Opposition has been clarified by the Minister of External Affairs. ..."

Among persistent interruptions Shri Yashwant Sinha who had raised the matter first in the morning said "I had raised some very specific issues which had appeared in a somewhat rudimentary manner in the newspapers. He said since he had himself served in the Ministry, he had some idea of the issues involved, therefore he wanted some clarifications on this new development. That is why he had raised some specific questions. Another member Shri B. Mahtab of the Biju Janata Dal going back 30 years, recalled discussions on a similar issue and said: "...30 years ago when defence arrangement and procurement was being discussed, specifically, consciously the Government of India had taken a decision in the late sixties and early seventies that we will not allow any Government, whosoever and how mighty it may be, to incorporate or to be a participant in Indian Defence mechanism where we have to forego our sovereignty. That was the decision in late sixties and early seventies and it continued. The whole House during that time also had taken a very conscious decision that we will abide by the decision. During the cold war period that was the decision that was being implemented. Irrespective of Party affiliation, all had supported that decision. What has happened today? Cold war has ended, no doubt but we will not allow one single hegemony to control this world. India has been repeatedly against hegemonism. I would again request before all Members of this House and also to this Government, this Statement does not mitigate our anguish. I would again request, there is still time for this Government to come out clean on this Agreement."

Shri L. K. Advani, Leader of the Opposition again intervening suggested amending the Indian Constitution to provide for ratification of the agreements which impact the dignity, unity or relations with other countries, for which the Indian Constitution be amended. Since many other members wanted further clarifications, the External Affairs Minister intervened and said: "Mr. Chairman, Sir, I am rather surprised to the kind of interpretation that is sought to be given to a bilateral understanding between two sovereign countries. Well, I do realize that I also belong to a proud country with a civilization about which we always talk so tall about. So, the question of bartering our freedom; the question of bartering our sovereignty does not certainly arise out of this situation. This is a bilateral agreement between two sovereign countries. It is not as if it has not been done earlier. What was being done at every point of time when certain purchases were made at the high-end Defence equipment, there was a clause where this end-use clause was incorporated in that agreement. But here what we have tried to do is to generalize it for all high-end Defence purchases hereafter between the United States and India... (Interruptions) This is what we are doing with every other country. So, there is nothing extraordinary about it. Everything is very straight. We are conscious of what we are doing. It is in the larger interest of the country that this has been done..." (Interruptions)

Amidst interruptions the Chairman put an end to the discussion on the statement..

SHRI B. MAHTAB: We also are not satisfied... (Interruptions)

MR. CHAIRMAN: Nothing will go on record.

(Interruptions) ...

Next day on July 21, the Defence Minister A. K. Antony asserted that the end-use monitoring agreement with the US was a product of "hard bargaining" and it will take care of all concerns. The Foreign Secretary clarifying said the American Inspectors could not visit the Indian defence bases. With the EUMA in place "the choice is ours; we are buying and it is up to us to agree..." Asked whether the agreement would apply to military procurement from a third country, which might have components sourced from the US, he said the issue would be an agreement between the third country and the US and whether it had permission to sell such equipment to others.

Washington, DC, July 28, 2009.

Senator Christopher Dodd, Senator John Cornyn, Honorable Senators

I am truly honoured to be here today at this meeting hosted by the Senate India Caucus. I know these are busy and difficult times in the Senate. Yet, you have chosen to be with us today in this magnificent setting, in this sanctum sanctorum of democracy. This is a tribute to India, to the Indian community in the United States, to the warm and strong ties between our two countries, and, above all, to the values that bind our two nations together.

Our relationship is characterized as ties between the world's two largest democracies. And, I believe in that description, not merely because our two countries are democracies, but because our relationship draws so much of its strength and character from the support it has among the elected representatives of the people in both countries. The Senate India Caucus is, therefore, not merely a forum to advance our partnership; it is to me an important symbol of the India-US relationship.

Senator Cornyn, I thank you for your vision, when, in partnership with the then Senator from New York and now Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton, you laid the foundation of the Caucus in April 2004. Your support for India and this relationship has been steadfast and strong. I know how you rallied your colleagues in support of the landmark India-US civil nuclear initiative.

Senator Dodd, we in India remember with gratitude your leadership in securing the passage of the civil nuclear agreement last Fall, at a time when you also had to lead efforts to deal with a major financial crisis in the country. And, who will forget your stirring speech on the floor of the Senate as you introduced the Bill for approval of the 123 Agreement. We thank you for taking on the co-chairmanship of this Caucus despite your many other leadership responsibilities. We know we have a great friend in you.

I want to thank other Senators for your years of support for India and to the Indian American community, especially for the historic civil nuclear agreement. To each of you, I extend an invitation to travel to India, where a warm welcome awaits you.

I want to especially thank the Indian American leaders, who have travelled from near and far in the United States to be here at the first meeting of the Senate India Caucus in the 111th Congress. I have seen with great admiration your extraordinary success and achievements; how effectively you have served as a window to India's heritage and progress, to its enterprise and skills, and to its diversity and pluralism. But, I have been impressed, above all, with your role as responsible stakeholders in American society and its progress. Your success has as much to do with your talents and enterprise, as it has to do with the opportunities and rights that you enjoy in this great country. Individually, you have built many successful India-US partnerships, and time and again you have come together in great collective efforts, as you did last year, to open new doors in our relationship. You have been a great bridge of friendship and understanding between our countries.

Over the last decade, India and the United States have undertaken a truly remarkable journey and have gone into territories that neither had imagined possible a few years ago. This journey has transcended political transitions in both countries and has, indeed, been invigorated by the broad-based political support it enjoys in both nations. It has been nurtured by the vitality of private partnerships and the warmth of personal ties between our two peoples.

Senators, 2.7 million Indians live in the United States; 94,000 students from India are in US universities, the highest from any country; our bilateral trade has doubled in the past five years; US exports to India have grown three times during the period; just a few years ago, Air India gave Boeing a contract of 68 aircraft; till recently India barely sourced any defence equipment from the United States, last year alone we placed orders for at least USD 3.5 billion.

As the largest source of foreign direct and portfolio investments in India, the US is an indispensable partner in our development. Today, India, in its own modest way, is making a contribution to US jobs and prosperity. Indian direct investments into the US, on the basis of annual flows, exceed US foreign direct investment into India in recent years. In 2007-08 alone, an estimated US$ 10.25 billion was invested by Indian companies in the US, which, according to industry estimates, created around 65,000 jobs in the US. A recent study by Ernst & Young shows that there were 143 Indian investments in 2007 and 2008 across various sectors in the US, nearly half of the Indian acquisitions and new ventures were in the US IT and ITenabled sectors. Similarly, India's huge market, is an extraordinary opportunity, including in the infrastructure industry, where we need to invest at least USD 500 billion in the next five years.

India and the United States have, in many ways, shaped the evolution of the knowledge economy that has benefitted both countries enormously. I encourage Senators and the Indian American leaders to explore ways to leverage Indian and US trade and investment to create jobs and prosperity in both countries.

We are now at the beginning of a new phase in our relationship. Secretary Clinton has just completed a very productive visit to India, during which we reiterated our commitment to further deepen our strategic partnership and outlined an architecture and a roadmap to take our relationship to a new level. We signed agreements that will enhance our cooperation in space, defence equipment and science and technology. We committed ourselves to completing the steps for implementing the civil nuclear agreement, which will open enormous business opportunities for US companies. In November 2009, Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh will come to Washington DC on the first state visit to be hosted by President Obama.

We have an agenda that is broad-based and looks to the future. Our shared values and increasingly shared interests give us great comfort and purpose in our engagement. We will seek to increase security for our people by intensifying cooperation in defence, counter-terrorism, intelligence sharing and non-proliferation. No two countries have greater stakes in and a better record on non-proliferation than India and the United States. We will work together to prevent nuclear terrorism and address the challenges of global nuclear proliferation.

We will expand and diversify our bilateral economic ties and work together with our partner countries for global economic recovery and to reduce the risk of recurrence of the kind of crisis we have just experienced.

We will work together to develop clean and renewable sources of energy, improve energy efficiency and strengthen our ability to adapt to climate change. Protection of nature is rooted deeply in India's civilisational and spiritual heritage; it is also an imperative for our economic, energy and environmental security.

We will use the two nations' capacity for enterprise, innovation and research to foster new solutions for food security, healthcare and education.

India considers partnership with the US important for its national development goals. Similarly, democratic India's progress will, in its own modest way, stand as an affirmation of the universal values of liberty, democracy, pluralism and freedom of enterprise. The economic growth of one-sixth of humanity, which is largely driven by domestic demand and savings, provides potentially a large market and an anchor for stability in the global economy.

In each of these areas, Honourable Senators, we look to you for initiatives to deepen our relations; and, we count on the commitment and efforts of the Indian American leaders, as we take the relationship forward, so that working together we can not only seek a better life for our peoples, but also a stronger and safer future for the world.

Thank you.

599. Excerpt relevant to End Use of Monitoring in the agreement with the United States from the Statement of Prime Minister to Parliament.

New Delhi, July 29, 2009.

On End Use Monitoring

All governments, including our Government, are particular about the end uses to which exported defence equipment and technologies are put to and for preventing them from falling into wrong hands.

Since the late nineties, the Governments of India and the US have entered into End Use Monitoring arrangements for the import of US high-technology defence equipment and supplies. These were negotiated before this agreement in each case by successive Governments of India. The Government has only accepted those arrangements which are fully in consonance with our sovereignty and dignity.

What we have now agreed with the US is a generic formulation which will apply to future such supplies that India chooses to undertake. By agreeing to a generic formulation, we have introduced an element of predictability in what is otherwise an adhoc case by case negotiations on each occasion.

I should add that we need access to all technologies available in the world for the modernization of our defence forces. The threats to the country are growing and we need to have the capability to deal with them, and to be ahead of them. Our Armed Forces are entitled to the best equipment available anywhere in the world. It is also in our interest to diversify to the maximum extent possible the sources of our imports of defence items and equipment.

You have my assurance that the Government has taken all precautions to ensure an outcome that guarantees our sovereignty and national interest. Nothing in the text that has been agreed to compromises India's sovereignty. There is no provision for any unilateral action by the US side with regard to inspection or related matters. India has the sovereign right to jointly decide, including through joint consultations, the verification procedure. Any verification has to follow a request, it has to be on a mutually acceptable date and at a mutually acceptable venue. There is no provision for on-site inspections or granting of access to any military site or sensitive areas. This is the position in regard to the end use monitoring.

600. Response of Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs on media reports on move by United States Commission on International Religious Freedom.

New Delhi, August 13, 2009.

India, a country of 1.1 billion people, is a multi-ethnic and multi-religious society. The Constitution of India guarantees freedom of religion and equality of opportunity, to all its citizens, who live and work together in peace and harmony. Aberrations, if any, are dealt with promptly within our legal framework, under the watchful eye of an independent judiciary and a vigilant media.

The reported move referred to in the news reports is regrettable.

* The Spokesperson was referring to the The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) report which placed India on its "Watch List" for 2009 because it allegedly felt the Government of India had failed to take effective measures to ensure the rights of religious minorities in several States. In 2002 and 2003, the Commission had recommended that India be designated a "country of particular concern (CPC)" in the wake of the "severe riots" in Gujarat and elsewhere. This is a grade higher than "Watch List," which includes countries "where religious freedom conditions do not rise to the statutory level requiring CPC designation but which require close monitoring due to the nature and extent of violations of religious freedom engaged in or tolerated by the governments."

The USCIRF annual report - released on August 12 - states that "despite the Congress Party's commitment to religious tolerance, communal violence has continued to occur with disturbing results, and the government's response - particularly at the State and local levels - has been largely inadequate." According to a footnote in the chapter on India, the Commission had sought permission to visit the country in June this year to discuss religious freedom conditions with officials, religious leaders, civil society activists and others, but the government did not issue visas. "Nor did the Indian government offer alternative dates for a visit which the Commission requested." In particular, the Commission dwelt on the attacks on Christians in Orissa since the Christmas of 2007, which left 40 people dead and over 60,000 members of the community homeless. "The inadequate police response failed to quell the violence, and early Central government intervention had little impact. Mass arrests following the Orissa violence did not translate into the actual filing of cases," the report noted.

The report made note of the fact that India - unlike many other countries of concern to the Commission - has a democratically elected government with a tradition of secular governance dating back to the country's independence. "In practice, however, India's democratic institutions charged with upholding the rule of law, most notably State and Central judiciaries and police, lack capacity and have emerged as unwilling or unable to consistently seek redress for victims of religiously-motivated violence or to challenge cultures of impunity in areas with a history of communal tensions."

Reflecting on India's diverse democracy - where the "current, two-term Prime Minister is Sikh, the past President is Muslim, and the national governing alliance remains headed by a Catholic" - the report adds that despite this "remarkable pluralism and general commitment to religious freedom, Hindu nationalist organisations retain broad popular support in many communities in India, in part because some provide needed services or function as community social organisations."

601. Response of Official spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs to a question on an incident pertaining to Mr. Shah Rukh Khan at Newark airport.

New Delhi, August 15, 2009.

"It is understood that Mr. Shah Rukh Khan is currently touring USA. He flew into Newark international airport late last evening (India time), where he was taken aside for 'Secondary Questioning'.

The Consulate General of India got in touch with him immediately upon learning about the incident. Mr. Khan said that he was all right. The Consulate offered him any assistance that he may require.

Ministry has separately taken up the matter with the US Embassy in New Delhi, which is ascertaining factual details. The Embassy has also noted in a comment to the media they regard Mr. Khan as a 'global icon' and that he is a welcome guest in the United States."

* The incident which was being referred to by the Spokesperson involved Shah Rukh Khan who was detained and questioned for two hours at the Newark Airport in the USA on August 15, 2009. He was detained by immigration officials because his name was apparently part of a common checklist prepared since the 9/11 attacks. The officials wanted to know why Khan was visiting the U.S. and posed other such questions, after his name popped up on the computer screen at the counter. He was let off at the intervention of Indian Consulate officials in New York.

602. Press Release on the meeting of the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna with US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

New York, September 26, 2009.

EAM met Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, this evening on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly. The two Ministers reaffirmed that they attached high importance to the strategic partnership that was based on shared values and common interests. Secretary Clinton conveyed that the US regarded India as one of most important partner.

EAM and Secretary Clinton reviewed the progress in bilateral relations since the visit of Secretary to India in July this year. In this context they noted that Home Minister's visit early this month had laid the foundation for furthering cooperation in counter-terrorism cooperation and intelligence exchange. They agreed that PM's visit in November this year, which will be the first state visit for the US, will help in further strengthening and broadening the bilateral relationship.

The two ministers also exchanged views on regional and global issues of mutual interest including the security situation in South Asia*.

* Briefing the media after the meeting between EAM and Secretary of State Ms. Clinton, the US Assistant Secretary Blake said that Ms. Clinton recalled her very positive visit in July and the launch of the U.S.-India Strategic Dialogue. She told EAM that the United States viewed India as one of our most important partners going forward in the 21st century. She said that "our side is hard at work on preparing for Prime Minister Singh's very important state visit that will occur on November 24th, the first state visit of the Obama Administration, and still a lot of work to be done there". He said Ms. Clinton assured Mr. Krishna that "we hope to move forward on civil nuclear cooperation with India. As many of you know, there are still some steps that have to be taken there, particularly with respect to signing liability legislation, getting the Indian parliament to approve liability legislation for our companies, but also to announce formally the reactor parks that will be - the two reactor parks that will be set aside for U.S. companies." He said the two ministers also talked about education as another major focus.

According to Mr. Blake the two Ministers also touched on India and Pakistan relations. She expressed her hope that when the foreign ministers of India and Pakistan hold their scheduled meeting in New York, "the two sides can agree on the steps that they believe are necessary to get their relations back on a more positive footing". They touched on the situation in Sri Lanka. In the meeting the U.S underlined the importance of Sri Lanka resettling the almost 300,000 internally displaced people who remain in the camps, and resettling them as quickly as possible.

Mr. Blake said both sides reaffirmed the importance of the two countries working together to achieve a successful outcome at Copenhagen on climate change.

Mr. Blake answered the following questions at the media briefing:

QUESTION: Can you take a quick one on the India-Pakistan stuff that the Secretary raised in her meeting? Did she get any sense from the Indian foreign minister that - that longstanding demands that the Pakistanis do far more for those involved or allegedly involved in the Mumbai attacks - did that come up, and did you get any sense that that continues to be a hindrance on improving relations?

ASSISTANT SECRETARY BLAKE: Well, as I said earlier, they - I think both sides agree on the importance of trying to get things back to normal. I don't want to get into the position of characterizing what Pakistan - I'm sorry, what India said about its relations with Pakistan. I'll let the Indians do it. This is a very sensitive topic for them. And our position has always been that this is something that needs to be worked out between our two friends, India and Pakistan, so I'd prefer to just leave it at what I already said.

QUESTION: Can you give any more detail about the discussion over the Iranian nuclear facility? Did the Secretary try to get any pledges or expressions of support in terms of putting pressure on Iran down the road?

ASSISTANT SECRETARY BLAKE: No, not really. It was more just her briefing the foreign - the external affairs minister on what we've been doing, and that was really the focus.

QUESTION: Just to clarify, he wasn't asking India to not do trade or cut back on their trade with Iran?

ASSISTANT SECRETARY BLAKE: There were no requests at this meeting, but I think we've had very good dialogue in the past with India on nuclear issues and specifically with reference to Iran's nuclear ambitions, where I think Prime Minister Mammohan Singh has repeatedly made clear that they don't believe it is in India's interest to have another nuclear weapons state in the region.

QUESTION: Did the Indian minister, do you know, protest against the increase in American aid to Pakistan especially since he's been talking of late (inaudible) President Musharraf when he said that in the past (inaudible) to be used against India?

ASSISTANT SECRETARY BLAKE: Again, I'd rather not get into trying to talk about what the Indians said. I mean, I'd prefer you just ask them directly about their positions, because particularly on this subject, it's quite a sensitive issue, and I don't want to mischaracterize their views.

QUESTION: And I just have one more question. Did the U.S. side have a response to yesterday when the Indian (inaudible) mission to the UN sent a letter saying that India was not in a position to sign the NPT? Did the U.S. have a position on that? Did that come up?

ASSISTANT SECRETARY BLAKE: That didn't come up in the meeting. We have - we've said before that the resolution that was passed yesterday unanimously by the Security Council does not have any bearing on our bilateral civil nuclear cooperation, and that really shouldn't have any effect whatsoever. So we've provided reassurances to that effect to our friends in the Indian Government.

QUESTION: Has the White House actually announced that Singh is going to be the first state dinner?

ASSISTANT SECRETARY BLAKE: They have.

603. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Civil Aviation on Bilateral Aviation Safety Agreement (BASA) between India and USA.

New Delhi, August 28, 2009.

India and USA are working on a Bilateral Aviation Safety Agreement (BASA), which would lead to mutual acceptance of aeronautical products/parts developed in either country. Since aeronautical products are now being designed and manufactured in India, a need was felt for international acceptance of such products.

The steps involved in BASA process include:

- Skill upgradation of Indian DGCA certification experts by providing advanced training in certification procedures and oversight of design and production activities.
- Assessment of Indian authorities and industry capabilities to undertake certification and production work on a sustained basis to meet the FAA Standards.
- FAA conducting a Shadow Certification exercise with DGCA officials on a sample product, and satisfying themselves that Indian standard certification procedure are acceptable for high class aeronautical products.

The BASA process with a limited scope is expected to be completed by end of year 2010.

US-India Aviation Cooperation Programme (ACP)

The ACP is designed to work directly with the Indian Government to identify and support India's civil aviation sector modernization priorities.

The ACP's specific objectives are to: (i) promote enhanced safety, operational efficiency and system capacity in the Indian aviation sector; (ii) facilitate and coordinate aviation industry training and technical ties between the U.S. and India; and (iii) strengthen overall US-India aviation cooperation.

Funding for training and technical assistance programs is provided by USTDA and the in-kind support will be provided by FAA and US aviation companies.

Through the mechanism of ACP, Indian and US officials has identified specific areas for technical co-operation, which include:

- Air traffic flow management
- Certification of aeronautical products
- Certification of Global Navigational Satellite System (GNSS)
- Development of human resources.
- Assistance in the area of helicopter operations.

The training programme are targeted for DGCA personnel and industry in India. This programmes would be a joint effort between several ACP member companies including Boeing, Prat & Whitney, GE and Honeywell.

The ACP project on human resources development is designed by HEICO Parts Group Inc., with the objective to develop a comprehensive and specialized US Aviation standards Technical training program and will be conducted by HEICO for DGCA and Indian aviation industry personnel.

The cost of the programme funded by USTDA is US$371,700/-. The agreement between DGCA and HEICO Parts Group will be signed in New Delhi in a few days, which will pave way for the specialized training on aviation standards.

606. Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on the visit of US Under Secretary for Political Affairs William Burns.

New Delhi, October 16, 2009.

Mr. William Burns, Under Secretary for Political Affairs, US Department of State, the highest ranking career diplomat in the US State Department, visited New Delhi on October 15-16, 2009 for meetings with his counterpart, Foreign Secretary, Smt. Nirupama Rao.

Foreign Secretary and Under Secretary Burns reviewed the India -US bilateral agenda and, specifically, the progress made in the new India-US Strategic Dialogue announced on July 20, 2009 by External Affairs Minister and US Secretary of State, Ms. Hillary Clinton during the latter's recent visit to New Delhi.

The substantive issues related to the forthcoming visit of Prime Minister to USA in November 2009 were at the core of their discussions.

The intensified India-US co-operation in the focus areas - strategic cooperation, energy and climate change, education and development, economics and trade and agriculture and science, technology, health and innovation constituted their main agenda. They also exchanged views on regional and global issues of shared interest and common concern.

Under Secretary Burns called on External Affairs Minister, Health Minister, Minister of Human Resource Development, Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission, and National Security Advisor.

607. Press Conference of the US Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs William Burns on his visit to New Delhi.

New Delhi, October 16, 2009.

Under Secretary Burns: Good evening everyone. Thanks for your patience, and thank you all for coming. It's a great pleasure for me to be back in India. Let me start by wishing all of you a Happy Divali, as President Obama did a couple of nights ago at a special event at the White House.

The main purpose of my trip is to help prepare for Prime Minister Singh's state visit to Washington next month, which is the first state visit to the White House in the Obama administration. This is not only a reflection of the President's personal respect for Prime Minister Singh, but also of the high priority that the administration attaches to our growing partnership with India.

Secretary Clinton underscored our commitment to broadening and deepening U.S.-Indian relations during her visit in July during which she and Minister Krishna launched an ambitious strategic dialogue between our two countries. That dialogue is already moving forward, focused on practical cooperation in a wide range of areas.

I was pleased to have the opportunity during my visit to take stock of progress and to plan ahead with Minister Krishna and Foreign Secretary Rao and a number of other senior Indian officials.

Among the many items on the rich agenda before us, we discussed how to build on the successful results of Minister Chidambaram's September visit to Washington, and to strengthen in tangible ways our cooperation on law enforcement and counterterrorism.

We discussed Minister Sibal's upcoming trip to the United States and continued expansion of education cooperation including through Fulbright-Nehru scholarships and exchanges and university partnerships.

We discussed the renewal of the CEO Forum and the essential role of the private sector in the growth of our partnership.

We discussed the considerable potential for expanding cooperation in health.

We discussed progress in implementation of last year's historic civilian nuclear agreement to which the Obama administration remains firmly committed.

And we discussed the many ways in which we can work together to develop clean and renewable energy and enhanced food security which are critical components for a new green revolution in which U.S.-Indian leadership can play a crucial role.

We also obviously discussed a number of other pressing global and regional concerns including the situation in Afghanistan and our shared interest in fighting violent extremists in this region.

I reiterated our condolences for the terrorist attack on the Indian Embassy in Kabul last week and our appreciation for India's continuing and significant contributions to our common effort in Afghanistan.

The United States will continue to urge Pakistan to act firmly and quickly against extremists who threaten its own interests as well as the interests of all of us committed to stability in the region.

So once again, I'm delighted to have the chance to return to India and to help prepare for what I am certain will be a very successful state visit to Washington by Prime Minister Singh in November.

So thank you, and I'd be delighted to respond to a few of your questions.

Question: My name is Dini Basser, I work with CNN-IBN.

The Kerry/Lugar bill, how will the U.S. government ensure that the Pakistani government doesn't use that money in developing its military defenses against India? Is the bill binding on Pakistan?

Under Secretary Burns: The President signed this bill yesterday, and we've made very clear that there are not conditions attached to that legislation, but as with any piece of legislation in which the United States is providing assistance, in this case for development in Pakistan, we're very much focused on ensuring that the monies are used for the purposes intended. So there are measures built in to ensure that that takes place.

Question: This is [inaudible] from DNA.

There is an [inaudible] here that the new policy of the Obama administration with regard to NPT might affect the [civil nuclear agreement] of [inaudible] that may not go forward. Are these [tensions] going to be laid to rest during Mr. Singh's visit?

Under Secretary Burns: As I made clear already, the Obama administration remains firmly committed to implementation of the civilian nuclear agreement. We believe it's an historic step which benefits both of our countries. I would note that Prime Minister Singh as recently as a couple of weeks ago made clear publicly his support for the broad objectives that President Obama laid out in his speech in Prague last spring, and also his support and interest in the Global Summit on Nuclear Security that President Obama has proposed for next spring in Washington.

So I think we have before us an opportunity to cooperate on that wide range of issues, but there should be no question about this administration's full support for the civilian nuclear agreement.

Question: Steve Herman, Voice of America.

I'm wondering if you could talk a little bit about the discussions you've had with Indian leaders, how they compare to previous discussions regarding Afghanistan and Pakistan? Whether you're noting a rising sense of apprehension in wake of the attack on the embassy in Kabul? The Israelis just issued a new warning today about further attacks on India and the threats being made by a Taliban leader today to take the fight to the border with India. I'm wondering, should we be a little bit more apprehensive than we have been previously about what's going on as we seem to detect from the Indians?

Under Secretary Burns: First let me reiterate our condolences for the terrorist attack that took place against the Indian embassy in Kabul a week ago. As I said before, we continue to appreciate the significant contributions which India has made to our common effort in Afghanistan.

I think all of us are concerned about the situation in Afghanistan, as well as rising violence in Pakistan, and I think that simply underscores the importance of our collective effort to support Afghan authorities in a fight against violent extremists who have in the past done great damage to many of us and who threaten all of us in the future. I think the same is true with regard to the support that we provide to the Pakistani leadership to take on firmly and vigorously the challenge posed by violent extremists inside Pakistan.

Question: Sir, [inaudible] from Times Now.

Sir, the Indian High Commissioner in the U.S., Meera Shankar, wrote a letter a few days back where she said that there are a couple of Indian government servants who were bribed by U.S. companies. There is an investigation going here in India, but how is the U.S. administration taking this? Have you carried out some investigation to find out who these people were and who were those companies that bribed these officials?

Under Secretary Burns: I'm not familiar, to be honest with you, with the details of the particular concern that you raised. All I would say is that the United States government is firmly committed to fairness and transparency in the conduct of commerce overseas. That's in all of our interests, because having fair and transparent practices is the best way to encourage a growth in investment. So we will certainly pursue any concerns that are raised with us seriously, but I'm not familiar with those particular ones.

Thank you all very much.

608. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Commerce on the Joint Statement on the meeting of India - United States Trade Policy Forum.

New Delhi, October 26, 2009.

Shri Anand Sharma Union Commerce and Industry Minister met US Trade Representative Ambassador Ron Kirk here today for the sixth Ministerial-level meeting of the India- United States Trade Policy Forum (TPF). The two Governments signaled their readiness to continue their bilateral trade policy dialogue with renewed vigour under the five Focus Groups: Agriculture, Innovation and Creativity, Investment, Services and Tariff and Non-Tariff Barriers.

Minister Sharma said "the Trade Policy Forum provides opportunity for both Governments to discuss and share their concerns and work towards resolving them. The potential for bilateral trade and commercial relations between the two countries are immense and the Forum can provide the necessary momentum to the expansion this relationship. The inputs of the dynamic private sectors of the two countries have also enriched the Forum." Minister Sharma expressed deep satisfaction on the discussions that took place during the Forum meeting. He noted the commitment shown by both countries for further deepening the mutual economic relations and said that the Forum has established a roadmap for further engagement in this regard.

"The United States and India have a unique opportunity to draw on our cultural and entrepreneurial similarities to significantly increase two-way trade and investment," said Ambassador Kirk. "American and Indian companies have already joined forces across a range of sectors. Our Governments should work together to improve the environment for two-way trade even further, so that we can reap trade and economic benefits for both our countries."

The two Governments agreed to work together on a framework for promoting real and meaningful cooperation in trade and investment. They also agreed to work together to support greater involvement of small and medium enterprises in each others' markets and to pursue initiatives in the further development of India's infrastructure, collaboration on clean energy and environmental services, information and communications technologies (ICT) and other key sectors.

The delegations discussed the continued working of the US-India Private Sector Advisory Group (PSAG), which had been created under the TPF to provide strategic advice. Minister Shri Anand Sharma and Ambassador Kirk expect that the work of TPF will benefit from the depth, breadth and diversity of expertise of the PSAG in trade and international affairs.

BACKGROUND

The India-US Trade policy Forum (TPF), established in July 2005, is an arrangement between the two Governments to discuss trade and investment issues. The TPF is co-chaired by Hon'ble Minister of Commerce & Industry, Government of India and United States Trade Representative. The issues and concerns are discussed under five Focus Groups. The dialogue addresses a wide range of issues that will lead to initiatives in key sectors and create momentum for expanding bilateral trade. A Private Sector Advisory Group (PSAG) was formed in April 2007 as an adjunct to TPF to provide the TPF with views and advice from non-government trade and investment experts.

Mr. Anand Sharma who briefed journalists at the end of the meeting said although no firm deadline had been fixed for concluding these agreements they would happen soon. "The U.S. has submitted us a draft on these issues and we will certainly study it. We hope to sign agreement very soon. These are in continuation of the high-level engagement between the two countries and in the run-up to the Prime Minister, Manmohan Singh's, visit to Washington next month," he added. He said the cooperation agreement on IPR was being put in place to reassure and comfort investors from both the countries. Expressing satisfaction with the result of the meeting, the Minister said the Indo-U.S. TPF would act as a catalyst for enhancing trade and investment and promoting economic engagement. On the issue of H1-B visas for Indian professionals, Mr. Sharma said he had taken up the matter with Mr. Kirk stating that the Indian IT sector and industry in the U.S. had not only made huge investments but also generated thousands of jobs. They are only one per cent of the total IT professionals working in the U.S. They have made a huge contribution to the U.S. economy and U.S. should take steps to sort out all issues faced by them in this area.

611. Interview of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh with Ms. E.G. Weymouth, Editor-at-Large and Senior Diplomatic Correspondent of Newsweek, USA.

New Delhi, November 16, 2009.

Interviewer (Ms. Elizabeth Graham Weymouth): So, you are just about ready to go to the United States Prime Minister.

Prime Minister (Dr. Manmohan Singh): Yes, in four days' time.

Interviewer: What would you like to accomplish in the United States when you see President Obama?

Prime Minister: We are strategic partners. We have good relations. But there is the new Administration in America. We are now in our second five-year term. So, it is appropriate that I should renew our partnership. I sincerely hope that we can work together with President Obama and his Administration to build an enduring partnership based on equality and mutual understanding for promoting greater security and sustained development in the world.

Interviewer: So, that's your aim when you go to Washington,

Prime Minister: That is, to put it succinctly.

Interviewer: But people say, for instance, that you might announce a partnership in space, that you might announce a new green revolution. Can you share with me and with my readers some of the thoughts you have on how you see the possibility of India and the United States cooperating in the future, Sir?

Prime Minister: First of all, we had a watershed and a landmark agreement with the United States on nuclear cooperation. We would like to operationalise it and ensure that the objectives for the nuclear deal are realised in full merit. My sincere hope is that we can persuade the US Administration to be more liberal when it comes to transfer of dual-use technologies to us. Now that we are strategic partners these restrictions make no sense. India has an impeccable record of not participating in any proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. So, that is my number one concern.

Interviewer: So, you are talking about the consent agreement that the President would have to sign and send to Congress?

Prime Minister: That is right.

Interviewer: And on your side, I believe, your Parliament would have to pass a liability agreement. Is that correct?

Prime Minister: We will do that. Our Cabinet will be taking a decision. I do not see any difficulties in honouring our commitments.

Interviewer: So, you are concerned about the US honouring the consent agreement?

Prime Minister: We have no worries, but we would like a positive reaffirmation of this Administration to carry forward that process.

Interviewer: To carry forward the civil nuclear deal?

Prime Minister: Yes. I also said that this is a partnership for sustained and sustainable development of India and the new global world order which is in search of a new equilibrium. India and the United States could be partners in refocusing our attention on an equitable, balanced, global order.

Interviewer: What does that mean exactly?

Prime Minister: Well, there are several components of sustained development. There is the energy cooperation - we would like to strengthen energy cooperation with the United States - clean coal technologies, renewable energy resources. Similarly there is concern for food security. We would like to have a second green revolution in our country. In the first green revolution technologies which were by-product of the US public sector played a major role in transforming Indian agriculture. We need another green revolution to carry forward that process still further. Therefore, cooperation in the field of agriculture, cooperation in the field of science and technology, cooperation in the field of health, ensuring cooperation between our two countries in dealing with pandemics, these are all the concerns that I have, and I propose to share these concerns with President Obama and hope that we both can reaffirm our commitment to carry forward these processes.

Interviewer: I got an email this morning from Gen. Petraeus who said he never met you but he sent you his regards.

Prime Minister: Please give him my regards.

Interviewer: I guess the obvious question comes up of how you see Afghanistan from your point of view. Are you concerned that the US will not stay involved in this conflict? And what are the implications for India?

Prime Minister: I sincerely hope that the United States and the global community will stay involved in Afghanistan. A victory for the Taliban in Afghanistan would have catastrophic consequences for the world, particularly for South Asia, for Central Asia, for Middle East. The triumph of religious fundamentalism in Afghanistan would have far-reaching consequences for peace and stability in the world as well.

Interviewer: And that is what you think would happen if we do not go through with our commitment.

Prime Minister: Let me put it this way. The religious fundamentalism in the 1980s was used to defeat the Soviet Union. It is the same group of people. If they defeated the Soviet Union and now they defeat the other major power, this would embolden them in a manner which could have catastrophic consequences for the world at large.

Interviewer: So, if they defeated now the United States in other words, it would embolden them so they could do anything?

Prime Minister: Yes, that is right.

Interviewer: So, that is your concern about the future of Afghanistan.

Prime Minister: We have of course no immediate concerns because we are victims of terrorism. The extremist ideologies of the type that the Taliban have, if not checked, could destabilise our country as well.

Interviewer: In other words you would like to see the President send the troops as Gen. Mc Crystal has demanded.

Prime Minister: I am not an expert on military strategies. I am not well versed with what is the military situation on the ground though I got to hear that there are worries about the military situation. I have no fixed views about the amount or number of troops that the US would have. But it is very important that both for providing security and for providing sustained development the United States and the global community should stay engaged with Afghanistan.

Interviewer: Do you think that people in the US understand the connection between Al Qaeda and the Taliban in Afghanistan? Do you believe there is a close connection?

Prime Minister: There is a close connection. I mean they are the offshoots, they are chips of the same block.

Interviewer: You know some people say, "Oh! They are not", but I understood they were very close, as you said.

Prime Minister: That is my honest view.

Interviewer: How do you feel about President Karzai? There has been a lot of criticism of him in America. I believe India has been supportive.

Prime Minister: Let me say that President Karzai's regime is not perfect. There are imperfections, there are problems of improving governance. But you cannot transform Afghanistan overnight. It is going to be a long-term affair. Democracy as the west understands may be not possible to introduce in a short period of time in Afghanistan. But it is a fact that millions of Afghan children, millions of girl children are now in schools when none was in school when the Taliban was in power. For safeguarding human freedoms one has to take a balanced view. Now that President Karzai has been re-elected, I think the time has come when the global community should rally behind him to give Afghanistan a stable, purposeful, and relatively corruption-free administration.

Interviewer: Now, your neighbour to the north, Pakistan. How do you assess the situation there? Some people say that the civil government there is really losing power. How do you see the situation?

Prime Minister: We are concerned with the rise of terrorism in Pakistan. We have been the victims of Pakistan-sponsored terrorism for a long period of time. Now, if in addition, the Taliban and Al Qaeda type of terror, which in the past was located in the FATA area of Pakistan, gets transferred to the mainland of Pakistan - that is Punjab, which is next door to our Punjab - it has very serious consequences for our own security.

Interviewer: So, you say that the sort of instability in the FATA ...

Prime Minister: We would not like terrorism to lead to a situation where the civilian government is only a nominal government.

Interviewer: Do not you think that is the situation right now?

Prime Minister: I am not saying that is the situation now. We would like democracy to succeed in Pakistan. We would like the normal processes of democracy to operate in full measure in Pakistan. But obviously now that the Al Qaeda and the terrorists have a grip over several parts of Pakistan, that is a cause of worry to us.

Interviewer: It is terrible.

Prime Minister: It is terrible.

Interviewer: So, it is impossible to know but do you think that Pakistanis are trying as hard as they can? Or do you think they are not trying as hard as they can?

Prime Minister: Let me say that our feeling is that as far as Afghanistan is concerned I am not sure whether the US and Pakistan have the same objective. Pakistan would like Afghanistan to be under its control, under its strong influence. They would like the United States to get out as soon as possible.

Interviewer: Pakistan would like the US to get out.

Prime Minister: So, the US objective and Pakistan's objective it appears to me are not the same.

Interviewer: Because Pakistan would like the United States to get out and the United States would like Pakistan to be under some control. Is that what you are saying, Prime Minister?

Prime Minister: What I am saying is that the United States objectives are to get Pakistan's support to deal with the Taliban in Afghanistan. But I do not see Pakistan is wholeheartedly in support of action against the Taliban in Afghanistan. They are of course taking action against Taliban when they threaten the supremacy of the army. But that is it.

Interviewer: In other words they are only taking action against the Pakistani Taliban.

Prime Minister: That is true.

Interviewer: So, decidedly, possibly, India and the United States are able to cooperate in coming up with some kind of cooperation against the enemies of both India and the United States, which are the rest of the Taliban?

Prime Minister: Let me say that we have supported the strong presence of the international community in Afghanistan. We have provided substantial amount of resources, about 1.2 billion dollars, for the reconstruction and development of Afghanistan. We are of course not able to provide troops, but we would like to do more for reconstruction and development of Afghanistan. We believe we can do more in this area and do it more effectively than many other aid donors of Afghanistan.

Interviewer: You mean, for example, deliver supplies to, say, US and NATO troops? Or is that a bad example?

Prime Minister: We are active in building infrastructure in Afghanistan. We are involved in strengthening schools, education, healthcare, electricity. These are the areas where we have capacity to help Afghanistan, and we would like to do more.

Interviewer: I think people in America, reasonable people, actually do not understand what we are doing in Afghanistan. I would be curious to see what you think when you are in the United States. I am not talking about people in the State Department or the Defence Department but the general public which I think will be a problem for the President.

Prime Minister: I hope that the US public understands where it all started, after 9/11. If Al Qaeda did not have a home in Afghanistan, maybe 9/11 would never have taken place. God forbid if Al Qaeda gets another strong foothold in Afghanistan once again!

Interviewer: And that is what you believe will happen?

Prime Minister: Well, it could happen. I am not an astrologer. But there is a great worry that it could happen.

Interviewer: I think it is frustrating because there is not much understanding, I would say. America has very turned inward right now. Do you think there will be a civil war in Afghanistan if we withdraw?

Prime Minister: There is that danger.

Interviewer: From your point of view I assume that the most important thing is the terror groups in Pakistan.

Prime Minister: As I said we are victims of Pakistan-aided, abetted, and inspired terrorism for nearly 25 years. We would like the United States to use all its influence with Pakistan to desist from that path. Pakistan has nothing to fear from India. I have said this on many public occasions that the destinies of our two countries are interlinked. We should both be waging a war against poverty, ignorance and disease which afflict millions and millions of people in both our countries. It is a tragedy that Pakistan has come to this path of using terror as an instrument of state policies. We sincerely hope that the United States will use all its influence with the authorities in Pakistan including the armed forces of Pakistan to desist from this path.

Interviewer: You have a good point I have to say. But it is going to be very interesting to see what you come up with after your trip to Washington. On the US-India relationship, you said in the beginning, counter terrorism cooperation, space cooperation, do you see those on the agenda?

Prime Minister: Nuclear cooperation, cooperation in the field of education, closer linkages between the university systems of our two countries, cooperation in the field of health, working together to devise new vaccines.

Interviewer: How do you feel about Copenhagen and the emissions? Do you feel that we should send you equipment to deal with emissions?

Prime Minister: In accordance with the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and the Kyoto Protocol the developed countries have an obligation to perform with regard to reduction of emissions. And I sincerely hope that Copenhagen would reaffirm that. I know there are difficulties. But without the United States giving a lead I do not see a deal at Copenhagen can become a reality. On our part we recognise our own responsibilities. Although our emissions are one/tenth of the United States', about one/tenth of the global average, if I remember correctly, we recognise that dealing with climate change is the responsibility of entire humanity. So, we have put in place a National Action Plan to deal with climate change. We have eight Climate Change Missions which if they succeed will bring about a significant reduction in emissions as compared with Business As Usual situation.

Interviewer: Interesting! A lot of people in the US worry very much, and it is a subject of great talk, about Iran getting a nuclear weapon? I know that India has a much better relationship with Iran than we do. Are you concerned? I know another undeclared site was just found yesterday.

Prime Minister: I had yesterday the Iranian Foreign Minister with me.

Interviewer: In Delhi?

Prime Minister: Yes.

Interviewer: How exciting!

Prime Minister: He was in Delhi yesterday.

Interviewer: Ah! For a change!

Prime Minister: We did discuss the nuclear question. Let me say the message that he left with me was that they feel encouraged by the messages they are receiving from the Obama Administration. And I see a glimmer of hope in what the Iranian Minister told me yesterday.

Interviewer: Well, I guess so. It depends how you look on it. It depends what your aim is. Is your aim to stop Iran from getting a nuclear weapon or not?

Prime Minister: Let me say that we have taken a consistent position. Iran is a signatory to the NPT. It must have all the privileges that go with being a member of the NPT like peaceful uses of nuclear energy. It has also all the obligations that go with their membership of the NPT. Therefore, I think nuclear weapon is not an option which Iran is entitled to under its membership of the NPT.

Interviewer: You have much more information than I do, but it looks to all observers from the outside - including the IAEA which just found another undeclared site yesterday - it certainly looks - and appears even from the IAEA report - as if they are pursuing a nuclear weapons programme.

Prime Minister: I had the pleasure of the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency visiting us a few weeks ago. And he was not so sure that Iran is definitely working towards a nuclear weapon.

Interviewer: It is interesting. The report that they issued yesterday - I do not know if you saw it, I could not sleep so I saw it in the middle of the night - was very very critical, the IAEA report.

Prime Minister: I have not seen that.

Interviewer: Well, unless you cannot sleep there is no reason you would. But they found another undeclared site and there was a particularly critical report issued. Now, I know that you were engaged in talks with Gen. Musharraf when he was Head of Pakistan for two years. Then, as far as I can understand, you went to Sharm el-Sheikh and you made some decorations that you hoped, just like you have just said, that Pakistan and India could maybe reach some kind of peace one day. Are there any kind of steps now or do you feel that the situation ...

Prime Minister: Let me say that we are committed to resolve all outstanding issues with Pakistan through purposeful, meaningful, bilateral negotiation. Our only condition is that Pakistan should not allow its territory to be used for acts of terror directed against India. This is the commitment that Gen. Musharraf had given to my predecessor when he visited Pakistan in 2004. This is the commitment that was given to me whenever I met Gen. Musharraf. This is the commitment given to me at Sharm el-Sheikh by Prime Minister Gilani. If Pakistan really honours that commitment, we can go back to purposeful, meaningful negotiations to resolve all outstanding issues between ourselves.

Interviewer: So, if you look at Mumbai and the Lashkar-e-Tayyiba, they are obviously not honouring the agreement.

Prime Minister: As far as the perpetrators of Mumbai massacre are concerned, they had taken some steps but not enough. As far as the Lashkar-e-Tayyiba is concerned, under a different name Jamat-ud-Dawa ...

Interviewer: They just left that guy out of jail, didn't they?

Prime Minister: They have not put Hafiz Saeed in prison. The courts have released him. That is the excuse. But from our standpoint, Lashkar-e-Tayyiba, Jamat-ud-Dawa, Hafiz Saeed, Masood Azhar, are the perpetrators of terror in our country, and Pakistan has the obligation to take effective action to prevent them from continuing to indulge in these undesirable acts.

Interviewer: Do you worry about another Mumbai?

Prime Minister: Every day I receive intelligence reports that the terrorists based in Pakistan are planning other similar acts.

Interviewer: Terrible! The terrorists based in Pakistan are planning more?

Prime Minister: Yes, that is right.

Interviewer: Are there any contacts between your Government and the Pakistani Government?

Prime Minister: We have normal contacts. Our High Commission is there. They have a High Commission here.

Interviewer: But it is not like that channel that you had open.

Prime Minister: But we have very good cooperation with the US and we get lot of information from friendly countries, and that points to persistence of these terrorist groups - Lashkar-e-Tayyiba, Jamat-ud-Dawa - in acts of terrorism directed against our country.

Interviewer: How do you see China? Do you see it as a threat, do you see it as a trading partner, or both?

Prime Minister: Let me say that the peaceful rise of China creates new opportunities for the world to engage China. China has emerged as a major trading partner with us, and we welcome that. But we have problems with China with regard to our boundary dispute. We both have discussed this. We are engaged in a discussion of the boundary dispute. Both of us are agreed that it is a complicated issue, it will take time to resolve it, and that pending the resolution of the boundary dispute both of us have an obligation to maintain peace and tranquillity along the borders. I have said this in China and elsewhere, we believe that there is enough space in the world to accommodate the development ambitions of both India and China. But there will be certain areas where there will be competition in trade, investment; and that is healthy.

Interviewer: That is interesting. Since you are an economist, do you believe that the economic weakness caused by the disaster that struck us last year has eroded the United States' leadership role in Asia or affected it?

Prime Minister: I sincerely hope that the United States will recover from last year's disaster. With the entrepreneurial skills of the US business class, the innovation, the US educational system which encourages innovation and invention, I have no doubt that the US would overcome this temporary setback. We would like the United States to succeed in that effort.

Interviewer: Some people are saying even in the US that we have definitely lost some of our power and some of our leadership ability due to the fact that we have such huge deficits.

Prime Minister: I have heard many times before. When I was in the United States in the late 1960s there was Prof. Robert Triffin at Yale who wrote a famous book Gold & the Dollar Crisis saying the dollar's role as a reserve currency has come to an end and the United States must recognise this. That was said in 1968. Then of course came 1971 when the US went off the Gold Exchange Tender. But the United States bounced back. I hope that the same thing will happen once again.

Interviewer: But if you look at the objective facts, and you know much more than I do, I spent a lot of time with businessmen and they are all so worried.

Prime Minister: I think it is good that they worry about it because excesses of the type which characterised the US banking system last year should have been a cause of worry. They should have been detected much earlier.

Interviewer: You have got a point. But India seems to have basically ...

Prime Minister: First of all our banking system is better regulated. We do not allow our banking system to invest heavily in those types of assets.

Interviewer: You mean derivatives, CDOs, and squared and things like that. Your economy basically escaped from this.

Prime Minister: We are affected because our exports are affected. Our export growth rate has sharply declined. What is more is that the flow of capital has also been affected. But more recently, capital has started coming back to our country. Overall, before the crisis our growth rate was 8.5 to 9 per cent per annum in the previous four years.

Interviewer: Unbelievable!

Prime Minister: Since then it has declined to 6.7 per cent. This year it will be about 6.5 per cent. We believe that on the basis of domestic demand, both consumption demand and investment demand, in two years' time we can go back to a 9 per cent growth rate. I say it with confidence because our domestic savings rate is as high as 35 per cent of our GDP.

Interviewer: You are kidding! How did you manage that?

Prime Minister: Well, I think the Indian people are very thrifty.

Interviewer: That is amazing!

Prime Minister: And with a capital output ratio of 4:1, we should over a period of time be able to sustain a growth rate of 8 to 9 per cent.

Interviewer: That is unbelievable! If we could trade places with you! That is amazing! What is your take on the Maoist insurgency? What about the areas that people say are out of control? Your friend Montek Singh Ahluwalia was telling me last night that there are these forests and people are living in them and so on and so forth and then there are Maoists.

Prime Minister: It is certainly true that benefits of development have not reached all sections of our population. There are tribal areas in Central India where poverty is acute, and that is taken advantage of by these antisocial elements whom we call as the Maoists. We will tackle them. This is a dual strategy. First of all in these distant parts of our country the law and order machinery of the state cannot reach early. We are trying to strengthen that. Simultaneously we will ensure that the fruits of development hereafter are more equitably distributed so that the social discontent and unrest which is the result of this unequal development is also taken care of.

Interviewer: You mean some law and order and some spreading of the wealth would be the way out there?

Prime Minister: Accelerated development, yes.

Interviewer: When you look at your country and what you would like to achieve in the next few years, what is that?

Prime Minister: A growth rate of about 9 per cent per annum, and to ensure that this growth is an inclusive growth, that the benefits of development reach out to all sections of our population, that the disparities between rural India and urban India are reduced and ultimately eliminated.

Interviewer: Do you feel that you have made a difference as Prime Minister to your country? What do you think your legacy would be? Do you think that you have changed this country?

Prime Minister: I hope I have made some difference. That is for posterity to judge.

Interviewer: Well, what a hard job! Are you worried at all about the Test Ban Treaty which President Obama and his Administration seem very intent on pushing through the Senate?

Prime Minister: Why should we be worried? We are not worried at all. We have a unilateral moratorium on testing imposed voluntarily. We stand by that. And we would like to work with President Obama to promote the cause of global nuclear disarmament, a world free of nuclear weapons. I think that is a world which has been the dream of our leaders from Jawaharlal Nehru to Rajiv Gandhi. We would like to work with all likeminded countries to achieve that goal.

Interviewer: Is your last dream to build an infrastructure in India?

Prime Minister: Infrastructure is a primary requirement of sustained development. We need to invest lot more money, lot more resources in roads, in ports, in airports, in irrigation, in urban infrastructures. These are our top priorities. That is what I meant that if we get our infrastructure right, our savings rate would enable us to sustain a growth rate of about 8 to 9 per cent.

Interviewer: But the infrastructure is a priority.

Prime Minister: It is a priority.

Interviewer: Prime Minister, there is just no way I can thank you enough for your time. I know how busy you are getting ready for your trip.

Prime Minister: Well it is a great pleasure having you with us.

Interviewer: No, it is the other way round. You are such a wonderful country.

Prime Minister: And I hope you will come more often.

Interviewer: Thank you very much and I wish you such good luck with your ...

612. Response of Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs on US-China Joint Statement of November 17, 2009.

New Delhi, November 18, 2009.

"Government of India is committed to resolving all outstanding issues with Pakistan through a peaceful bilateral dialogue in accordance with the Simla Agreement. A third country role cannot be envisaged nor is it necessary. We also believe that a meaningful dialogue with Pakistan can take place only in an environment free from terror or the threat of terror*."

* The joint statement issued following a meeting between U.S. President Barack Obama and his Chinese counterpart Hu Jintao in Beijing had said: "the two sides [U.S. and China] welcomed all efforts conducive to peace, stability and development in South Asia. They support the efforts of Afghanistan and Pakistan to fight terrorism, maintain domestic stability and achieve sustainable economic and social development, and support the improvement and growth of relations between India and Pakistan. The two sides are ready to strengthen communication, dialogue and cooperation on issues related to South Asia and work together to promote peace, stability and development in that region."

The U.S. Ambassador Timothy Roemer, however, tried to interpret the intention as promoting more stable ties among South Asian countries. His perception was that the U.S. and China had expressed their desire for a more stable and peaceful relationship between the countries in South Asia. "I think that is a very positive statement to make." The U.S. was trying to "make sure there is a prosperous and peaceful rise of China" and "at the same time, have historic close relations between the U.S. and India"

In Beijing a Foreign Ministry official said on November 19 that China would only "support" relevant moves to improve peace and stability in South Asia, and indicated that his country did not seek to play a primary role in improving relations between India and Pakistan. Asked if China saw for itself any specific role to play in improving ties between the two countries, the Chinese spokesperson Qin Gang said China would in general support any move that led to greater stability in South Asia. "As long as it is good for peace and stability in the region, and improvement of stability in the region, China supports relevant moves," Mr. Qin said. "We believe India and Pakistan are important countries in South Asia. China highly values its friendly cooperation with the two countries and hopes the relationship between the two countries can be gradually improved."

Foreign Secretary Mrs. Rao on November 20th while briefing the media on the Prime Minister's visit to the United States was asked a couple of questions on this subject and these were:

Question: Madam Secretary, President Obama on his recent visit to China mentioned what he saw was a global vision for China in geopolitics of South Asia. Do you see this actually as a sellout for India? And would you bring this up during the upcoming visit of the Prime Minister as well?

Foreign Secretary: I think the use of the word that you just mentioned is not appropriate at all in this context. That is one. As far as the reference in the Joint Statement to the role that was envisaged for China together with the United States in South Asia, we had of course expressed certain views on this subject in our statement in response to a question asked of us two days ago. So, I do not want to repeat that statement. But our views on this are very well known.

Question: Mrs. Rao, do you think that the Joint Statement and the wording of that joint statement casts a shadow on the visit of the Prime Minister? And would the Government like to share its views on the proposed visit of Mirwaiz to China so that you can give us a broader view on that?

Foreign Secretary: No, I do not believe that statement casts a shadow on the visit of Prime Minister to Washington. The visit stands on its own. I have just enumerated the vision, the approach, and the expectations that we have of this visit of Prime Minister to Washington, and the nature of our partnership, the very durable and mature partnership between India and the United States which we hope to take forward during this visit. As far as the reported visit of Mirwaiz to China is concerned, we have stated on many previous occasions that we have not prevented Kashmiri leaders to travel abroad. Now if you are talking about his going to China in the context of the approach taken by the Chinese Government on issue of visas to Indian citizens resident in Jammu and Kashmir, on that issue our view is very well known. We do not subscribe to this approach which discriminates against our citizens on the basis of their domicile and their ethnicity.

613. Press Conference by the Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh's State visit to Washington and visit to Port of Spain for the CHOGM Conference.

New Delhi, November 20, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good evening and a very warm welcome to the media interaction of Foreign Secretary. Good to see you in such large numbers.

Foreign Secretary is here to talk to you about the forthcoming visit of our Prime Minister to Washington and then to Port of Spain for the CHOGM Summit. After her opening remarks Foreign Secretary will be very happy to take a few questions. Let me also introduce a colleague, who is to Foreign Secretary's right, she is very well known, Mrs. Gaitri Kumar, who is our Joint Secretary for the Americas Division.

Madam, may I request you for your opening comments.

Foreign Secretary (Shrimati Nirupama Rao): Thank you, Vishnu. Good afternoon.

The Prime Minister will be visiting Washington from the 22nd to the 26th November, 2009. The visit is at the invitation of President Obama and the invitation was personally conveyed by the US Secretary of State Mrs. Hillary Clinton to Prime Minister when she visited India in July, 2009. This is the first state* visit being hosted by the US President and our Prime Minister has conveyed that he is honoured by this gesture.

On November 24th the Prime Minister will be accorded a ceremonial reception by the US President at the White House in Washington. Thereafter Prime Minister and President Obama will meet to review all aspects of the bilateral relationship. They will be joined in this by their respective delegations. They will discuss the India-US Strategic Dialogue which is envisaged to enhance our cooperation in areas that we have identified for our bilateral interaction and for the mutual benefit of our two peoples.

* On November 23 when the White House Press Secretary Mr. Gibbs was asked "why was India chosen for the first State Dinner, he replied: "Well, I think it's the importance of our relationship with India on a host of issues. Obviously, counterterrorism is important; the economic recovery and the world economy; our relationship with them in terms of energy and climate change. I think India obviously is in a very important region in the world. And I think it demonstrates the importance that that relationship has in the world."

The two leaders will discuss regional and global issues of shared interest and common concern ranging from the security situation arising out of recent developments in our immediate neighbourhood where the United States has also been involved - I refer to Afghanistan - and global issues such as climate change, stabilization of the global economy, disarmament and non-proliferation, terrorism, and a coordinated regional and global approach to issues relating to the environment, pandemics, etc.

The Prime Minister and the US President will address a Joint Press Conference at the White House. They will also have a short meeting with the members of the India-US CEOs' Forum. The US Vice-President Mr. Joseph Biden and the US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will also meet the Prime Minister. The same evening the US President and Mrs. Obama will host Prime Minister and Mrs. Gursharan Kaur at a reception and a state dinner at the White House.

On the previous day, November 23, 2009, the Prime Minister will meet the US Defence Secretary, Mr. Robert Gates. He will address the Indian and US business community at the US-India Business Council, delegations of the CII, FICCI and other representatives of the business and corporate sector who are traveling to Washington to be present at that event. The same evening the Prime Minister will address the US Council on Foreign Relations. This meeting will be attended by representatives from various US think tanks.

During his visit Prime Minister will also meet the United States' Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mrs. Nancy Pelosi; the US Treasury Secretary, Mr. Geithner; and the US Energy Secretary, Mr. Steven Chu. He will attend a reception hosted by the Indian Ambassador where he will meet the Indian community on November 25, 2009.

India and the United States are strategic partners. There is a new Administration in the United States, and the Government of India is in its second term. This would be an occasion to renew the partnership built on economic and political initiatives that have been taken, and we are expecting that this will raise our cooperation in areas of mutual benefit to a higher level. Our Government looks forward to working with the US President and his Administration to build an enduring partnership based on equality and mutual understanding for promoting greater security and sustainable development in the world.

It may be recalled that the relationship between India and the United States has been transformed in recent years, especially symbolized by the signing of the historic agreement on civil nuclear cooperation in October, 2008. This is an important area of cooperation and we are in the process of moving into commercial implementation of the Agreement.

Another priority is our partnership in creating energy security, clean energy, more efficient use of energy, in a manner that achieves sustainable development, which is one of India's foremost priorities. We are looking forward to US collaboration in our national plans for a second green revolution not only in agriculture but also in green technology. Pandemics and the control of such diseases is another area where we can work together and our scientists are ready to intensify their collaboration with their US partners to address some of the biggest challenges in the area of health that our societies face in today's globalised world where no single society can be safe from the outbreak of an epidemic thousands of miles away.

One of the significant issues which will be discussed during the visit will be the problem of global terrorism. India lives in a neighbourhood where there is this problem, and our neighbours along with India have prioritized this as a number one concern. The United States is in Afghanistan and has been trying to address the terrorist infrastructure in the region. We have a stake in the success of the Af-Pak Strategy.

Since the July 20th visit of Secretary Clinton when the new India-US Strategic Dialogue was announced, a period of intensive engagement has followed on all the identified areas for our bilateral cooperation; and we have already, in these three to four months, reached a number of understandings in the areas of discussion; almost close to formalisation in the areas of energy, agriculture, education, health, cooperation in counter-terrorism, and in the area of commerce and trade.

India and the United States have a broad-based and deep relationship covering almost every sphere of human endeavour. Our bilateral cooperation in the areas of defence, security and counter terrorism; science, technology and health; trade, investment and the knowledge economy; energy and environment; culture, people-to-people contacts and education; and agriculture are among other areas which will come up for discussion.

An exchange of views on international terrorism and how to combat it, the reform of international institutions, environment issues and climate change, disarmament, global security and stability, and the changing dynamics of international relations are likely to figure in the talks between Prime Minister and President Obama.

Memoranda of Understanding on renewable energy, counter terrorism, access to Traditional Knowledge Digital Library, IPR issues and agriculture are expected to be signed during the visit. Representatives of business and Industry on both sides would be signing several agreements on the occasion emphasizing the value and depth that bilateral economic relations bring to India-US relations.

This relationship between the largest and the oldest democracies based on common values, shared principles and an inclusive vision; deepened and nurtured through strong people-to-people ties and the highest commitment of the two Governments to see it prosper, would provide a strong platform for the two leaders to emphasize the future of this relationship and the optimism that is felt on both sides regarding its growth and development.

I will now speak of the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting at Port of Spain in Trinidad and Tobago. For Briefing on CHOGM Please see Document No.181.

Question: Madam, there are many issues still remaining in the final implementation of the Indo-US nuclear cooperation. Are those issues likely to be finalised during this visit?

Foreign Secretary: Let me first tell you that both the Governments, the Governments of India and the United States, are firmly committed to fully implementing the historic 123 agreement, the civil nuclear agreement. It goes without saying that the agreement offers immense developmental benefits for India and at the same time it opens up business opportunities for US companies. The implementation of this agreement is an ongoing process. As you know, we have announced two sites in October this year for US companies to set up nuclear power plants. The Liability Law is getting our highest attention. Our delegations are working together closely to come to an understanding on the reprocessing and licensing issues. I am optimistic we are well within our timelines, but we are dealing with complex issues but are committed to the full implementation of the agreement. This will take some more time. We do not expect to conclude the process during this visit obviously.

Question: On counter-terrorism, are we looking at a new framework agreement which has been there for some time? What possibly could be the form of that counter-terror framework we are looking at? Also, on the nuclear deal I believe there is another round of negotiations that is taking place between nuclear officials of both sides just a day before PM reaches Washington. Are we expecting, if not finalisation some sort of announcement about the reprocessing deal during the visit?

Foreign Secretary: I have already answered that aspect you raised with regard to the nuclear deal and I am not going into further details on that. On the issue of counter-terrorism, I have said that the two sides are working towards an MoU on counter-terrorism. We hope to see it concluded during this visit.

Question: Mrs. Rao, once again on the nuclear deal, stories emanating from Washington have clearly stated that the Government of India needs to do a couple of things more yet to ensure the full commercial implementation of the deal. What are those things which India still has to reckon with? Secondly, during this visit is the Prime Minister going to seek the extradition of Headley?

Foreign Secretary: On the nuclear deal, Rajiv, I have already referred in my earlier answer to the steps that are being undertaken to ensure implementation of the nuclear deal. I have said discussions are going on, that we are confident of the timelines being observed. That is as far as the nuclear deal is concerned. On the issue of extradition, you are aware of this case relating to the whole Headley-Rana affair. This is under legal process in the United States. Our authorities are in touch with the American authorities on this matter. There is a legal process under way.

Question: I want to ask a broader question. You have mentioned all the issues that may come up when the two are talking. But there is always that comparison to the 2005 Summit between the US and Indian leadership where there was one big ticket item. Does this trip still lack that one big ticket item?

Foreign Secretary: I think you are approaching it from an angle which I do not entirely subscribe to because what you are looking at and what you need to envision in this context is a very strong India-US partnership which has bilateral aspects to it, which has regional and global aspects to it. You are talking of a mature relationship based on trust and mutual understanding. You are talking of two large democracies interacting and dialoguing with each other in their common desire to strengthen global equilibrium. We are talking of a global architecture that is open and inclusive, and building global consensus on a number of issues of mutual interest.

Question: Madam, you have just talked about the global architecture. My question is whether we are going to raise the issue of UN reforms and secondly of the claim of India to UNSC.

Foreign Secretary: Yes, we will definitely discuss this. There is the opportunity provided by this visit to raise issues of interest which are of importance to India. It is natural that we will raise this issue. I am sure you know that the United States supports the view that the UN Security Council must reflect contemporary world realities if it is to be credible and viable. And we have welcomed the recent US statement at the United Nations that the composition of the UN Security Council is the crux of the issue. The US is of the opinion that the new permanent members will have to be identified by name rather than by regions or groups. We have no difficulty with this position and we will continue to seek support from the United States for our candidature for a permanent seat in the UN Security Council.

Question: Madam, will our Prime Minister be raising the issue of the situation in Pakistan? If yes, will we be asking the US to put more pressure on Pakistan for acting against anti-India elements and misuse of financial aid?

Foreign Secretary: The visit affords us the opportunity to articulate our concerns about the situation in Pakistan, particularly with reference to the activities of terrorist groups operating from Pakistani soil. We have always emphasized the need for our friends and our partners and the international community to understand the nature of the situation in Pakistan and the need for Pakistan to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure that operates on its soil.

Question: Is there any pressure on India from the US to sign on NPT?

Foreign Secretary: No, there is no pressure.

Question: Mrs. Rao, I would just like to paraphrase what Anil just asked. Basically it is going to be a year since 26/11. Most of the key operatives are still at large. We have not had much headway in the same. How can we leverage our friendship with the US in a better way where we can have some desirable results?

Foreign Secretary: I think the United States fully understands the depth of our concerns on the issue of terrorism directed against us from across our borders. Secondly, they have worked very closely with us in the wake of the 26/11 attacks in Mumbai last year and this is ongoing cooperation. We just referred to the interaction we have had with the United States in the field of counter-terrorism and we have reason to be satisfied with that dialogue and that cooperation. I think the world, and the United States is included among our friends and partners who understand our position, is fully cognizant of the depth of our concerns on this issue and why there is merit and there is logic and there is reason in our approach in maintaining consistently that Pakistan must take credible, meaningful action to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure that continues to operate to our disadvantage, and doing great harm to our people from its territory.

Question: Madam, the Prime Minister will be meeting Robert Gates. Could you tell us something about what will happen there and whether any of the three agreements would be signed?

Foreign Secretary: The meeting, as I said, will take place between the Prime Minister and the US Defence Secretary Mr. Robert Gates. Our bilateral defence cooperation is progressing well. We are happy with the institutionalized interaction that takes place between our defence forces, regular military exercises and dialogue between the senior levels of the defence leadership. You are aware that the India-United States Defence Policy Group has just held its meeting earlier this month here in Delhi. Indian and US Armies held an exercise Yudh Abhyas, and our respective Air Forces held Cope India 2009, both last month. Due to this regular dialogue and interaction we have a much greater understanding of each other's strategic interest and of regional security issues. With the finalization of the end-use monitoring formulation, it is our hope, our expectation that our access to US defence technology and equipment will increase in future. As far as the other three agreements are concerned, we are continuing to discuss some pending issues relating to these agreements. They are not expected to be finalized during this visit.

Question: Madam Secretary, President Obama on his recent visit to China mentioned what he saw was a global vision for China in geopolitics of South Asia. Do you see this actually as a sellout for India? And would you bring this up during the upcoming visit of the Prime Minister as well?

Foreign Secretary: I think the use of the word that you just mentioned is not appropriate at all in this context. That is one. As far as the reference in the Joint Statement to the role that was envisaged for China together with the United States in South Asia, we had of course expressed certain views on this subject in our statement in response to a question asked of us two days ago. So, I do not want to repeat that statement. But our views on this are very well known.

Question: Mrs. Rao, do you think that the Joint Statement and the wording of that joint statement casts a shadow on the visit of the Prime Minister? And would the Government like to share its views on the proposed visit of Mirwaiz to China so that you can give us a broader view on that?

Foreign Secretary: No, I do not believe that statement casts a shadow on the visit of Prime Minister to Washington. The visit stands on its own. I have just enumerated the vision, the approach, and the expectations that we have of this visit of Prime Minister to Washington, and the nature of our partnership, the very durable and mature partnership between India and the United States which we hope to take forward during this visit. As far as the reported visit of Mirwaiz to China is concerned, we have stated on many previous occasions that we have not prevented Kashmiri leaders to travel abroad. Now if you are talking about his going to China in the context of the approach taken by the Chinese Government on issue of visas to Indian citizens resident in Jammu and Kashmir, on that issue our view is very well known. We do not subscribe to this approach which discriminates against our citizens on the basis of their domicile and their ethnicity.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you.

614. Statement by the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh on his departure to USA and Trinidad & Tobago.

New Delhi, November 21, 2009.

I am leaving today for Washington on a bilateral visit to the United States at the invitation of President Barack Obama. I will thereafter attend the Commonwealth Heads of Government Summit in Trinidad and Tobago.

India attaches high priority to its relations with the USA. Our bilateral agenda covers almost all areas of human endeavour. The United States is our largest trading partner in goods and services, and we have deep economic ties. There is a large Indian American community and robust people-to-people exchanges. Above all, we share common values and commitment to democracy, pluralism and human rights.

The last several years have witnessed a transformation in India-US relations. Today, they are characterized by greater maturity, depth and convergence of interests. I look forward to building upon this momentum during my visit.

A sustained and dynamic India-US partnership is essential if we are to meet the global challenges of the 21st century. At the bilateral level, we look forward to building upon our Strategic Dialogue by adding greater substance to our cooperation in areas such as trade and investment, services, energy, science and technology, defence, high technology trade, education, agriculture and health.

I also look forward to exchanging views with President Obama on the major global threats and challenges of our times, such as international terrorism, climate change, the global economic slowdown, the Doha round of trade negotiations, and nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation. I also expect to discuss the situation in Afghanistan, and other regional issues.

During the visit, I will be meeting senior members of the US Cabinet and US Senators and Congressmen. I will attend a business event jointly hosted by the US Chamber of Commerce and the US-India Business Council where members of the India-US CEOs Forum will also be present. I will address the Council of Foreign Relations and Woodrow Wilson Centre, where I look forward to interacting with leading opinion makers of the United States. I will meet members of the Indian American community who are playing an important role in fostering closer ties between our two countries.

After my visit to Washington, I will travel to Port of Spain to attend the meeting of the Commonwealth Heads of Government. This is the 60th anniversary year of the Commonwealth. We attach high importance to the role of the Commonwealth in promoting cooperation amongst its members and in engaging the world in shaping a cooperative, equitable and development-friendly world order. The theme for CHOGM-2009 is "Partnering for a More Equitable and Sustainable Future". I look forward to a wide-ranging exchange of views with other leaders on how we can address the challenge of climate change, which is a matter of particular concern to developing countries, small states and vulnerable states.

Washington, November 23, 2009.

Ladies and Gentlemen, I am truly honoured by the invitation to address such a distinguished gathering and to be among many old friends and well wishers of India in this season of Thanksgiving. I am very grateful to each one of you for being present to listen to me this evening. Many of you have spent long years in the study of India. You have provided intellectual sustenance to the idea of a strong India-US partnership and what it means for our two democracies and the world at large.

Ladies and Gentlemen: I see the future of the India-US partnership with confidence and optimism. There is a growing convergence in our national interests, both within the bilateral framework and on regional and global issues. The changes in the global economic and political structures and the growing interdependence among nations today offer us a unique opportunity to look beyond our bilateral engagement to establish a strategic partnership of global dimensions. If we are to effectively tackle the multiple challenges that confront the world, India and the United States, as two leading democracies, must work together.

The immediate challenge before us is to bring the world to full recovery from the global economic and financial crisis. I have no doubt that the creative and entrepreneurial genius of the American people will ensure that the US economy emerges from this crisis stronger and well placed to contribute to global economic growth. India is playing its own part in the process of global recovery. Despite the slowdown, our economy grew by 6.7% last year and is expected to grow by 6.5% in the current fiscal year. India and the United States have strong compulsions to work towards an open and liberal regime for transfers of goods, services, investments and technology. This will stimulate recovery in the global economy, create jobs and spur growth in our own economies.

Ladies and Gentlemen: Our generation has an opportunity given to few, to remake a new global equilibrium after the irreversible changes brought about by the rapid geopolitical and economic shifts of the recent past. Nowhere are the changes more visible than in Asia. India and the United States can work together with other countries in the region to create an open and inclusive regional architecture in the Asia-Pacific region. The India-US partnership can contribute to an orderly transition to the new order and be an important factor for global peace and stability. Both India and the United States draw strength from our common values of respect for cultural diversity, democracy, freedom of expression and the rule of law. Our two nations have been shaped by the thoughts and ideals of two apostles of peace of the 20th century, Mahatma Gandhi and the Reverend Martin Luther King Jr. We should advance these ideals as fundamental rights of all human beings. We have made some progress in moving towards a more representative mechanism to manage global economic and financial issues. The same cannot be said about governance of the political and security order. There is a need to reform the United Nations and its Security Council.

Ladies and Gentlemen: In my interactions with President Obama, I have found shared thinking on the moral imperative of putting the poor at the forefront of the global agenda. In Africa, Asia and elsewhere, they must have access to education and give them bankable skills, to nutrition and to health-care. The India-US partnership can promote global cooperation in dealing with issues that the world has to face together, whether it is hunger, global security and terrorism, nuclear disarmament, climate change or the spread of pandemics.

Ladies and Gentlemen, History has taught us that peace, security and prosperity are indivisible. That is why the evolution of Afghanistan as a stable and moderate nation state is so vital for the region and the world. The road to peace in Afghanistan will be long and hard. But, given the high stakes involved, the commitment of the international community must be sustained by firm resolve and unity of purpose. India has enduring civilizational links with Afghanistan. We do not see Afghanistan as a theatre of influence. Our interest is in building a region of peace and stability. India will continue to assist Afghanistan in building its institutions and its human resources. Democracy in an ancient land like Afghanistan will take time to take root and to come to terms with the country's history and tribal traditions. It is vitally important that all major regional and international players put their weight behind the government of Afghanistan. This is the only way Afghanistan can meet the daunting challenges it faces.

Ladies and Gentlemen: My government has invested heavily over the past few years in normalizing relations with our neighbour Pakistan. We made considerable progress on the road to a durable and permanent settlement of all outstanding issues. I have said that we are ready to pick up the threads of the dialogue, including on issues related to Jammu & Kashmir. We seek a South Asia of peace, friendship and prosperity, where its borders will be energized by the flow of people, goods and ideas. For this to happen, Pakistan must make a break with the past, abjure terrorism and come to the table with good faith and sincerity. It is my solemn hope that India and Pakistan can together move forward to write a new chapter in the history of our sub-continent. We are three days away from the first anniversary of the heinous and barbaric terrorist attacks on Mumbai. The trauma of that attack continues to haunt us. Terrorism poses an existential threat to the civilized world and must be defeated. We should not harbour any illusions that a selective approach to terrorism, tackling it in one place while ignoring it in others, will work or pay dividends.

Ladies and Gentlemen: We welcome the fact that President Obama has committed the United States to the goal of a world free of nuclear weapons. India has been committed to this goal since our independence. We believe that India's security will be enhanced, not diminished, by the complete elimination of nuclear weapons the world over. There is much that India and the United States can do together to reduce the global risks of nuclear proliferation, including by building a new global consensus on the way ahead. The negotiation of a verifiable Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty in the Conference on Disarmament will be a significant contribution. We welcome President Obama's initiative to host a Summit on Nuclear Security in April next year. Our countries can play a vital role in strengthening global resolve to prevent terrorists from gaining access to materials and technologies related to weapons of mass destruction.

Ladies and Gentlemen: The negotiations heading toward Copenhagen are proving more difficult than we would have liked. There is disagreement among industrialized countries and between industrialized and developing countries. It is important for all countries to make every effort to contribute to a successful outcome at Copenhagen. India was a latecomer to industrialization and as such we have contributed very little to the accumulation of greenhouse gas emissions that cause global warming. But, we are determined to be part of the solution to the problem. We are willing to work towards any solution that does not compromise the right of developing countries to develop and lift their populations out of poverty. We recognize that we have to act on climate change in our own interest, since we are among the countries most impacted by climate change. It is for this reason that we have adopted an ambitious National Action Plan on Climate Change. We are committed to ambitious and time-bound outcomes that will increase the energy efficiency of our economy, the share of clean energy including nuclear power in our energy mix, and our forest cover. All this will require considerable resources. We have undertaken to do what we can with our own resources. We will do more if there is global support in terms of financial resources and technology transfer.

Ladies and Gentlemen: India's economic transition is gathering pace. It will be faster in the years ahead as we harness the expanding economic productivity of our young population. The unshackling of our markets; the latent demand, particularly of our rural economy; and the fact that our domestic savings rate now is as high as 35% of our GDP all suggest that we can achieve a sustained growth of 9% per annum over the next couple of decades. This will create the resources to make our development process more inclusive as well as sustainable. The social agenda has come to dominate the domestic political discourse in our two countries. This was the verdict of our general elections held in May 2009, and I believe it was also of yours. The time is opportune for us to substantially enhance our cooperation in the critical areas of education, health, energy, science and technology and agriculture. Collaboration between our software industries has powered the global knowledge economy. We can build and we must on this experience and look at new frontiers of cooperation. American agricultural science and technology can help India usher in a second Green Revolution. India's competitive advantages in the pharmaceutical and medical services industries can support healthcare reform in the United States.

India has embarked on its largest education expansion program since independence. There are plans to set up more than 40 new universities and institutions. We would like to benefit from the great American university system, which attracts a large number of Indian students every year. We can cooperate in the development, production and deployment of green technologies. In this context, we should fully harness our bilateral civil nuclear cooperation agreement to shape the nuclear renaissance in the energy industry.

Ladies and Gentlemen: We deeply appreciate the cooperation that we have received from the United States in the area of counter-terrorism in the recent past. I am convinced that we can do much more together on a sustained basis to combat increasingly sophisticated terror networks, transnational criminal groups and cyber terrorism. Our defence and strategic dialogues have added important dimensions to our relationship. Maritime security, including countering piracy and protecting sea-lanes of communication in the Indian Ocean and beyond, is another important area where we should expand cooperation.

Ladies and Gentlemen: The edifice of the India-US partnership is founded on many pillars. It is a relationship based on pragmatism and principle; and strengthened by shared values and common interests. Our ties draw heavily on the strength and vitality of the Indian and American people. The 2.7 million strong Indian American community has made good the enormous opportunities provided to them in their adopted home. They are a powerful factor in drawing our two countries together. President Obama's advocacy of an inclusive approach to problem solving and primacy to dialogue as an instrument of policy create many more opportunities for our two democracies to work together in realizing the vision of a shared destiny for all humankind. Collaboration and cooperation between our two countries will be indispensable for shaping a global society that is responsive to the needs and aspirations of the 21st century and where countries can pursue their legitimate interests in a secure and just environment. Ladies and Gentlemen I thank you for listening to me Thank You.

Washington (D. C), November 23, 2009.

Ladies and Gentlemen, It is a great pleasure to be visiting Washington DC again. I am looking forward to my discussions with President Obama tomorrow, when my official program begins. Today, however, belongs to the private sector and I am therefore delighted to have this opportunity to address this select gathering of distinguished leaders of business and commerce.

Ladies and Gentlemen, In today's economically integrated world, economic relationships are the bedrock on which social, cultural and political relationships are built. A strategic relationship that is not underpinned by a strong economic relationship is unlikely to prosper. On the other hand, a web of economic relationships intensifies both business-to-business and people to people contacts, promoting a deeper and better understanding between countries. That is the kind of relationship we wish to see with this great country, the United States.

Ladies and Gentlemen, India's new and evolving relationship with the United States is in many ways the natural consequence of changes in economic policies and business practices that have occurred as countries have responded to the process of global economic integration. India's policies have also changed in the process making our economy much more open to trade and investment, and more closely integrated with the world economy. These policies have yielded handsome benefits for India no doubt. In the five years before the global crisis of 2008, India's economy was growing at an unprecedented rate of 9 percent per year on average in the last five years. India began to be perceived as one of the fastest growing emerging market economies. It became an attractive destination for foreign investment as well.

Ladies and Gentlemen, I am happy to say that American business has been part of India's economic transformation. Most of the large American corporations are now present in India as foreign direct investors. Many are engaged in high technology work, with their Indian operations forming part of their global supply chains. US business in India has also groomed managerial and technical talent which they have liberally used for their global operations. A number of companies have located their research facilities in India attracted by the availability of high quality scientific talent at relatively competitive costs. In recent years Indian companies in sectors ranging from automobile components, tractors, pharmaceuticals and software have also been investing in the United States and creating thousands of jobs in this great country. This two-way flow illustrates the mutually beneficial nature of our evolving and growing relationship.

Ladies and Gentlemen, Our engagement with the US has been expanding on many fronts, throwing up new business opportunities. The nuclear agreement was a landmark in Indo-US relations and I would like to acknowledge with deep appreciation, the very supportive role American business played in persuading US Congress to support this important initiative. We are currently finalizing the details that will make the agreement fully operational. Once that is done, it will remove restrictions on the flow of technology in nuclear and many other areas. This will open a large area of commercial opportunities for US business in India. We have an expanding area of defence collaboration including the possibility of procurement of defence equipment from the US. Our domestic private sector defence suppliers are now allowed to have upto 26% foreign investment, opening a new avenue for Indo-US collaboration in defence related activities.

As we work with other countries to meet the challenge of climate change, we are also addressing the problem domestically through a National Action Plan for Climate Change, which outlines many new initiatives in energy efficiency, and clean energy. These are areas where your companies are leaders in the industry, and we should explore possible areas of cooperation. We plan to sign with the US Government tomorrow a Memorandum of Understanding on Energy Security, Clean Energy and Climate Change. This will provide a framework for pursuing bilateral cooperation in specific areas. Ladies and gentlemen, As you very well know, the last year has not been an easy one for the global economy. The world has been through an unprecedented financial and economic crisis which has only now shown signs of moderating.

There are two fallouts of the crisis that have implications for the Indo-US relations. The first arises from the recognition that managing a highly integrated global economy requires coordinated and collective action on a global scale. After the Pittsburgh Summit, the G-20 has become the premier forum for international consultation and dialogue. As members of this group, our two countries will have the opportunity to cooperate in addressing all the critical issues now facing the world economy. The second is the recognition that the large dynamic emerging market economies of the world are now significant players in the global economy. They are expected to grow faster than the industrialized countries in the years that lie ahead.

This will gradually increase their share in the world economy and also increase their contribution to global growth. India today is the second largest of the dynamic emerging economies.

Like other emerging market economies, we too have been affected by the crisis of 2008. Our growth rate has decelerated to 6.7 percent in 2008-09 and will remain at around 6.5 percent in the current fiscal year. However, we expect to accelerate from this level and get back to a growth of around 9% per annum within two years. There are a number of reasons why I believe the Indian economy will resume rapid growth despite the fact that slower growth in industrialized countries will limit our export possibilities. Our domestic savings rate has increased very substantially and supported an investment rate of 39% of our GDP in 2007-08, most of it being in private investment. We have ample human resources in terms of labour skills, scientific talent, and management capability. Looking ahead we enjoy a demographic dividend in terms of a growing working age populations in a world that is aging very rapidly. We have a vibrant and innovative private sector, which operates independently of our government. Rapid and inclusive growth in the years ahead will enable us to achieve our social objectives. It will also result in a few hundred million people entering the Indian market for a wide range of consumer goods. American companies interested in global markets would be well advised to look at the emerging possibilities on the horizon in India.

Ladies and Gentlemen, A major weakness that limits our growth possibilities is inadequacy of hard infrastructure. We need massive investment in energy, transport and urban infrastructure to be able to support a high rate of economic growth. Expanded investment in these areas will help offset weak export demand by providing a domestic demand impetus to support higher rates of economic growth. We have taken a number of steps to improve our processes of project approval and implementation. I invite American business to look at the large number of public private partnership projects in infrastructure being promoted by the Central Government and individual State governments in our country. We would welcome innovative ideas to finance such public private partnerships.

Ladies and Gentlemen, American business is also welcome to invest in other areas. These include agriculture based businesses such in the post harvest segment including cold chains, agricultural marketing and food processing; manufacturing and mining; and of course services such as financial services, retailing and tourism. Ladies and gentlemen, Wherever I meet businessmen to talk of our plans for the future, the question I am most often asked is whether economic reforms will continue. You should have no doubt on that score. The economic reforms of the past have brought us advantages and I can assure you that we will continue down the road. We might do it gradually, and in a manner which builds a consensus for economic and social change. But I assure you we will persevere. We plan to push ahead on key reforms in several areas especially those aimed at bringing the deficit under control while ensuring a strong expansion in investment in infrastructure. Tax reforms, especially the introduction of a Goods and Services Tax, are a very important part of the agenda. So also are financial sector reforms. We are also committed to major reforms in education and skill development. We have started a program to raise resources by sale of equity in public sector enterprises. Legal reforms aimed at reducing delays are another key priority.

Ladies and gentlemen, Both our governments attach a high importance to the role of the private sector. President Obama and I have reconstituted the Indo-US CEOs' Forum, with Mr. David Cote and Mr. Ratan Tata as co-chairs. The forum will provide a platform where representatives of our private sectors can submit joint recommendations to the two governments on ways of enhancing private sector cooperation between our countries. I look forward to the recommendations emerging from this distinguished group. Ladies and gentlemen, American business has played a vital role in transforming the Indo-US relationship into what can today be called a strategic partnership between the world's oldest democracy and the world's largest democracy. I thank all those here who have contributed to this process. I invite you to stay engaged as we transform India from a low income country into a vibrant market of over a billion people, with steadily growing purchasing power. With this I wish to thank each one of you for being present this afternoon. Thank you.

619. Media Interaction of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on the Prime Minister's engagements in Washington.

Washington (D. C), November 23, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good evening to all of you and welcome to the Press Centre. First of all thanks for your patience. I know many of you have adjourned your dinners or you have left it in between to join the media interaction. That is really appreciated. Foreign Secretary has had a very busy day and has been practically running from one meeting to another and that is the reason why we have had to reschedule the interaction and I hope you will understand.

Prime Minister has had a number of very important engagements today. Foreign Secretary would be talking to you about Prime Minister's engagements. Thereafter she would be happy to take a few questions.

Madam, may I invite you for your opening remarks.

Foreign Secretary (Shrimati Nirupama Rao): Thank you, Vishnu. Let me first run you through the various engagements of the Prime Minister today. The morning began with a call by the Secretary of Defence Mr. Robert Gates on the Prime Minister. This was followed by calls by members of the US House of Representatives. And then, as you know, Prime Minister addressed the US Chamber of Commerce and the US India Business Council in an interaction over lunch. In the afternoon, there was a call on the Prime Minister by United States' Senators followed by Prime Minister's Address at the Council on Foreign Relations. Thereafter, he met with the Speaker of the US House of Representatives Ms Nancy Pelosi. That was the list of the engagements today.

In his meetings with various interlocutors today, Prime Minister stressed that he hoped his visit to the United States would open a new chapter in the relations between the two countries. He spoke of India's interest in seeking an expanded, multifaceted relationship with the United States.

With the US Defence Secretary, the discussions focused on the expansion of military-to-military cooperation. As you know, India and the United States have engaged in cooperation in the field of defence in recent years. There have been exchanges of visits of senior officials from the military establishments of both countries. Exercises have been held and the two countries have spoken of cooperation in the protection of sea lanes and the control of piracy. At the meeting today, both sides felt that they could work together for their mutual advantage and they were optimistic about the prospects of cooperation in this area.

From our side we raised the issue of export controls that have been imposed on some of our entities from the American side. A relaxation of these controls, it was felt, would spur the opportunities for more defence cooperation and bilateral exchanges in this sector.

In his meetings today Prime Minister mentioned that there were no irritants in the India-US relationship, and that it was a partnership based on both principle and pragmatism. The situation in the region was also discussed during these meetings - the situation in Afghanistan, India's relations with Pakistan, and also our relations with China.

In the discussion on Afghanistan, we spoke of the need to deal effectively with the rise of terrorism in the region in Afghanistan and, of course, the operation of terrorist groups based in Pakistan. It was felt that both India and the United States could work together to help advance development and prosperity for the people of Afghanistan, particularly in building the capacity of the Afghan people as they move forward to modernize the country. Prime Minister stressed that our sole motive in assisting Afghanistan is to help rebuild that country and to assist the people of Afghanistan.

In these meetings, both sides were agreed that it was necessary to defeat the forces of terrorism and religious extremism in Afghanistan and that it was necessary to stay involved in this process in the near and medium term. It was mentioned that the Afghan people do not want the return of the Taliban, that they were for a consolidation of democratic forces in that country.

Prime Minister briefed his US interlocutors about our concerns regarding terrorism emanating from Pakistan especially in the context of developments relating to the Mumbai terrorist massacre and the developments following that. He referred to the fact that the United States had lost six nationals in that terrorist attack and that it was in the interest of both our countries to ensure that the terrorists responsible for the attack on Mumbai be brought to book.

Prime Minister emphasized that we want to live in peace with Pakistan, but that it is difficult to carry forward the process of normalization unless and until, of course, Pakistan is able to move meaningfully on tackling our concerns about terrorism directed against India.

The issue of arms supplies to Pakistan and assistance in that area from the United States was also mentioned in the conversations. Attention was drawn to our concerns that such equipment had been used against our country in the past; that we continued to have such worries today and for the future also; and that we wished to leave this point with the United States in order that they can reflect fully on this issue.

I will give you the names of the US Congressmen and Senators who met the Prime Minister today. The first call in the morning was by the members of the House of Representatives. There were eight of them who came to see the Prime Minister led by Rep. Steny Hoyer, Democrat, Maryland, House Majority Leader. Then there was Rep. Chris Van Hollen, , Deputy to the Speaker; Rep. Howard Berman, Democrat, California, Chairman, House Foreign Affairs Committee; Rep. Gary Ackerman, Democrat, New York, Chairman, House Subcommittee on Middle-East and South Asia (incidentally he is a Padma Vibhushan); Rep. Brad Sherman, Democrat, California, Chairman, House Subcommittee on Terrorism, Nonproliferation and Trade; Rep. Edward Markey, Democrat, Massachusetts, Chairman, House Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming; Rep. Ed Royce, Republican, California, Republican Co-Chair of the India Caucus and Ranking Member, House Subcommittee on Terrorism, Nonproliferation and Trade; and Rep. Jim McDermott, Democratic Co-Chair of the India Caucus.

The Senators who called on Prime Minister were: Senator Joseph Lieberman, Independent, Connecticut, Chairman, Select Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs; Senator Robert Casey, Democrat, Pennsylvania, Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Near-Eastern, Middle-Eastern and South Asian Affairs; Senator Evan Bayh, Democrat, Indiana, Member, Senate Committee on Armed Services, Select Intelligence, Energy and Natural Resources, Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs; and Senator Orrin Hatch, Republican, Utah, Member of the Senate Intelligence Committee and one of the senior most members of the Senate.

That's it. I will take your questions.

Question: Did Mr. Robert Gates raise the issue of ...(Inaudible)...

Foreign Secretary: Yes, this issue did come up in the discussions and we informed the American side that these were still under consideration and would take a little more time for us to finalise.

Question: Foreign Secretary, please give us a sense of the type of agreements which we are likely to see signed. In particular, is there some sort of finalization of a reprocessing agreement on the cards?

Foreign Secretary: In my briefing in Delhi I had given you an idea of the agreements and the memoranda that we were looking at. As far as the arrangements for reprocessing talks are concerned, these are ongoing. We were not looking at finalizing them tomorrow in any case. This is an ongoing process. As I mentioned to you, these talks have progressed well and there are a number of issues that were being discussed between the American side and our side. Our experts have been engaged very intensively in these discussions. I am happy to report that much progress has been made and we will be finalizing these issues very shortly.

Question: Is it your sense that as President Obama goes about making the final determination on the policy on Afghanistan, India's views might find some kind of reflection directly, indirectly, subconsciously?

Foreign Secretary: I am sure that the role that we have played and the experience coming out of it has been looked at very closely by the American side because we have engaged in constant consultations with our American friends and interlocutors over the last few years about Afghanistan. They are very well aware of the work that we have been doing in Afghanistan, the development-related work, the capacity building, which I believe is going to be in very close focus as the new policy is unveiled. I believe they are very close to announcing what the new strategy will be. My hunch is that it will focus quite intensively on capacity-building, on the civilian aspects of what needs to be done in terms of normalizing the situation in Afghanistan.

Question: You talked about the PM raising several questions about Pakistan and Afghanistan with the US Defence Secretary.

Foreign Secretary: And his other interlocutors.

Question: What was the reaction of the Defence Secretary with regard to PM's concerns? How did he react?

Foreign Secretary: As I mentioned, both sides felt that the struggle or the focus on dealing with extremist and terrorist forces in Afghanistan should not be whittled down, should not be diluted in any way; that it was necessary to focus on the defeat of these forces; and that the international community - and PM mentioned this in all his meetings - and particularly the United States should continue to stay involved in Afghanistan.

Question: Did the Congressmen doubt our intentions in Afghanistan? Why did the Prime Minister have to explain to them about our position in Afghanistan? Did they talk about the Consulates in the sense that ...

Foreign Secretary: No, they did not talk about the Consulates and there was never any expression of doubt, as you referred to it, about our role in Afghanistan. I think it was a very fruitful and productive exchange of views. They were discussing the situation in the region and the need for the international community to stay involved in Afghanistan, to help the Afghan people, to help the consolidation of democracy and the return to peace in that country; and that it was a complex situation; and that it would require the close attention and involvement of the international community. It was in that context that Afghanistan was discussed.

Question: Did the US side update Prime Minister Singh on President Obama's Asia and China visit and seem responsive to some of our concerns?

Foreign Secretary: The issue of China did come up and the issue was in terms of the peaceful rise of China and the need to engage with China. Particularly from our side we were able to brief our American friends about developments in our relations with China; the fact that we seek to build a multidimensional relationship with China, which is our neighbor; that this is a complex relationship; there are outstanding issues that remain to be resolved in the dialogue between India and China; but that it was necessary to engage with China; that there is space enough for India and China to grow, to develop their relationship, and also to cooperate in so many areas which are of concern to us as we develop our economies and as we seek to project the interests of the developing world, particularly in multilateral fora.

Question: For the first time since the Prime Minister has gone on to say that our worries about China's assertiveness are far more serious than acknowledged. He went on to elaborate on that. Do you have any comments on that? What are these issues of assertiveness on the part of China which worry India?

Foreign Secretary: I think you have to see this in the right context. I do not think you should take it out of the context. I would like to draw your attention once again to what Prime Minister said. He said firstly, the world has to prepare for the peaceful rise of China; secondly, engagement is the right strategy for India to deal with China and also for countries like the United States when it comes to their dialogue with China. That is the route we are following. We are engaged in a good, constructive dialogue with China. While there are complexities, while there are issues that remain to be resolved, we will discuss these with China as we want to develop the relationship. So, what he said must be seen in that context.

Question: Will there be any statement on China in the Joint Statement, something on the lines of what is drafted out of Beijing last week?

Foreign Secretary: I think we should wait to see the Joint Statement. I am not going to be looking into the future. I think you should wait. It should be with you in the next 24 hours.

Question: I have two questions, if I may. One is on Pakistan. India has often spoken about the need for Pakistan to act more swiftly in bringing suspects to justice. What is your impression of the US response to this concern? Do you think they are more willing to pressure Pakistan more openly or behind the scenes? How receptive do they seem after all on this message? Second question is: the Prime Minister mentioned today at the USIBC that he expects more cooperation in counter-terrorism cooperation between India and the US?

Foreign Secretary: As to Pakistan and whether the United States is receptive to our concerns, the short answer to that is, Yes. I will answer that in the affirmative. They are receptive; they are sensitive to India's concerns. We have an ongoing dialogue with them relating to counter-terrorism, relating to our concerns about issues that follow from the Mumbai terror attacks. We have had very good cooperation in this area between India and the United States. So, to answer your question, there is a great deal of receptivity to our concerns from the United States.

Question: And do you feel hopeful that that receptivity will actually lead to pressure on the ground by the United States on Pakistan?

Foreign Secretary: We have said consistently that Pakistan needs to take concrete action as far as delivering on the Mumbai terror attacks is concerned because there are no two opinions about the fact that the attack originated out of Pakistan. Even Pakistan and Pakistani agencies have come to acknowledge that. So, the issue here is that Pakistan needs to take action against those responsible, the conspirators, the culprits, the individuals who are culpable in this attack. The United States has been made well aware of our concerns and they fully understand that there is need for the international community to also persuade Pakistan that it needs to act in this regard. We see the United States as being very receptive to our concerns on this.

Question: Madam, we have been repeatedly voicing our concerns over the misuse of international aid and American aid by Pakistan to bolster anti-India terror infrastructure. But apparently it has not worked. Americans believe that Pakistan needs aid of some sort. That is the point of divergence. Why despite our repeated pleading that this aid is not being used in the right direction, Americans are not able to see thorough that?

Foreign Secretary: I think our concerns have been registered very well with the American side and we are able to discuss these issues with a great deal of openness, with a great deal of candour with the American side. They are conscious of our concerns, our point of view, our approach to this issue. They are very conscious of it. We have not only mentioned it to the Americans but we take it up, we are very specific in the articulation of our concerns on this issue and they are receptive. What we have said is that there needs to be greater accountability about this kind of aid that is being provided to Pakistan, particularly defence-related, military aid because our experience with Pakistan in this regard has been an unhappy one. The United States is increasingly coming to be aware of this aspect of our concerns. A few years ago, I think the situation was different. But today, with the growth in our relationship with the United States, with the process of maturity that you see in this relationship, and the many dimensions that have been added on to our dialogue, particularly as far as the counter-terrorism dialogue is concerned, particularly as far as our security and strategic dialogue is concerned, all these issues have figured and the United States is coming to be increasingly sensitive to these issues.

Question: On Afghanistan, you mentioned about the ...(Inaudible)...

Foreign Secretary: No, we are not for that analysis. That is because we see the Taliban, the Al Qaeda, the terrorist groups that operate within Pakistan or in the border areas between Afghanistan and Pakistan, as all part of one genealogy eventually.

Question: So, there is an emerging difference of opinion with the Obama Administration's understanding and ...

Foreign Secretary: I believe the Obama Administration is also fully aware of the intensity of this threat and the interconnected nature of these groups. I do not believe they are unaware of it. In our conversations, in our dialogue with them, they are fully on board as far as our concerns about these issues.

Question: Do you think that they would use, for instance, Kashmir as a kind of a card to play off putting pressure on Pakistan?

Foreign Secretary: No, not at all. That has not figured in our discussions with them today, neither have I seen that figure in discussions that I have been privy to in the last few months.

Question: Madam, this is about Af-Pak relations but when we are dealing with the US. How do you view the US role in Afghanistan because they themselves do not seem to be that sure after their Iraq experience. They do not know what to do with Iraq? Tomorrow suppose they say we do not know what to do with Afghanistan, where do we stand? How do we deal with it?

Foreign Secretary: I said earlier in this interaction that we support the role in Afghanistan of the international community because they are there to deal with extremist forces. On the ground many of these countries are involved in development work in Afghanistan in building a more modern country. That is the way we look at it.

Question: The Americans are not sure of their role in Afghanistan just as they are not about their role in Iraq. They are planning to pull out of Iraq.

Foreign Secretary: You ask me about Afghanistan. I do not believe they are going to pull out of Afghanistan. There is nothing to indicate that they are going to pull out of Afghanistan. You can come up with all kinds of theories but I am talking of what I know of the situation.

Question: Did permanent UN Security Council seat for India come up or going to come up? What new chapter are we talking about from the Bush Administration to the Obama Administration for India-US relations?

Foreign Secretary: The new chapter is about the strategic dialogue, the expansion of relations, the consolidation of dialogue. I think that is what the new chapter is about, the strategic partnership. The Prime Minister's speech at the Council on Foreign Relations today outlined that with great eloquence. I think you should read that speech more closely. With regard to UN Security Council seat, this continues to be discussed with the US side. The US side is also for expansion of the Security Council both in the permanent and non-permanent categories. They are also talking about criteria which would qualify a country to be considered for such membership whether it is contribution to international peace and security, role in the United Nations. These are all very salutary developments. It shows that the view of the United States on this issue is evolving in a very positive direction. So, we continued to stay engaged with them on this issue, particularly through our Permanent Missions in New York. In fact, the two PRs have a very productive dialogue on this issue.

Question: Madam, in July when Hillary Clinton came to India she made repeated pitch for the resumption of Composite Dialogue between India and Pakistan. What is surprising about this trip is that we do not get any pronouncements from American officials that India and Pakistan should resume Composite Dialogue? How has American perception changed? Coupled with this, the new investigations or disclosures that point to the links between Headley-Rana plot and their links in the ISI. So, are Americans now more realistic about Pakistan's involvement?

Foreign Secretary: You should probably ask them that question. Having said that let me say that they are very conscious of our concerns about Pakistan and why the present situation is not conducive to the resumption of dialogue with Pakistan. We have not shut the door on dialogue with Pakistan. I think the Prime Minister has said that time and time again that we want to extend the hand of peace and dialogue to Pakistan. But for this dialogue to proceed and for this dialogue to acquire momentum, we would need to have a closure, we would need to have progress as far as the addressing of our concerns about action that needs to be taken against those responsible, Pakistanis responsible for the Mumbai terror attacks. The weight of public opinion in India today is so strong on this issue and we are a vibrant democracy and we always remain sensitive to the concerns of our people also on this issue. This is apart from Government policy itself that you have to take a composite view of the situation as it exists today within India. The mood of the people, the mood in Parliament, the feelings that have been expressed, our concerns, these cannot be just ignored.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much and goodnight.

Foreign Secretary: Thank you. Good night.

Washington (D. C), November 24, 2009.

Vice President Mr. Joseph Biden,

Mrs. Biden,

Secretary of State Mrs. Hillary Clinton,

Ladies and gentlemen.

I thank you for your warm remarks and gracious hospitality.

Mr. Vice President, your leadership in the Senate, especially on the civil nuclear initiative, helped transform the relationship between our two democracies. We look to your continued guidance to take our relations forward.

Madam Secretary, I convey my sincere gratitude to you for the time and energy you have invested in advancing our relations. Your visit to India in July this year has prepared the groundwork for a strengthened strategic partnership between our two countries.

At our meeting today, President Obama and I reaffirmed the importance of the India-US partnership for meeting the aspirations of our people and the global challenges of the 21st century.

The civil nuclear initiative was a turning point in our relations. We are ready for an intense and wide-ranging cooperative engagement in all areas of human endeavour. In pursuing this, our shared values, common interests and the vitality and creativity of our people are our greatest assets.

Technology is the key to meeting many challenges, whether it is the transition to a green economy, achieving energy security, combating pandemics or lifting millions of our people above poverty. We should work to put in place a policy framework that facilitates the transfer of high technologies to India.

We have a shared interest in promoting prosperity and stability in the Asia Pacific region. We have a common stake in peace and development in Afghanistan and in defeating terrorism in South Asia.

The creation of the G-20 framework to address global economic and financial issues was an act of statesmanship. We should build upon this cooperative and inclusive approach to problem solving at the global level.

Mahatma Gandhi had once said, and I quote "The difference between what we do and what we are capable of doing would suffice to solve most of the world's problems", unquote. Today we have sought to bridge the gap between what is and what can be in our relations.

Ladies and Gentlemen, I now invite you to join me in a toast to:

- The health and happiness of Vice President Mr. Joseph Biden and Mrs. Biden and Secretary of State Mrs. Hillary Clinton;
- The friendly people of the United States of America; and
- To greater friendship between India and the United States.

Washington (D. C), November 24, 2009.

PRESIDENT OBAMA: Prime Minister Singh, Mrs. Gursharan Kaur, members of the Indian delegation -- on behalf of Michelle and myself, it is a great pleasure to welcome you to the White House. On behalf of the American people, it is my great honor to welcome you to the United States.

Mr. Prime Minister, yours is the first official state visit of my presidency, and it is fitting that you and India be so recognized. (Applause.) This visit reflects the high esteem in which I and the American people hold your wise leadership. It reflects the abiding bonds of respect and friendship between our people, including our friends in the Indian American community who join us here today.

But above all, your visit, at this pivotal moment in history, speaks to the opportunity before us -- to build the relationship between our nations, born in the last century, into one of the defining partnerships of the 21st century.

For while our two nations have taken different paths to reach this moment, ours is a common story. It's the story of two proud people who struggled to break free from an empire and declare their independence. Two bold experiments in democracy with constitutions that begin with the same simple words: "We the people." Two great republics dedicated to the ideals of liberty, justice, equality, and the never-ending work of perfecting their union.

It's the story of two economic marvels fueled by an ethic of hard work and innovation. And today, our nations are two global leaders, driven not to dominate other nations but to build a future of security and prosperity for all nations.

Mr. Prime Minister, as we work to build that future, India is indispensable.

As leading economies, the United States and India can strengthen the global economic recovery, promote trade that creates jobs for both our people, and pursue growth that is balanced and sustained.

As nuclear powers, we can be full partners in preventing the spread of the world's most deadly weapons, securing loose nuclear materials from terrorists, and pursuing our shared vision of a world without nuclear weapons.

As people who've known the pain and anguish of terrorism, we can stand together -- cooperating to prevent future attacks, and promote the development and prosperity that undermines violent extremism.

As India becomes an increasingly influential global power, we can partner to meet other transnational challenges: developing clean energy partnerships, confronting climate change, stopping infectious disease, reducing hunger and working to end extreme poverty in our time.

And as the world's largest democracies, we can keep faith with our common values -- speaking out and standing up for the rights and dignity to which all human beings are entitled; and showing that nations that respect the rights and aspirations of their people are ultimately more stable, more secure and more successful.

This is the India that America welcomes today -- a leader in Asia and around the world. These are the challenges we are summoned to meet in partnership. This is the progress that is possible -- today and in the days and years ahead.

And, Mr. Prime Minister, as we build our common future, we can draw strength from our shared past. For it was exactly 60 years ago, in a ceremony not unlike this, that an American president welcomed to the White House the first prime minister of an independent India. And while the decades that followed were not without their challenges, the spirit of that first visit is with us today -- the same sense of possibility, the same hope for the future.

So as President Truman said of President Nehru, it is my privilege to welcome "the respected leader of a great nation of free people."

And as Prime Minister Nehru said of the work before them, may our two great nations "find many ways of working together in friendly and fruitful cooperation to our mutual advantage, and for the good of humanity."

Mr. Prime Minister, Mrs. Kaur, in that spirit, I welcome you to the United States of America.

PRIME MINISTER DR. MANMOHAN SINGH: Mr. President, First Lady Mrs. Obama, thank you very much for your warm words of welcome, Mr. President. My wife and I are deeply honored to be in your great country on the first state visit of your presidency.

Mr. President, I bring to you and the people of the United States of America the friendly greetings of our one billion people of India.

India and America are separated by distance, but bound together by the values of democracy, pluralism, rule of law, and respect for fundamental human freedoms. Over the years, we have built upon these values and created a partnership that is based upon both principle and pragmatism. Our relations have been transformed, and today they encompass cooperation in all areas of human activity.

Mr. President, I've come today to build upon these successes and to strengthen our multifaceted relationship. We seek to broaden and deepen our strategic partnership, and to work with the United States to meet these challenges of a fast-changing world in this 21st century.

This is a moment of great opportunity in our relationship. India and the United States can, and must, work together to harness the immense potential of our talented and enterprising people, and support each other's growth and prosperity. We should cooperate in addressing global challenges of combating terrorism, making our environment cleaner and moving towards a world free of nuclear weapons.

Mr. President, we deeply appreciate your strong personal commitment to our bilateral relationship. My wife and I are deeply grateful to you and the First Lady for receiving us during this Thanksgiving week.

With these words, I once again thank you, Mr. President. God bless America. God bless India.

622. Joint Press Conference of US President Barack Obama and Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh.

Washington (D. C), November 24, 2009.

US President Barack Obama: Please be seated. Hello, everybody. Namaste. I am very pleased to welcome Prime Minister Singh to the White House on this, the first official visit of my presidency. As I said earlier, this reflects our admiration for the Prime Minister's leadership, the deep bonds between the peoples of the United States and India, and the historic opportunity we have to strengthen and broaden the partnership between our nations.

India today is a rising and responsible global power. In Asia, Indian leadership is expanding prosperity and the security across the region. And the United States welcomes and encourages India's leadership role in helping to shape the rise of a stable, peaceful, and prosperous Asia.

Beyond Asia, as the world's largest multiethnic democracy, as one of the world's fastest-growing economies, and as a member of the G20, India will play a pivotal role in meeting the major challenges we face today. And this includes my top economic priority, creating good jobs with good wages for the American people.

So I believe that the relationship between the United States and India will be one of the defining partnerships of the 21st century, and this visit underscores the strengthening of that partnership, which I hope will continue throughout my presidency. That's why I've made it a priority to broaden the cooperation between our nations.

My administration's commitment to India can be seen in our new strategic dialogue, which addresses the full range of challenges and opportunities before us. And I'm pleased that we're joined today by the co-chairs of our dialogue -- Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Foreign Minister Krishna.

And our commitment to India can be seen in my personal partnership with Prime Minister Singh. We've worked together on economic matters at our G20 summits in London and Pittsburgh, as well as L'Aquila. I consider him a wise leader who has helped unleash India's extraordinary economic growth. He is a man of honesty and integrity. I respect him and I trust him, and I have happily accepted his gracious invitation to visit India next year.

Now, this spirit of friendship infuses our very productive discussions today and is the reason we've made so much progress in recent years. We agreed to strengthen the economic recovery and expand trade and investment so we can create jobs for both our peoples -- Americans and Indians.

Indian investment in America is creating and sustaining jobs across the United States. The United States is India's largest trading and investment partner. There is significant balance in our trading relationships that I think is very important and reflective of the framework that we put forward at the G20. And to sustain this momentum we're creating new initiatives to promote trade, investment and technology cooperation, especially among our small and medium-sized businesses that create most of the jobs here in the United States.

I reaffirmed to the Prime Minister my administration's commitment to fully implement the U.S.-India Civil Nuclear Agreement, which will increase American exports and create jobs in both jobs.

We agreed to move forward with our commitments at the G20 summit in Pittsburgh to pursue balanced growth while ensuring that emerging economies like India have a greater voice in shaping the international financial architecture.

We've made progress in confronting climate change. I commended the Prime Minister for India's leadership in areas like green buildings and energy efficiency, and we agreed to a series of important new efforts: a clean energy initiative that will create jobs and improve people's access to cleaner, more affordable energy; a green partnership to reduce poverty through sustainable and equitable development; and an historic effort to phase out subsidies for fossil fuels.

With just two weeks until the beginning of Copenhagen, it's also essential that all countries do what is necessary to reach a strong operational agreement that will confront the threat of climate change while serving as a stepping-stone to a legally binding treaty.

And to that end, Prime Minister Singh and I made important progress today. We reaffirmed that an agreement in Copenhagen should be comprehensive and cover all the issues under negotiation. We resolved to take significant national mitigation actions that will strengthen the world's ability to combat climate change. We agreed to stand by these commitments with full transparency through appropriate processes as to their implementation. All this builds on the progress that we made in Beijing, and it takes us one step closer to a successful outcome in Copenhagen.

We also agreed to deepen our cooperation against transnational threats. The American people join our Indian friends in remembering the horrific attacks in Mumbai one year ago this week. To prevent future attacks, we agreed that our law enforcement and intelligence agencies will work even closer, including sharing more information. We discussed my review of our policy in Afghanistan, and I thanked Prime Minister Singh for India's substantial contributions to the Afghan people.

I welcomed the Prime Minister's support for the non-proliferation agenda that I laid out in Prague, and I look forward to India's participation in our nuclear summit -- nuclear security summit next year, as well as India's participation as a full partner in our shared vision of a world without nuclear weapons.

Now, part of that vision is working together to ensure that all nations, including Iran and South -- North Korea, live up to their international obligations. We agreed to expand the educational exchanges that will fuel our knowledge-based economies. We're dramatically expanding the Fulbright-Nehru program that brings so many of our students and scholars together, especially in science and technology. And we are increasing ties and exchanges between our universities and community colleges as part of a new Obama-Singh -- or Singh-Obama --(laughter) -- 21st Century Knowledge Initiative. We think it's appropriately named.

To advance our historic food security initiative, American and Indian researchers will collaborate to improve agricultural output and reduce hunger -- not only in India, where enormous strides have been made, but around the world -- and India has much to teach the developing world in terms of achieving food sufficiency.

And our Centers for Disease Control and Prevention will partner with their Indian counterparts to create a new disease detection center in India to combat infectious diseases and promote global health.

This is the concrete progress made today across a whole range of issues to create jobs, opportunity and security for our people. As a result, I believe the relationship between our two countries has never been stronger -- a reminder that it will be one of the defining partnerships of the 21st century.

We look forward to celebrating our partnership tonight, as Michelle and I host the Prime Minister and Mrs. Kaur at the first state dinner of my presidency. It will be another opportunity to convey to the Prime Minister and the people of India, as India assumes its rightful place as a global leader in this century, that you will have no better friend and partner than the United States of America.

Mr. Prime Minister, thank you so much for your presence here today. The floor is yours.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh: Mr. President, distinguished ladies and gentlemen of the media. I thank from the core of my heart President Obama for his very generous hospitality and for his very warm sentiments towards India -- and to me, in particular. I am honored to be here today in this great country at the invitation of His Excellency, the President.

When India and the United States meet, it is a moment to celebrate the values of democracy, pluralism, liberty, and freedom. Today we have done that and much more.

In our discussions today, we reaffirmed the importance of our relationship and decided on future steps to enhance our strategic partnership. We have agreed to further intensify our trade, investment, and economic cooperation in a way that creates jobs and prosperity in both our two countries and stimulates global economic recovery.

We admire the leadership that President Obama has provided to stimulate and guide the G20 process that is now fully in place. We have decided to give a fresh impetus to collaboration in the fields of education, agriculture, and health. We will deepen our ongoing cooperation in frontier areas of science and technology, nuclear power, and space. This will open new opportunities for our universities and laboratories, and create human capital to meet the global needs of the future.

We had a very constructive exchange of views on strategic issues. Our defense cooperation is progressing well. We agreed on the early and full implementation of our Civil Nuclear Cooperation Agreement. Our strategic partnership should facilitate transfer of high technologies to India. The lifting of U.S. export controls on high technology exports to India will open vast opportunities for giant research and development efforts. It will enable U.S. industry to benefit from the rapid economic and technological transformation that is now underway in our country.

In a few weeks from now, the meeting of the conference of parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change will take place in Copenhagen. Both President Obama and I have agreed on the need for a substantive and comprehensive outcome, which would cover mitigation, adaptation, finance, and technology. We reaffirmed our intention to work to this end bilaterally and with all other countries.

We welcome the President's commitment to a major program for promotion of renewable energy, and I drew his attention to India's own ambitious national action plan on climate change, which has eight national missions covering both mitigation and adaptation.

Just as we partnered each other in the shaping of the knowledge economy, we have the opportunity today to become partners in developing the green economy of the future. I underlined India's desire to benefit from clean and energy-efficient technologies from the United States. Our partnership will contribute to global efforts to combat climate change and achieve energy security.

We had a detailed discussion on important regional and global issues. We agreed that the Indo-U.S. partnership was important for addressing the challenges of an increasingly interdependent world that we live in. The global economic crisis has brought home the fact that our prosperity is interlinked.

Our dialogue covered the need to have an open and inclusive architecture in the Asia Pacific regions. It is important for the international community to sustain its engagement in Afghanistan, to help its emergence as a modern state.

The focus -- the forces of terrorism in our region pose a grave threat to the entire civilized world and have to be defeated. President Obama and I have decided to strengthen our cooperation in the area of counterterrorism.

India welcomes the renewed international interest in nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation. We have been a consistent advocate of a world free of nuclear weapons. We will work with the United States and other countries for the success of the nuclear security summit, which President Obama is hosting next April.

In our discussions today, there was a meeting of minds on the future direction of our relations. I was deeply impressed by President Obama's strong commitment to the India-U.S. strategic partnership and by the breadth of his vision for global peace and prosperity.

I have invited President Obama to visit India. A very warm welcome awaits him, his gracious wife and his two daughters.

I thank you.

PRESIDENT OBAMA: Thank you very much.

We're going to take one question each, one from an American journalist and one from an Indian journalist. And I'm going to call on Mark Knoller. Where's Mark? There you are. Good to see you, Mark.

Q Good to see you, sir. Mr. President, I suspect you don't want my colleagues and I to rely on leaks until next week, so I'd like to ask you about --

PRESIDENT OBAMA: Why stop now? (Laughter.)

Q Well, perhaps you'd like to help us set a new stage in our relationship by telling us where you stand on your decision on Afghanistan. You had your -- what we were told was your final meeting last evening. Can you tell us how many more troops you'll be sending to Afghanistan, how you'll be paying for them, and whether you'll be announcing a timetable and/or exit strategy for them?

PRESIDENT OBAMA: Mark, I will be making an announcement to the American people about how we intend to move forward. I will be doing so shortly.

I think that the review that we've gone through has been comprehensive and extremely useful, and has brought together my key military advisors, but also civilian advisors. I can tell you, as I've said before, that it is in our strategic interest, in our national security interest to make sure that al Qaeda and its extremist allies cannot operate effectively in those areas. We are going to dismantle and degrade their capabilities and ultimately dismantle and destroy their networks. And Afghanistan's stability is important to that process.

I've also indicated that after eight years -- some of those years in which we did not have, I think, either the resources or the strategy to get the job done -- it is my intention to finish the job. And I feel very confident that when the American people hear a clear rationale for what we're doing there and how we intend to achieve our goals that they will be supportive.

Now, I think it's worth mentioning since I'm with the Prime Minister of India that this important not just to the United States, but it's important to the world, and that the whole world I think has a core security interest in making sure that the kind of extremism and violence that you've seen emanating from this region is tackled, confronted in a serious way.

Now, we have to do it as part of a broader international community. And so one of the things I'm going to be discussing is the obligations of our international partners in this process. It's going to be very important to recognize that the Afghan people ultimately are going to have to provide for their own security. And so we'll be discussing that process whereby Afghan security forces are properly trained and equipped to do the job. And it's going to be important to recognize that in order for us to succeed there you've got to have a comprehensive strategy that includes civilian and diplomatic efforts.

So I think that's a sufficient preview to last until after Thanksgiving, Mark.

Q Tuesday night, sir?

PRESIDENT OBAMA: After Thanksgiving. (Laughter.) And I'm sure that at that point, if there are further questions, that we'll be answering them to the satisfaction not just of you, but to the satisfaction of the American people.

PRIME MINISTER SINGH: Ms. Smita Prakash.

Q My question to you: Would you call India and the U.S. as natural allies, especially in the sphere of combating the terrorism in our region? Because there is a perception in India that the military aid that you give Pakistan is misused against India, and it is really the epicenter of terrorism. Did this issue come up in your discussions with the Prime Minister, and would you be pressurizing Pakistan to get its act in order? And to the Prime Minister, I'd like to ask when is the nuclear deal really going to go on the road?

PRESIDENT OBAMA: Well, first of all, I think that the United States and India are natural allies not just around counterterrorism issues, but on a whole host of issues. As we discussed earlier, we're the world's two largest democracies. We have a range of shared values and ideals. We're both entrepreneurial societies. We're both multiethnic societies. We are societies that believe in human rights and core freedoms that are enshrined in our founding documents.

And one of the things that I think makes us such strong allies is the people-to-people contact. It's one thing for leaders to have exchanges like this one, and that's very important, obviously. But the incredible contributions that Indian Americans have made to the growth of our country and the degree to which they are woven into the very fabric of our society, the fact that very few Indians don't have some family member somewhere who has a connection to the United States -- that kind of exchange strengthens and deepens the bonds between our two countries in a profound way.

Now, with respect to security issues in the region, the Prime Minister and I -- Prime Minister Singh and I had extensive discussions about that. I think we both recognize that our core goal is to achieve peace and security for all peoples in the region, not just one country or the other. And one of the things I admire most about Prime Minister Singh is that I think at his core he is a man of peace.

Obviously there are historic conflicts between India and Pakistan. It is not the place of the United States to try to, from the outside, resolve all those conflicts. On the other hand, we want to be encouraging of ways in which both India and Pakistan can feel secure, and focus on the development of their own countries and their own people.

With respect to the relationship between the United States and Pakistan's military, I think that there have probably been times in the past in which we were so single-mindedly focused just on military assistance in Pakistan that we didn't think more broadly about how to encourage and develop the kinds of civil society in Pakistan that would make a difference in the lives of people day to day.

And Secretary Clinton, I think, has done an excellent job in trying to move forward -- where is she? I thought she was around here somewhere -- but anyway, she's done an excellent job, I think, in helping our State Department to refocus our energies on that front as well.

And obviously Pakistan has an enormously important role in the security of the region by making sure that the extremist organizations that often operate out of its territories are dealt with effectively. And we've seen some progress. The work that the Pakistan military is doing in the Swat Valley in west -- in south Waziristan all indicates the degree to which they are beginning to recognize that extremism, even if initially directed to the outside, can ultimately also have an adverse impact on their security internally.

So my hope is, is that over time what we're going to see is further clarity and further cooperation between all the parties and all peoples of goodwill in the region to eradicate terrorist activity, to eradicate the kind of violent extremism that we've seen. I think that will benefit the peoples of Pakistan and India and the world community as well.

PRIME MINISTER SINGH: The President and myself had a very useful and productive exchange of views relating to security, peace, and counterterrorism in our regions. I'm very satisfied with the outcome of my discussion with President Obama.

As far as the nuclear deal is concerned, the President has reaffirmed that it is the common resolve of our two governments to operationalize the nuclear deal as early as possible. There are a few "i's" and "t's" which have to be crossed -- and I am confident and I have the assurance of the President that that process can be completed without much further loss of time.

PRESIDENT OBAMA: Thank you very much, everybody.

623. Press Release on the signing of the India - USA Memorandum of Understanding to "Enhance Cooperation in Energy Security, Energy Efficiency, Clean Energy and Climate Change".

Washington (D.C), November 24, 2009.

624. Joint Statement issued during the visit of Dr. Manmohan Singh to the United States.

Washington (D. C), November 24, 2009.

INDIA AND THE UNITED STATES: PARTNERSHIP FOR A BETTER WORLD

Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and President Barack Obama today reaffirmed the global strategic partnership between India and the United States, and launched a new phase in this partnership. Commending the deepening bilateral cooperation between the world's two largest democracies across a broad spectrum of human endeavors, the two leaders recognized that the common ideals and complementary strengths of India and the United States today provide a foundation for addressing the global challenges of the 21st century.

The two leaders noted that the shared values cherished by their peoples and espoused by their founders - democracy, pluralism, tolerance, openness, and respect for fundamental freedoms and human rights - are acquiring an increasingly greater prominence in building a more peaceful, prosperous, inclusive, secure and sustainable world. These values are exemplified by the vibrant linkages between their peoples, which are a unique asset for both countries, and are reflected in the role played by the Indian-American community.

The two leaders resolved to harness these shared strengths and to expand the U.S.-India global partnership for the benefit of their countries, for peace, stability and prosperity in Asia, and for the betterment of the world. To this end, they committed to build upon the India-U.S. Strategic Dialogue announced in July 2009. President Obama stated that the United States looks forward to a stable and prosperous India playing an increasingly important role in world affairs.

ADVANCING GLOBAL SECURITY AND COUNTERING TERRORISM

Prime Minister Singh and President Obama recognized that the India-U.S. partnership is indispensable for global peace and security. In this context, the interests of both countries are best advanced through the values mirrored in their societies.

They acknowledged the common threat that international terrorism poses to regional and global security. They condemned terrorism in all its forms and manifestations and declared that there could be no justification for terrorism anywhere.

On the eve of its first anniversary, President Obama reiterated the United States's condemnation of the terrorist attack in Mumbai in November 2008. The two leaders underscored the absolute imperative to bring to justice the perpetrators of this terrorist attack.

They expressed their grave concern about the threat posed by terrorism and violent extremists emanating from India's neighborhood, whose impact is felt beyond the region. The two leaders agreed that resolute and credible steps must be taken to eliminate safe havens and sanctuaries that provide shelter to terrorists and their activities. These undermine security and stability in the region and around the world.

They vowed to redouble their efforts to deal effectively with terrorism, while protecting their countries' common ideals and shared values and committed themselves to strengthening global consensus and legal regimes against terrorism. They decided on a Counterterrorism Cooperation Initiative to expand collaboration on counterterrorism, information sharing, and capacity building.

The two leaders reiterated their shared interest in the stability, development and independence of Afghanistan and in the defeat of terrorist safe havens in Pakistan and Afghanistan. President Obama appreciated India's role in reconstruction and rebuilding efforts in Afghanistan. The two leaders agreed to enhance their respective efforts in this direction.

The two leaders committed to continue pursuing mutually beneficial defense cooperation through the existing security dialogue, service-level exchanges, defense exercises and trade and technology transfer and collaboration. They recognized the scope for cooperation in the areas of non-traditional threats to security, peacekeeping, humanitarian and disaster relief, and maritime security and protecting sea lanes of communication. They agreed to expedite necessary arrangements to facilitate these activities.

The two leaders agreed that strengthening high technology trade between their countries is in the spirit of their strategic dialogue and partnership. They reiterated their shared commitment to technology security and that it is in their mutual interest to invigorate this area of their partnership.

Prime Minister Singh and President Obama reaffirmed their shared vision of a world free of nuclear weapons and pledged to work together, as leaders of responsible states with advanced nuclear technology, for global non-proliferation, and universal, non-discriminatory and complete nuclear disarmament. Part of that vision is working together to ensure that all nations live up to their international obligations. India reaffirmed its unilateral and voluntary moratorium on nuclear explosive testing. The United States reaffirmed its testing moratorium and its commitment to ratify the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and bring it into force at an early date. Both leaders agreed to consult each other regularly and seek the early start of negotiations on a multilateral, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable Fissile Material Cutoff Treaty at the Conference on Disarmament. They noted that nuclear terrorism, and clandestine networks are a matter of grave concern. Prime Minister Singh and President Obama look forward to the April 2010 Nuclear Security Summit and working together with all participating states for the success of the Summit.

ENSURING SUSTAINABLE GLOBAL DEVELOPMENT AND A CLEAN ENERGY FUTURE

Recognizing that energy security, food security, climate change are interlinked, and that eliminating poverty and ensuring sustainable development and a clean energy future are among the foremost global objectives, the two leaders agreed to enter into a Green Partnership to address these global challenges.

They two Leaders reaffirmed their intention to promote the full, effective and sustained implementation of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) in accordance with the Bali Action Plan. Recognizing their special role in promoting a successful and substantive outcome at the UNFCCC 15th Conference of Parties at Copenhagen in December, 2009, they reaffirmed their intention to work together bilaterally and with all other countries for an agreed outcome at that meeting.

The two leaders also affirmed that the Copenhagen outcome must be comprehensive and cover mitigation, adaptation, finance and technology, and in accordance with the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities, it should reflect emission reduction targets of developed countries and nationally appropriate mitigation actions of developing countries. There should be full transparency through appropriate processes as to the implementation of aforesaid mitigation actions. The outcome should further reflect the need for substantially scaled-up financial resources to support mitigation and adaptation in developing countries, in particular, for the poorest and most vulnerable. It should also include measures for promoting technology development, dissemination and transfer and capacity building, including consideration of a center or a network of centers to support and stimulate climate innovation. India and the United States, consistent with their national circumstances, resolved to take significant national mitigation actions that will strengthen the world's ability to combat climate change. They resolved to stand by these commitments.

Recognizing the need to create the clean energy economy of the 21st century, Prime Minister Singh and President Obama agreed to launch a Clean Energy and Climate Change Initiative. The goal of the Initiative would be to improve the lives of the people of both countries by developing and improving access to technologies that make our energy cleaner, affordable and more efficient. The Initiative will include cooperation in wind and solar energy, second generation bio-fuels, unconventional gas, energy efficiency, and clean coal technologies including carbon capture and storage. The success of this Initiative is expected to enhance the ability of India and the United States to provide new economic opportunities for their people and create new clean energy jobs.

The two leaders intend to take practical steps to promote global food security, including by advancing the L'Aquila Food Security Initiative. They looked forward to increasing India-U.S. agricultural cooperation with the purpose of promoting agricultural research, human resources capacity building, natural resource management, agri-business and food processing, and collaborative research for increasing food productivity. This cooperation would contribute to joint development of technology that would improve weather forecasting, including predicting monsoons, and technology that would contribute to food productivity and food security efforts in India.

They agreed to collaborate in the application of their space technology and related scientific capabilities in outer space and for development purposes, including in the field of agriculture.

The two leaders reiterated their intention to realize the full potential of the India-U.S. Agreement for Cooperation concerning the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy through the implementation of its provisions. They agreed to expedite U.S. firms' participation in the implementation of this agreement.

STIMULATING GLOBAL ECONOMIC REVIVAL

626. FACT SHEET: Advancing Global Security and Countering Terrorism.

Washington (D. C), November 24, 2009.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and President Barack Obama renewed their commitment to expand cooperation on strategic issues facing both countries and the world. They acknowledged the common threat that international terrorism poses to their homelands and to regional and global security. The numerous bilateral dialogues conducted over the last several months, the two leaders' discussions today, and the continuing actions that both countries will be taking as a result of these comprehensive meetings reflect the extensive and growing strategic partnership between the United States and India.

- In their meeting today, Prime Minister Singh and President Obama noted that the U.S.-India counterterrorism relationship has advanced in a short time to unprecedented levels of cooperation. As part of the Counterterrorism Cooperation Initiative, they committed to redouble their collective efforts to deal effectively with terrorism, while protecting their countries' common ideals and shared values, and committed themselves to strengthening global consensus and legal regimes against terrorism.
- India reaffirmed its unilateral and voluntary moratorium on nuclear explosive testing. The United States reaffirmed its testing moratorium and its commitment to ratify the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and bring it into force at an early date. The two leaders agreed to consult each other regularly, as well as seek the early start of negotiations on a multilateral, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable Fissile Material Cutoff Treaty. Prime Minister Singh and President Obama looked forward to the April 2010 Nuclear Security Summit and will work together on nuclear security to ensure its success. They affirmed their commitment to work together to prevent the spread of Weapons of Mass Destruction- and missile-related technology and to realize their shared vision of a world free of nuclear weapons.
- The two leaders also discussed shared interests in enhanced regional security and stability, particularly in the context of Afghanistan and Pakistan. Both the United States and India have made significant investments in development assistance to the Afghan people since late 2001, and President Obama and Prime Minister Singh agreed on the importance of close coordination among the international donor community in order to maximize the impact of assistance. As Prime Minister Singh had visited Southeast Asia in October and President Obama recently returned from a trip to East and Southeast Asia, the two leaders shared impressions of the Asia-Pacific region that represents an increasingly large share of global economic growth.

- The U.S.-India bilateral defense relationship has been on an accelerated upward trajectory in recent years. The United States is India's largest bilateral military exercise partner, and the two countries just concluded the largest-ever bilateral exercise, "Yudh Abhyas," with the Indian Army. As India modernizes its military, President Obama hopes that U.S. equipment and technology will continue to be a part of that modernization. The recent conclusion of End-Use Monitoring language provided important momentum to enhance Indian military modernization programs. During the Defense Policy Group meetings held in New Delhi three weeks ago, the two countries committed to pursue mutually beneficial defense cooperation, including collaborating on humanitarian, maritime security and intelligence sharing efforts.
- Noting that global security encompasses a wide range of common interests, the two leaders also affirmed their nations' commitment to work together on global challenges, as illustrated in the Global Issues Forum, held in New Delhi on November 5. The Global Issues Forum focused on how the world's two largest democracies can form a truly global partnership by working together to meet transnational challenges through regional, international and multilateral cooperation. In the Forum, the two governments addressed concrete ways to strengthen Indian and U.S. cooperation in improving global health, food security, access to shelter and education, water management, support for the rule of law and human rights, environmental conservation and disaster management.

627. Fact Sheet: India-US Civil Aviation Cooperation*Washington (D. C), November 24, 2009.

The Civil aviation sector is the fastest growing area of Indo-US economic and high technology engagement. The Open Skies agreement of 2005 was the starting point of the beginning of a strong Indo-US partnership in the civil aviation sector. Leading US companies such as Boeing, Raytheon and Lockheed Martin have established presence in India with a longer term objective. US civil aviation exports to India in 2008 were US$ 2.6 billion; almost 60% of the total Indian high technology imports from the US during the year. Aircraft and aerospace products have emerged as the fastest growing component of US exports to India.

The Government of India and the Indian Industry seek technical, human resource, high technology and commercial support from the USA in its efforts to modernize the civil aviation Industry in India and to meet the challenges of its rapid expansion in terms of safety, customer demand, technology and communication support and air space management. Following the Open Skies Agreement between the countries in 2005, there has been a steady increase of air traffic between the two countries stimulating economic partnership and strengthening people to people contacts.

Trends in the Indian Civil Aviation sector:

The sector grew by 27 % in 2006-7 and is expected to continue to grow in the coming years.

Domestic passenger traffic is slated to reach 180 mn and international traffic to 50 mn by 2020. During May 2007-May 2008, domestic passenger traffic stood at 25 mn and international traffic at 22.5 mn.

In 2008, airlines carried around 2.12 billion passengers. The international passenger traffic in terms of passenger-kilometers constitute two third of the total passenger traffic. The international cargo accounts for more than 80% of the total traffic.

International traffic has been growing at a 10% growth per annum.

Indian civilian aircraft market is valued at USD 90 billion involving sale of 1000 aircraft during the period 2008-20. At present the sector has around 400 fleet with almost the same number on order as well. However, it is a fact that the current downturn has seen many deliveries being deferred, but significantly not cancelled.

Bilateral mechanisms

- Open Skies Agreement was signed in April 2005. The conclusion of this Agreement has boosted trade, tourism and business. Connectivity between the two countries has increased significantly with six new daily direct flights which have commenced since the signing of the Open Skies Agreement, another new daily flight (Jet Airways) is via Brussels. Air India began a new direct non-stop flight from New York to Delhi in February 2008. Another Air India flight flies non stop from New York to Mumbai . Air India plans to link Washington DC and New Delhi with effect from December 1, 2009 via New York.
- A Memorandum of Agreement ('Umbrella Agreement') between the Federal Aviation Authority (FAA) of USA and the Government of India was signed on 13th November, 2006 in New Delhi. The agreement provides for assistance by FAA to the Civil Aviation sector in India in developing and modernizing the civil aviation infrastructure in the managerial, operational and technical areas. This assistance is coordinated by the Joint Aviation Steering Committee.
- India-US Aviation Cooperation Programme The India-US civil aviation cooperation is being supported by the US-India Aviation Cooperation Programme (ACP) set up in 2007, which is a public-private partnership between the US Trade Development Agency (USTDA), the US Federal Aviation Administration (FAA), US aviation companies and the Indian Ministry of Civil Aviation. This programme is designed to provide a forum for communication between the Governments of India and the USA and public and private sector entities in both countries. Projects on capacity building - Technical Training for Aerospace Industry, Air Traffic Flow Management, Aircraft Pilot Capacity Assessment, Aircraft maintenance Engineer Capacity study, Air Traffic Control Office and communication, navigation and surveillance Engineer capacity assessment are being undertaken as part of the ACP. Experts from the Ministry of Civil Aviation, DGCA and Airports Authority of India among others have been undergoing training in the US in the field of aerospace management, best practices, safety issues and technical expertise.
- Indo-US Joint Steering Committee (JASC): To carry forward the mandate of the ACP, an India-US Steering Committee has been set up under which Working Groups on Air Worthiness, Flight Standards, Airports and Environment have been formed. The second Meeting of the India-US Aviation Steering Committee was held on 14 October 2008. The third meeting has been planned to take place during the 2nd Indo-US Aviation summit in Washington.

Bilateral Aviation Safety Agreement: India has drawn out an action plan to fulfill the requirements for the signing of a Bilateral Aviation Safety Agreement (BASA) with the USA in 2010. After the signing of BASA, DGCA certified products can be sold in the USA and perhaps in other parts of the world. The certification of DGCA would be treated at par with the certification of the Federal Aviation Authority (FAA), USA. The first shadow certification is underway to certify a life raft designing by BF Goodrich. The Agreement would encourage US Aviation Companies to invest in India.

AVIATION 2008: USA was the partner country at the first biennial civil aviation show - India Aviation 2008 held in Hyderabad during 15-18 Oct 2008. A large US delegation including 20 US aviation companies- Boeing, Raytheon, Cessna, Beechcraft etc- participated in the show exhibiting products and services in varied sectors of the aviation industry.

Public-private partnership: Realising the growth potential of the civil aviation sector in India and the need for skilled manpower to support the growth of the aerospace Industry in the country, Boeing has established partnerships with IIT Mumbai, IISC Bangalore, IIT Kanpur, IIT Kharagpur and IIT Chennai to promote Aerospace Engineering as a discipline. It has tie-ups with leading India research institutions - IISC Bangalore (one among the only eight - Strategic Boeing Universities in the world), IIT Kanpur, National Aerospace laboratories and HAL Aircraft Design and Research Centre. Areas of R&D collaboration include Materials and Processes, Software and Analysis.

India-US Aviation Summit 2009: The second India US Aviation Summit will be held in Washington from 7 - 9 December 2009.

- We have also agreed to expand the Fulbright-Nehru program to provide more student and scholar exchange grants in priority fields such as science, technology and agriculture.
- Health: We have agreed to further collaboration in health. We hope to establish a Regional Global Disease Detection Center in India and to build a partnership with the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.
- The discussions also focused on the on-going cooperation in the field of defence. Both sides attach importance to the development of stronger defence relationship. In the last few years our cooperation has increased tremendously. We intend to carry these forward through service-level exchanges, defense exercises and trade and technology transfer and collaboration. We also hope to strengthen cooperation in meeting global challenges such as maritime security and keeping open the sea lanes of communication.
- High Technology trade is an important part of the bilateral relationship. We have agreed that this needs to be strengthened and invigorated keeping in view our transformed relationship and strategic partnership.

- Civil nuclear cooperation: President Obama and PM reiterated their commitment to expeditiously complete the remaining steps including the arrangements and procedures for reprocessing.
- Disarmament and non-proliferation: President Obama conveyed that India and the US as two nuclear powers can work together towards the ultimate objective of a world free of nuclear weapons.
- Discussions on Regional issues: President Obama agreed with PM that terrorism and extremism emanating from our neighborhood posed a serious threat not just to India but also to the US and the entire civilized world. They agreed that resolute and credible steps must be taken to eliminate safe havens and sanctuaries that provide shelter to terrorists and their activities.
- They also had discussions on the situation in Afghanistan. President Obama briefed PM about the on-going review that he was undertaking on their strategy. Both PM and President Obama stressed on the need to have stability and development in Afghanistan and to defeat terrorist activities there. President Obama appreciated India's role in reconstruction and rebuilding efforts in Afghanistan.

Climate Change and Energy

1. Two important outcomes: establishing a Green Partnership which would address inter-related challenges of energy security, climate change and food security.

Clean Energy and Climate Change Initiative which specifically focuses on Collaborative ventures in clean technologies, energy efficiency and renewable energy, including solar, wind and bio-mass.

2. An important aspect of the above Initiative is agreement to jointly develop technology to improve weather forecasting, in particular, monsoon prediction.

3. On Copenhagen process, the two leaders reaffirmed their commitment to the UNFCCC and the Bali Action Plan as basis for deliberations at Copenhagen. This is an important political statement. For India these two documents represent indispensable basis for our negotiations.

There is also clear commitment to a comprehensive and substantive outcome at Copenhagen and this is also in line with India's own expectations.

Statement recognizes the key principle of common and differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities enshrined in the UNFCCC. In accordance with that principle, the Joint Statement commits developed countries such as the U.S. to take on economy wide emission reduction targets, while developing countries should take mitigation actions which are specific in nature such as India's renewal energy plan or its afforestation target. We have always said that as an open and democratic society India's National Action Plan on Climate Change will be implemented in a transparent manner, with domestic scrutiny including in Parliament. For mitigation actions that are supported by finance, technology and capacity building there can be international scrutiny of both actions and support. For unsupported actions we are willing to reflect these to the UNFCCC through National Communications. These are the "processes" referred to in the Statement in terms of ensuring transparency.

4. There is recognition in the Joint Statement of the need for substantially scaled up financial resources to support climate change action in developing countries. India has been repeatedly emphasising this as one of the key determinants of success at Copenhagen. We are also happy that India's proposal for the setting up of a network of climate innovation centres has also found reflection in the Statement.

5. In the Statement India has readily reflected its willingness to take voluntary mitigation actions which could contribute to the global efforts on meeting the challenge of Climate Change.

6. We are therefore satisfied with the statement on Climate Change which represents an increased degree of congruence in the way India and the U.S. approach the challenge of Climate Change. The PM's visit has also laid the foundation for a significant and focussed collaborative effort both on clean energy and climate change.

633. Press Conference of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the conclusion of his visit to Washington.

Washington (D. C), November 25, 2009.

Official Spokesperson: Good morning and welcome to the Press conference by Prime Minister of India Dr. Manmohan Singh. He is joined by Dr. M S Ahluwalia, Deputy Chairman of Planning Commission and Mr. M K Narayanan, National Security Advisor. After his opening remarks Prime Minister would be happy to take a few questions. Sir may I invite you to make your opening statement?

Prime Minister: Before I begin my remarks I wish to say a few words on the eve of the first anniversary of the terrorist attack in Mumbai last year on November 26th.

This is a day of remembrance and of paying homage to all the innocent civilians and our brave men in uniform who lost their lives in one of the worst terrorist attacks our country has ever seen. On behalf the nation, I would like to send a message to each and every one of their families that we share their grief with a very heavy heart. We will never forget the suffering they have gone through. Our thoughts are with them as they pray for the souls of their loved ones.

The attack in Mumbai was a calculated attempt by forces outside the country to destabilize our secular polity, create communal discord and undermine the country's economic and social progress. Such forces should have no doubt that they will fail in their attempts. The supreme sacrifice that so many of our countrymen and women and those from foreign lands made last November will not go in vain.

India's commitment to an open, democratic and secular society will not be shaken by such assaults on our way of life.

The Government will not rest till we have brought the perpetrators of this crime to justice. This is our solemn duty. We have taken up the matter with all the force at our command with the Government of Pakistan. We expect the masterminds of the attack and their supporters to be tried and punished. The infrastructure of terrorism and all safe havens have to be dismantled.

Within the country we have taken several measures to strengthen our security and intelligence system. An effective response mechanism to deter such threats in future has been put in place. We will take more such steps till we are satisfied that we have foolproof arrangements in place. I wish to reassure the nation that strengthening internal security is the top priority of the government, and we will leave no stone unturned to safeguard and protect the lives of our citizens.

Ladies and gentlemen,

I have completed a very productive visit to the United States. Based on my discussions with President Obama and other American leaders, I am confident that we can not only continue but also strengthen the momentum of our relations built up in the last few years.

President Obama recognized the important role India-US relations can play in meeting the global challenges of the 21st century. We agreed that there is a historic opportunity for India and the United States to work together for world peace and stability on the basis of our shared values, consensus and cooperation.

We discussed several ideas on how we can work together to accelerate global economic recovery and put it on a more sustainable and balanced path in the future.

We welcome President Obama's strong commitment to ensuring a comprehensive and balanced outcome at the climate change meeting in Copenhagen. We have agreed to work together bilaterally and with all other countries to ensure this outcome.

We have established a framework for taking our relations forward. The Joint Statement that has been issued reflects our priorities for future collaboration in agriculture, education, health, clean energy and energy security, defence, science and technology.

We agreed on the early and full implementation of our civil nuclear cooperation agreement. This paves the way for transfers of high technology items to India.

I had a very good interaction with American business leaders. They showed keenness to expand business with India. I reaffirmed to them the commitment of the government to facilitate foreign investment in India and to pursue key reform measures. President Obama and I met the members of the India-US CEOs Forum and urged them to assist the governments in building a vibrant trade and economic partnership.

President Obama was very conscious and aware of the threats both our countries face from terrorism, and the need for us to work together to combat it. We have agreed to strengthen cooperation in the area of counter-terrorism. He told me that the United States highly values India's role in the reconstruction and development of Afghanistan. We had similar views on establishing peace and prosperity in the Asia-Pacific.

I also met the Speaker of the US House of Representatives Nancy Pelosi, who is a good friend of India, and a number of leading members of the House and the Senate. In all these meetings, as well as those with the business community and strategic experts, I found a fund of goodwill for India. There is great warmth, respect and admiration for India, matched by a genuine desire to work with India to strengthen our strategic partnership.

Later today I will be meeting members of the Indian community in America. They have played a magnificent role in bringing our two countries together. We are proud of their achievements and would like to see them prosper and excel further. Their contribution to American society and economy was something which all leaders referred to in my meetings with them.

I am most grateful to President Obama and First Lady Mrs. Michelle Obama for the warmth of their hospitality and for honouring me and my wife as their first State visitors. President Obama has accepted my invitation to visit India, and we look forward to receiving him and his family in India in 2010.

I would also like to make a special mention of the friendship which both Vice-President Dr. Biden and Secretary Mrs. Clinton have shown to India. We deeply value their personal commitment to our relations.

I leave with a sense of confidence that my visit has deepened mutual understanding between India and the United States, and set new directions for our strategic partnership in a way that will advance our national interests.

Thank you.

Official Spokesperson: The Prime Minister will now take a few questions.

Question - On reprocessing arrangements under the Civil Nuclear Cooperation deal

Prime Minister: We had a very good discussion. At the highest level I have been assured by the United States' leadership that the Government of the United States remains committed to early implementation of Civil Nuclear Cooperation Agreement. There are some minor problems with regard to agreeing on the reprocessing dedicated facilities that is mentioned in the 123 Agreement. I think there are no insurmountable barriers, and I am confident that in the next couple of weeks we can sort out these things. As far as the civil liability legislation is concerned, the Indian Cabinet has already approved that legislation and we will be going to Parliament to enact the legislation that is required.

Question On bringing perpetrators of Mumbai terror attack to justice

Prime Minister: As far as bringing the perpetrators of Mumbai massacre to book, our position is very clear that since the conspiracy was hatched basically in Pakistan, it is the obligation of the Government of Pakistan to do everything in their power to bring the perpetrators to justice. I have not seen the report that you have mentioned but I welcome every step that leads in that direction. I have, however, said that it is our strong feeling that the Government of Pakistan could do more to bring to book people who are still roaming around in the country freely, to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism. I can only hope that there will be progress in that area.

With regard to the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference, there will of course be meetings between various delegations. We simply cannot wish away Pakistan. Whenever politicians meet we always have a tendency to discuss mutual issues. As of now nothing is planned or is on the horizon.

Question: On acquisition of nuclear weapons by Iran

Prime Minister: India enjoys good relations with both the United States and with Iran. With regard to the nuclear weapon ambitions of Iran I have stated India's position on a number of occasions, and that is well known. But in my meetings with the leaders of the US I did mention that a few days before we came to Washington the Foreign Minister of Iran was in Delhi and he called on me; that I asked him about the state of play with regard to the negotiations on the nuclear programme of Iran; that he said to me that they have been getting very good messages from the new Obama Administration; and that he was hopeful that engagement with P5 powers will succeed. If that comes about, as neighbours of Iran living in that region where five million citizens of our country work and earn their livelihood, given our dependence on energy imports from Iran, we would welcome an outcome of engagement between Iran and P5. I sincerely hope that this engagement will be productive of results.

Question: On China - currency and boundary issue with India

Prime Minister: As far as your second question is concerned, I did mention to the President that like other countries we welcome the peaceful rise of China. We ourselves are engaged with China. For the last five years we have been discussing the border problem. In the meanwhile our economic relations have grown in their intensity. China is one of our major trading partners. Therefore, we are all in favour of the rest of the world engaging China. I did mention that during recent weeks and months we have noticed a greater degree of assertiveness on the part of China, but I did not seek any help from the United States. We just reviewed the world situation. I am confident that through purposeful negotiations between our two countries we can resolve all outstanding issues.

As far as the exchange rate of the Chinese currency is concerned, we had a general discussion about reducing and correcting the global imbalances, the responsibilities of various countries. Now that the United States is engaged in an exercise to raise its domestic saving rate, the President mentioned to me that the United States cannot play in the future the same role in stimulating global growth that happened in the past. Therefore, other centres of growth stimulus have to emerge. It is in that context that we had a fairly good discussion about the evolving global economy. But there was no specific discussion of the exchange rate of any one currency.

Question: On India's relations with Pakistan

Prime Minister: Let me say categorically, India regards a strong, purposeful, peaceful Pakistan to be in our national interest. We have worked in that direction, we will continue to work in that direction. I have also said publicly in my recent interviews to the American media and Fareed Zakaria last week, that Pakistan faces no threat whatsoever from our country and that is the stated position of the Government of India. Any other statement distorted out of context should not carry the weight when I have stated categorically that Pakistan faces no threat whatsoever from our side.

Question: On Taliban

Prime Minister: Let me say that we are worried about the activities of the Taliban now covering the mainland cities and towns of Pakistan, particularly of Punjab. That is a threat to security not only of Pakistan but also a threat to security of our country.

Question: On US pressure on Pakistan to contain terrorism

Prime Minister: I have discussed this matter with the President and with the Secretary of State. I have been assured that the US influence will work in the direction that you have asked for.

Question: On India's role in Afghanistan and PM's visit to USA.

Prime Minister: I have not come across any criticism of India's role in Afghanistan. I think there is bipartisan support in the United States that our involvement in reconstruction and development of Afghanistan is a positive development. I have not received any negative vibes from anywhere in that direction. As far as the visit is concerned, the Joint Statement is before you. You can draw your own conclusions. On my part, I am very satisfied with the outcome of my meetings. I go back to India convinced that India and the United States can and will do lots of things together to strengthen our strategic partnership in economics, in trade, in climate change, in energy, in counter-terrorism and all related activities.

Question: On Liberhan report and intelligence sharing by Pakistan and USA

Prime Minister: I have to express my regrets on the Liberhan Commission's report. This should not have happened; regarding the responsibility for the same, we will have it investigated. All this happened while I was away from the country. When I go back I will discuss this matter with the Home Minister and other dignitaries.

The second question you asked is why we do not get the information from Pakistan about the terrorist actions planned against India. For this we have been making efforts and we will continue with our efforts that Pakistan should recognise its responsibility. But we welcome the support that the US authorities have given to us in strengthening our cooperation in information and intelligence gathering.

Question: On Mumbai terror attack

Prime Minister: I had said what I wanted to say in my prepared statement. The 26/11 ghastly act should not have taken place. That it did take place is a cause of deep sorrow and concern to me both as Prime Minister and also as an ordinary citizen of our country; that about 200 citizens of ours perished in this onslaught; that several nationals of various foreign countries also were victims of this ghastly act. I sincerely hope that the world's conscience will be aroused to take effective action against terrorism and associated activities in the hope that our planet can be made free of this scourge for the benefit of all people in all countries.

Question: On US support for India's permanent membership of UNSC

Prime Minister: There was a general discussion of the changes that need to be made in the global processes of governance, in the need for reform of the United Nations and the Security Council. I believe there is a reference in the Joint Statement to that effect. But there was no specific commitment, or one asked for by us, about the membership of the Security Council.

Question: On India dealing with global economic crisis

Prime Minister: One reason why the global slowdown had a somewhat limited adverse affects on our economy is the strong domestic orientation of our economy. We are not dependent on foreign trade to the same extent that some other developing countries are. That has really helped us in this time of crisis to ensure that our economy continues to grow at the rate of about 6.5 per cent per annum despite the onslaught on our export market. We have also been fortunate that our domestic savings rate is as high as 35 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product. Our investment rate in recent years has been about 37 per cent of our GDP. If we maintain a strong commitment to modernise and to expand our infrastructure, I am confident that with our emphasis on inclusive growth, of ensuring that the benefits of growth reach out to all sections of our society, particularly in the rural areas, we will be able in two years' time to go back to the growth path of eight to nine per cent once again.

Question: On possibility of repeat of 26/11 type terror attack in India

Prime Minister: I sincerely hope that the combined pressure of the world community including the United States will work to ensure that the ghastly acts of the type that took place on 26/11 do not happen once again. But I do recognise the obligation of the Government of India to protect its citizens. We will strengthen our internal security measures to the extent possible. We will do all that is necessary to ensure that there is no repetition of these ghastly acts like 26/11. I sincerely hope that the whole civilised world would back India in that direction. I have already mentioned that we greatly appreciate the cooperation that we have been receiving from the US in this regard after the events of 26/11.

Question: On US China Joint Statement

Prime Minister: It was indeed discussed, and the President assured me that the reference about South Asia in the US - China Joint Statement was not intended that a third party should interfere in the affairs of South Asia. I am very satisfied with what President has told me about that matter.

Official Spokesperson: The press interaction now draws to a close. Thank you for your presence.

635. Press Release issued by the Prime Minister's Office on the telephonic call by the US President Barack Obama on Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh.

New Delhi, December 1, 2009.

U.S. President Barack Obama called the Prime Minister this morning. In a brief conversation, the two leaders discussed the situation in Afghanistan and the further steps that could be taken to bring peace and stability in the country. The two leaders also discussed the forthcoming summit on Climate Change in Copenhagen. The Prime Minister told the President that India would play a constructive role in the negotiations and looked forward to a successful outcome*.

* Media reports said that only last week, Dr. Singh had disfavoured troop withdrawal and stressed the importance of continued engagement in Afghanistan by major regional and international actors. On climate change, Dr. Singh told Mr. Obama that India was willing to be part of a solution and it expected a successful outcome in Copenhagen. The reports said while hoping for a helpful international regime, Dr. Singh told the President that India, at this stage, was not in favour of binding emission cut targets and had started taking unilateral measures without waiting for international consensus.

636. Response of the Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs on President Obama's Speech on Af-Pak Policy.

New Delhi, December 3, 2009.

"We have noted US President Obama's speech at West Point on December 1, 2009* and the announcement that 30,000 additional US troops would be deployed in Afghanistan in the first part of 2010. We welcome the emphasis in the US strategy on the strengthening of the Government of Afghanistan and Afghan security forces. We also welcome President Obama's reiteration of the need to squarely tackle terrorism, and for Pakistan to ensure that terrorists do not enjoy safe havens on its territory. India believes that it is in the interest of the international community to impress upon Pakistan that it must use all its influence and resources to implement its commitments to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism and to deny sanctuary to all terrorist groups who operate from its soil.

In our view, it is essential that the international community shows unwavering commitment in resolutely opposing, resisting and overcoming terrorism and those who nurture, sustain and give sanctuary to terrorists and extremist elements. It is also imperative that the international community shows sustained and long-term commitment to assisting the Government and people of Afghanistan.

India for its part has attempted to help Afghanistan in its reconstruction efforts as a means to bringing about stability in that country. Our assistance, now over US$ 1.3 billion, is spread across Afghanistan and spans almost the entire gamut of economic and social developmental activities. Despite daunting logistical and security challenges, two major GOI-funded infrastructure projects have been completed - construction of the 218 km road from Zaranj to Delaram in Nimroz province and the construction of the 220 KV Transmission Line from Pul-e-Khumri to Kabul together with the sub-station at Chimtala. Construction of Afghanistan's new Parliament building, a symbol of the common commitment of both countries to pluralism and democracy, is also progressing. India reiterates its determination to fulfil its commitment to the Afghan people and Government as they build a peaceful, democratic and pluralistic Afghanistan."

* On December 1 President Obama had unveiled a new fast-track war strategy in Afghanistan pledging additional 30, 000 more troops and for the first time stating that U.S. forces would start coming home in 19 months. "The people and governments of both Afghanistan and Pakistan were endangered", he said. "The stakes are even higher within a nuclear-armed Pakistan, because we know that the Al-Qaeda and other extremists seek nuclear weapons, and we have every reason to believe that they would use them," Mr. Obama said.

A statement released by Pakistan's Foreign Ministry in Islamabad urged Mr. Obama to work closely with Islamabad to ensure that his new Afghan war strategy did not harm Pakistan. "We welcome President Obama's reaffirmation of partnership between the two countries built on a foundation of mutual interest, mutual respect and mutual trust," it said.

637. Suo motu statement by External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna in Parliament on Prime Minister's visit to USA.

New Delhi, December 3, 2009.

I rise to inform the House of the visit of the Hon'ble Prime Minister to the USA from November 22 to 26, 2009. I would like to share with this House the main outcomes of the visit.

As Hon'ble Members are aware, the Prime Minister's visit to the United States marked the first bilateral Summit between India and the United States after the elections in America last November and our Parliamentary elections this year. It was also the first State visit to the United States by a foreign leader under the new Administration.

An important objective of the Hon'ble Prime Minister's visit was to reaffirm the importance that India attaches to its relations with the United States, and to share our perspectives and concerns on key issues with the new US Administration.

President Obama conveyed to our Prime Minister that strengthening relations with India was one of the highest priorities for his Administration. Prime Minister conveyed to the President that the rapid socio-economic transformation underway in India holds several opportunities for mutually beneficial cooperation between our countries in all areas. India is in a position to contribute to global economic recovery, combat poverty and underdevelopment, and provide stability to a region plagued by terrorism and violent extremism.

Hon'ble Prime Minister and the US President reviewed all aspects of the India-US bilateral relationship. During their meeting, the US Secretary of State, Ms. Hillary Clinton and I updated them on the progress of the Strategic Dialogue that we had announced earlier this year on July 20, 2009.

The Joint Statement titled "India and the United States : Partnership for a Better World" issued after the talks outlines the main focus of the discussions. Trade and investment, clean and efficient energy, science and technology, space, high technology, education, health agriculture and counter-terrorism have been identified as areas of special focus for our future cooperation.

Both India and the United States reiterated their intention to realize the full potential of the Agreement on Civil Nuclear Co-operation signed on October 10, 2008 through the speedy implementation of its provisions. We also agreed that it was particularly important to invigorate and strengthen high technology trade between our countries.

The two sides agree to create conditions to facilitate the expansion of their economies. In this context, the opportunities for US participation in the infrastructure, information and communication technology, healthcare services, education services, energy and environmentally friendly technologies sectors in India were highlighted. They agreed to launch the US-India Financial and Economic Partnership to strengthen engagement on economic, financial and investment related issues.

Both sides agreed to facilitate greater movement of professionals, investors and business travelers, students, and exchange visitors between our two countries. We announced our intention to develop a Framework for Cooperation on Trade and Investment that would foster an environment conducive to technological innovation and collaboration, promote inclusive growth and job creation, and support opportunities for increased trade and investment - including for small and medium-sized enterprises.

The two leaders agreed to pursue their fruitful collaboration in research and science and technology. They launched a Knowledge Initiative with a total funding of USD 10 million that will be allocated to increasing university linkages and junior faculty development exchanges between U.S. and Indian universities, including greater emphasis on community colleges. The Fulbright-Nehru program will be expanded to provide more student and scholar exchange grants. They agreed to cooperate in the area of women's empowerment.

Prime Minister and President Obama agreed to advance public health and biomedical research collaborations between the United States and India. A Memorandum of Intent has been signed on the establishing of a Regional Global Disease Detection Center in India in partnership with the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. This would facilitate co-operation between our doctors and scientists in discovering new and affordable technologies and treatments.

Through the India-US Bi-national Science and Technology Commission and the Endowment, it was agreed to give fresh impetus to collaboration in the cutting edge areas of scientific research, technology and development.

Prime Minister and President Obama agreed to increase India-U.S. agricultural cooperation through a memorandum of understanding on agricultural cooperation and food security with the purpose of promoting agricultural research, human resources capacity building, natural resource management, agri-business and food processing, and collaborative research for increasing food productivity. An important element of this co-operation is the joint development of technology that would improve weather forecasting, including predicting monsoons, and contribute to food productivity and food security efforts in our country. It was also decided that both countries would collaborate in the application of our space technology and related scientific capabilities in outer space and also for development purposes- including in the field of agriculture.

A Traditional Knowledge Digital Library (TKDL) Access Agreement between the Council of Scientific & Industrial Research and US Patent and Trademark Office was signed. This will help prevent misappropriation of traditional knowledge through mistaken issuance of patents as had earlier happened with neem and haldi.

An MoU to facilitate comprehensive bilateral cooperation on a range of IPR issues focusing on capacity building, human resource development and raising public awareness of the importance of IPR was also signed.

Prime Minister and President Obama discussed issues related to our region which are of immediate concern to both our Governments - particularly the threat of terrorism emanating from our immediate neighbourhood.

They reiterated the interest of India and the USA in the stability, development and independence of Afghanistan and in the defeat of terrorist safe havens in Pakistan and Afghanistan. President Obama conveyed that India's role in the reconstruction and rebuilding efforts in Afghanistan was very much appreciated by the US Administration as well as the US Congress. Both leaders were united in their commitment to continue - and enhance - the efforts of India and the USA to help the Afghan people in their development.

Prime Minister's visit to the USA coincided with the eve of the first anniversary of the Mumbai attacks. Naturally, this subject was a priority in Prime Minister's discussions with President Obama. In their discussions, Prime Minister and President Obama underscored the absolute imperative to bring to justice the perpetrators of this terrorist attack and the need for resolute and credible steps to be taken to eliminate safe havens and sanctuaries that provide shelter to terrorists and their activities. They decided on a Counter-terrorism Cooperation Initiative to expand collaboration on counter-terrorism, information sharing, and capacity building.

India and the United States also agreed to continue pursuing mutually beneficial defense cooperation.

The two leaders reaffirmed their shared vision of a world free of nuclear weapons and agreed to work together, as leaders of responsible states with advanced nuclear technology, for global non-proliferation, and universal, non-discriminatory and complete nuclear disarmament. They also agreed to consult regularly and seek the early start of negotiations on a multilateral, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable Fissile Material Cutoff Treaty at the Conference on Disarmament. They discussed the important issue of nuclear security and the dangers posed by nuclear terrorism and clandestine networks.

Sustainable development and clean and efficient usage of energy being an important modern day challenge, it was agreed to enter into a Green Partnership to address the challenges of food security, clean energy and energy security. Prime Minister and President Obama announced the launch of a Clean Energy and Climate Change Initiative. The Initiative includes cooperation in wind and solar energy, second generation bio-fuels, unconventional gas, energy efficiency, and clean coal technologies including carbon capture and storage. Prime Minister and President Obama agreed on the need for a substantive and comprehensive outcome at the meeting of the Conference of Parties to the UNFCCC in Copenhagen, which would cover mitigation, adaptation, finance and technology.

The two leaders committed themselves to strengthen and reform the global economic and financial architecture in the G-20, World Bank and the IMF.

They further committed themselves to achieving genuine reform of the United Nations including in its Security Council in a manner that reflects the contemporary realities of the 21st century. Their discussions covered the need to have an open and inclusive architecture for cooperation in the Asia-Pacific region.

The two sides were unanimous that the 2.7 million strong Indian-American community are a powerful factor in strengthening India-US relations in all areas.

The Hon'ble Prime Minister's visit has laid the foundation for further enhancing our relations with the United States across a broad spectrum of activities.

Prime Minister has invited President Obama to visit India, an invitation which the US President has accepted. We look forward to receiving President Obama in India in the near future, where a warm welcome awaits him.

BELARUS*638. Statement to the Press by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on arrival in Minsk (Belarus).*Minsk, September 16, 2009.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I begin by expressing my great happiness at being in Belarus. My visit to Belarus is the first visit that I have undertaken within the CIS region since I assumed charge of the post of the External Affairs Minister of India after the formation of our new Government in May 2009. This is an indication of the importance that I attach to Belarus and to our bilateral relationship.

2. My visit has been an extremely fulfilling one. I have had an in-depth exchange of views with my esteemed counterpart, His Excellency Mr. Sergei Martynov, Foreign Minister of Belarus. We have discussed the whole gamut of bilateral, relations and global issues. India and Belarus enjoy closer political ties, multifaceted cooperation in various sectors including science and technology and have a growing trade relationship. I am happy to say that our bilateral talks today have revisited many areas of our bilateral cooperation and have looked at more avenues for an enhanced cooperation in the time ahead.

3. The Digital Learning Centre that India is setting up at the High Technology Park in Minsk typifies the sort of cooperation that we envisage for the future - advanced computing skills will be taught to young Belarusians, initially by Indian faculty members and thereafter by Belarusian professionals trained in India. Today, we have signed an Agreement on Cooperation in Physical Training and Sports, which should give a boost to the sports communities of both our countries.

4. Indian company Bharat Heavy Electricals Limited (BHEL) has been awarded a contract worth US$ 56 million for supply of equipment and provision of technical supervision for installation of 120 MW Grodno-II Combined Heat and Power Plant. The contract for the project has also been signed today. India has offered a Line of Credit for the project. I may say that it is a good beginning to mutual advantage.

5. I will be calling on H.E. President Lukashenko later today and will be departing from Belarus thereafter. I venture to state that this visit has served to consolidate the India-Belarus bilateral relationship, to bring us closer together and to further our cooperation in a very concrete manner to our mutual benefit. It has been personally a very satisfying visit for me as well and I have invited H.E. Mr. Martynov to visit India at an early date.

639. Press Release of the Ministry of External Affairs on the visit of External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna to Minsk (Belarus).

Minsk, September 17, 2009.

On the invitation of H.E. Mr. Sergei Martynov, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Belarus, External Affairs Minister of India, Mr. S.M. Krishna visited Minsk on September 16-17, 2009. EAM's visit was in conformity with the tradition of high level contacts between India and Belarus. Both the sides were of the view that the visit would further strengthen and diversify the existing warm and cordial relations between the two friendly countries to mutual advantage.

During the visit, EAM had meetings with his host Minister of Foreign Affairs of Belarus and discussed matters of mutual interest in bilateral relations and exchanged views on international and regional matters of interest and concern. He also called on H.E. Mr. Alexander Lukashenko, President of the Republic of Belarus on September 17. He laid a wreath at the Victory Square Monument, in memory of unknown soldiers, in Minsk on September 16.

With a view to further broadening the legal framework of cooperation between India and Belarus, two documents were signed in the presence of the two Ministers - (1) Agreement on Cooperation in the Field of Physical Training and Sports was signed by H.E. Mr. Vladimir V. Aleshkevich, First Deputy Minister of Tourism and Sport of Belarus and Mr. Ramesh Chander, Ambassador of India to Belarus, and (2) MoU on Establishing Digital Learning Center at High Technology Park in Minsk was signed by Dr. Valery Tsepka, Director of Administration of the High Technology Park and Mr. Ramesh Chander, Ambassador of India to Belarus.

Bilateral relations between India and Belarus are traditionally cordial and friendly. Economic and commercial cooperation between the two countries is good and is on the upswing with a trade turnover of US$ 432 million in the year 2008, which is set to touch US$ 500 million in 2009. Bharat Heavy Electricals Limited (BHEL) has been awarded the contract for 'Reconstruction of the Grodno-II Power Project'. The contract for the Project was signed by the senior executives of BHEL and Grodnoenergo RUE in the presence of EAM and the Belarusian Minister of Foreign Affairs on September 17, 2009. India has offered a Line of Credit of US$ 50 million to the Republic of Belarus for the said power project.

BULGARIA*640. Joint Press Interaction of External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee and Bulgarian Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Ivalo Kalfin.

New Delhi, March 3, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good afternoon and welcome to this press interaction. First of all, may I request everybody to kindly put their phones on the silent mode. Thank you. The Ministers have kindly agreed to take a few questions. When your name is called please introduce yourself and the organization and indicate whom the question is addressed to.

Question (Mr Ramesh Khan, United News of India): I have a question for the Bulgarian Minister. Sir, the security situation in the region has deteriorated, worsened, particularly during the past six months. In the context of whatever has happened in Pakistan this morning, what is your response to the growing, this increasing terrorism in the region? To the External Affairs Minister, Sir, what is India's reaction to the morning's incident in Lahore?

Mr. Ivalo Kalfin (Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Bulgaria): I think that indeed what is happening in the last months in the region is attracting the attention of the international community including Bulgaria. We have very strongly condemned all the terrorist activities and all the terrorist attacks, the major one was in Mumbai recently. You mentioned what is happening today in Pakistan. This gunfire against cricket players, against civilians, is something which is another reason to believe that all the countries in the region have to take all the necessary measures and to cooperate in order to eradicate any possibility for organizing terrorist activities, be it in their countries or in neighbouring countries. I think that the first development after the attacks in Mumbai, the prosecution of some individuals in Pakistan, is a positive sign. But this has to be carried on further. There is no more serious provocation, more serious threat to the peace in the region than the terrorist attacks and the terrorist activities. That is why Bulgaria has always expressed, and we are supportive of all the actions, all the activities that the countries in the region are undertaking in order not only to prevent but to eradicate the roots, the incentives, and the possibilities to organize terrorist activities. Otherwise, I am afraid that this is going to be a problem for a long time, not only for the region but for the world as a whole. For terrorism there is no region or aspect. There is a global aspect only.

Shri Pranab Mukherjee (External Affairs Minister of India): So far as our reaction to this event is concerned, I have already stated in the morning. Joint Secretary, XP Division has given the official reaction*. We are shocked at the audacious terrorist attack on the cricketers. What clearly emerges from these events - whether it is the terror attack on Mumbai or the attack on the cricketers at Lahore - is that unless the infrastructure facilities available to terrorist organizations within the territory of Pakistan or under its control are completely dismantled and the perpetrators of the terror attack are brought to justice, repetition of this type of incidents may take place. Once again we would request the Pakistani authorities and all concerned, not to divert the attention of the international community from this problem but to address the problem, take courage in both hands, dismantle the infrastructural facilities available there, which are more than often used by the terrorists operating from Pakistan territory or territory under the control of Pakistan, and take strict measures against the perpetrators of these terrorist attacks. Then and only then the issues could be adequately addressed. This is part of the international terrorism. Therefore, the international community also will have to address this issue. Today terrorism is not confined within any geographical territory. It is happening in different parts of the world. Therefore, this menace, which is the biggest menace to international peace and tranquility in the post Cold War era, should be tackled adequately.

Question (Ms Daniel Lachi, Bulgarian National TV): Besides the coordinated actions of both countries against international terrorism as it is today, I would like to ask both Ministers, how do you see the current visit and what would be the future development of our so old, so young relationship? Prof. Mukherjee, you know Bulgaria for so many decades. Do we not have new chances for some new beginning within the framework of the difficult world financial crisis and all these new developments around, Bulgaria being already a full-fledged EU member and India being a strong, emerging global power?

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: So far as our bilateral relations between India and Bulgaria are concerned, it is expanding in all areas. Our relationship is multifaceted. Our bilateral trade is expanding; cultural relationship is expanding; bilateral visits at the high level and exchange of views are taking place regularly. Various institutional arrangements are there which can monitor and actually are monitoring from time to time the progress of our relationship. In the context of the international financial crisis, in fact we have shared our perceptions. Prime Minister, at the margin of the ASEM

Meeting, and the G-20 Summit when he attended it, discussed our perception about resolving the crisis. We support the G-20 mechanism through which the issues are being addressed. But one word of caution I would like to utter which was initiated by Prime Minister himself in his Address that developed countries should not resort to protectionism to overcome this crisis. This is the time when developed economies should ensure that there is no hindrance to the flow of investment and suppliers' credit from the Developed World to the Developing World. These aspects are to be taken care of. Any sort of protectionism will complicate the problem instead of resolving it.

Mr. Ivailo Kalfin: I also think that this visit is going to give another political impetus to our bilateral relations. When friendly countries are making such visits despite the forthcoming political events - there will be elections in India, there will be elections in Bulgaria but - we are talking about cooperation, which is going much beyond the (inaudible) political calendar. The two agreements that we have signed today are going to facilitate travel, the people-to-people contact, the cooperation we have in the field, and exchange of experience. Bulgaria is going to work for a further liberalization of these possibilities under this regime as my host, Minister Mukherjee, also demanded that we should do and I fully agree with him. The agreement for cooperation in the field of science and education is very important because it is going to give additional opportunities for specialists to come to Bulgaria or to come to India, specialists from the Universities, specialists from the schools; cultural events that we appreciate in each country, the other country's performers.

So, this is very much related to the people-to-people contact, to the possibilities of citizens and experts from Bulgaria to come to India and vice versa, Indians to come to Bulgaria and to share the experience. In a broader aspect, I think that this visit is also very important because we are drafting the next steps of the political dialogue. We are preparing in the future - not very distant future, maybe by the end of this year an official visit by President Parvanov to India. We are speaking about the perspectives for the economic cooperation. We have decided to do everything possible to organize, by the end of this year or beginning of next year, next session of the Joint Inter-Government Committee. In April and May we shall host in Bulgaria three meetings of Committees on the Cooperation in Information Technology and Science, and Defence Industry. So this is a very full agenda that we are discussing. And also I am very encouraged with my meetings with the representatives of the business community of India yesterday in FICCI, also meeting some major business people.

There are excellent opportunities to increase further both the turnover and the investments, and to work in very important projects in energy, agriculture, pharmaceuticals, etc., etc., where both countries can complement each other. As His Excellency rightly said, the world economic crisis is something, which is very important for us also. It did not start from our countries but our countries are going to be inevitably, as any country in the world, affected by this world economic downturn. I absolutely supported the views of His Excellency that there should not be any protectionism - that is a very bad idea - in such times. We discussed that it is very important to recreate, to reactivate the international mechanism for financial management including the Bretton Woods Institutions - the World Bank and the IMF. And we have to create a model where the developed economies, the large economies, participate in the debate how to deal with the economic crisis, how to end the economic crisis, but also they make also commitments. So, this approach of G-20 of any format that is including the large countries, the large economies in the world, should be encouraged. And they have to be the ones agreeing and showing leadership in dealing with the economic crisis. If we try to be positive in times of economic crisis, you always see possibilities and opportunities. So, I have seen it in my discussions with the business community yesterday. If you are innovative, if you are looking for new opportunities, for new contacts; then the crisis is going to end faster than otherwise. I think that this is exactly what the business communities and in general both countries are doing.

Official Spokesperson: Given the time constraints, can I request you to please restrict yourself to one question either to EAM or to Deputy Prime Minister?

Question (Ms Geeta Mohan, Headlines Today): My question is to the Hon'ble External Affairs Minister, Mr. Mukherjee. Sir, despite all the pressures India did not allow the Indian cricket team to tour Pakistan quoting security reasons. Now with the recent attacks on the Sri Lankan team, does India stand vindicated?

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: It was not a very pleasant decision that we had to take, but we were constrained to take that decision because we knew that the security situation in Pakistan was not safe. What happened unfortunately in Lahore, we have condemned it. It is to be condemned strongly. But it reminds us that it is the responsibility of the incumbent Government to take all precautions and to take all steps, particularly when the international community wants every responsible member-country to take certain positive steps to fight against terrorism. Each and every country should follow that. And I have in my earlier response indicated what should be done immediately in Pakistan.

Question (Ms Mikhailena Dimitrova, Truth): My question is addressed to His Excellency Mr. Mukherjee. Sir, what is the big challenge today in Indian foreign policy; and where is the place of Europe, and especially of Bulgaria, in the topics of Indian foreign policy?

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: I do not visualise any major challenge before the foreign policy because our foreign policy is time-tested. In fact, over the years we have been able, even during the contemporary period, to achieve our objective by expanding our relationships, whether it is in the regional architecture or within the various international fora. It is not a question or a challenge before any individual country. As I mentioned, terrorism is the biggest menace to world peace and tranquility, and it is a challenge to the human civilisation. The international community will have to address this issue. Each and every responsible member-state of the United Nations Organisation has to fulfill its own obligation towards its own bilateral commitments and international commitments. If it is being done, then the problems can be taken care of.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much. The interaction now draws to a close. Thank you for joining us.

CYPRUS*641. Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao and Secretary (West) in the Ministry of External Affairs Vivek Katju on President's State Visit to UK and Cyprus.*New Delhi, October 23, 2009.

Director (XP) (Shri Gopal Baglay): Good afternoon ladies and gentlemen. We have today the Foreign Secretary Shrimati Nirupama Rao with us to brief you on the President's forthcoming State visit to the United Kingdom. We also have Secretary (West) Shri Vivek Katju who will make a statement on the President's forthcoming State visit to Cyprus, after the Foreign Secretary's statement. Thereafter, we will take questions.

My request to you is that please switch off your mobiles or put them in silent mode. When you ask questions please do two things. Do introduce yourself and wait for the microphone to reach you.

May I now invite the Foreign Secretary to make a statement on the President's visit to the UK?

Foreign Secretary (Shrimati Nirupama Rao): Good afternoon. The purpose of our meeting today is to brief you on the forthcoming state visits of the President of India to the United Kingdom and to Cyprus. The President's state visit to the UK is from the 27th to the 29th October 2009.

This will be the third state visit by an Indian President to the UK. The previous two visits took place in 1963 and in 1990 when President's S. Radhakrishnan and R. Venkataraman had visited the UK. This will also be the first state visit after the commencement of the strategic partnership between India and the UK in 2004. We are looking forward to this visit which is taking place after a gap of almost twenty years, and which will enable interactions between the United Kingdom and India at the highest level.

During the state visit the hon. President will have wide-ranging interactions. Apart from her interactions with Her Majesty the Queen who will be hosting a banquet in honour of the President and other members of the royal family, the President will also be meeting the UK Prime Minister Mr. Gordon Brown; the Leader of the Opposition Hon. David Cameron; and the Leader of the Liberal Democrats the Rt. Hon. Nick Clegg. She will also address a business meeting organised by the UK-India Business Council in which the business delegation accompanying her will participate. The Lord Mayor of the City of London will host a banquet in her honour at the Guild Hall. In addition, the President will also interact with British Members of Parliament in a meeting organised at the Westminster by the All-Party Parliamentary Group on India.

Needless to say the President will also have an interaction with the Members of the Indian Community soon after her arrival in London on the 26th October. The President will also participate in a ceremony at the Buckingham Palace where the Queen's Baton Relay launch for the Fourteenth Commonwealth Games being held in India in 2010 will take place.

We attach importance to the visit by our President to a country with which we have long historical ties which have become increasingly substantive in the recent past. Apart from the growing trade and economic relations, India and the UK cooperate well in a number of areas including education, research, science and technology among others.

We also have a regular exchange of views on important regional and global issues and we cooperate well in international fora. Our two-way bilateral trade stands at 12 billion pound sterling. The UK also happens to be the fourth largest investor in India. In turn, India is the second largest overseas investor in the UK in terms of the number of projects. Since 2004 our investments in the UK have exceeded the British investments into India.

The year 2007-2008 saw India retain its position as one of the world's fastest growing sources of investment into the UK, especially in IT and the life sciences. We are also the second largest creator of jobs in the UK. All this has signalled well for the bilateral relationship. We also have a large diaspora in the UK which is doing extremely well and making a substantive contribution to UK society.

We are confident that the President's visit will help in furthering our bilateral ties with the United Kingdom. The visit also signals our commitment at the highest level to our strategic partnership with the UK. Thank you.

I will now invite my colleague Secretary (West) to brief you on the President's visit to Cyprus.

Secretary (West) (Shri Vivek Katju): Thank you, Nirupama.

The President will be visiting Cyprus from October 29th to October 31st. The visit is in response to an invitation that she has received from the President of Cyprus. This will be a state visit. During the visit the President will have bilateral talks with her Cypriot counterpart His Excellency

Mr. Dimitris Christofias. She will also be meeting the President, or the Speaker, of the House of Representatives of Cyprus Mr. Marios Karoyian. She will meet the Archbishop of Cyprus Archbishop Chrysostomos II.

In addition, the President will visit the Cyprus Chamber of Commerce for an event in which the Cyprus-India Business Association and the Cyprus Chamber of Commerce and Industry are participating. From India FICCI, CII and ASSOCHAM are taking a business delegation to Cyprus. The President will also meet, as is customary, with members of the Indian community in Cyprus. The Indian community now is about 4000 strong and consists of professionals, students and others.

India and Cyprus have enjoyed a very strong relationship right from the time of Cyprus' Independence in 1960. India has consistently stood for the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and unity of Cyprus. In turn Cyprus has shown a sensitivity and support for India's positions in various areas. The President's visit will continue this long tradition of interaction at the highest levels between the two countries. Thank you.

Director (XP): Thank you, Sir. Before we take questions, my apologies for not introducing the other two members of the panel here today. Joint Secretary Shri R.N. Prasad who looks after the West Europe Division is to my right. To the right of Secretary (West) is Joint Secretary Shri T.P. Seetharam who looks after Central Europe. Now we will take questions.

Question: We were told that there is going to be this handing over of Gandhi's letters to the President. I did not hear that mentioned.

Foreign Secretary: Yes, we are planning to have a ceremony where there will be a handing over of some letters of Gandhiji and also I think some memorabilia. There is a piece of khadi cloth which has been acquired through auction in the UK. This will be handed over by two prominent members of the Indian community to Rashtrapatiji.

Question: Who are these prominent members of the Indian community who would be involved in this ceremony?

Foreign Secretary: Mr. Nat Puri, and Mr. Ghulam Noon, who is a well-known businessman, the Curry King.

Question: Is this piece of khadi something that Mahatma Gandhi used himself?

Foreign Secretary: Yes, that is right.

Director (XP): If there are no more questions on the UK visit, we will move on to the Cyprus visit.

Question: Is the President going to be meeting anybody from the Turkish side of Cyprus?

Secretary (West): The Turkish entity is not recognised by India. Indeed it is not recognised by the international community except for Turkey. So, there is simply no question of the President meeting anyone from that entity.

Question: There has been a suggestion that the Dalai Lama's visit to Arunachal may be called off in the light of ongoing war of words between various media entities in India and China. Is that at all likely to happen or is he going ahead with his visit?

Foreign Secretary: I am not aware of such a suggestion firstly. Secondly, I have said this before and the Government has said this before that His Holiness the Dalai Lama is a respected religious and spiritual figure. We regard him as such. The Tibetan community in India is not expected to undertake any political activity. That is our consistent position. We have also said the Dalai Lama is free to travel anywhere in India.

Question: Madam, this relates to the situation across the border. Today there was an attack by terrorists on Kamra which is an Air Force base which has nuclear components in it. Is the Government of India concerned, because this concern has been expressed in the past, about nuclear weapons of the Pakistani side falling into the hands of terrorists?

Foreign Secretary: We have seen the reports of what happened today at Kamra. What I want to say on the issue is that we hope that the Pakistan Government will continue to take steps to effectively secure their nuclear assets.

Question: Madam, ten months after the Mumbai attacks, could you give us an idea as to diplomatically what Pakistanis have told us, where the investigation is leading to? Have we heard anything from them after we handed over the last dossier which is quite some time ago?

Foreign Secretary: I will draw reference to the meetings that we had in New York last month with the Pakistani side. I met my counterpart the Pakistan Foreign Secretary, and our External Affairs Minister met the Pakistan Foreign Minister. During these meetings of course we emphasised our concerns about the very very slow and tardy pace of action being taken against the conspirators and others responsible for the Mumbai terror attacks last year. That is a concern that we have expressed with all seriousness and emphasis to the Pakistan side. We have also drawn attention and also expressed our concern about the very very slow pace of not only the action that is supposed to be taken but the whole business of the trial that they are supposed to conduct against the accused.

Question: Mrs. Rao, we listened to you in Kabul where the attack had taken place and you had declared that there will be a kind of Government of India inquiry. What is the progress of that inquiry which you declared there? You remember that the Pakistani Prime Minister also had told our Prime Minister in Colombo in the SAARC meeting that he would come back to him so far as the earlier attack was concerned. Has there been any kind of progress on that earlier attack? And what is the progress on this particular attack?

Foreign Secretary: I would again draw reference to the context that I had explained in my earlier answer, the lack of progress from the Pakistan side when it comes to investigation of all the long series of terrorist attacks that have been directed against us from their soil. That is as far as the Pakistan side is concerned. As far as the bomb attack on our Embassy in Kabul is concerned, yes I was in Kabul soon after this happened, and I was able to survey and see at first hand the extent of the damage that had been caused around the perimeter of our Embassy and indeed to parts of the building also. In my discussions with the Afghan leadership during that visit, they not only expressed their sympathy and concern to us over what had happened but also drew attention to the fact that this pointed to the involvement of forces that in all likelihood operated from across the borders. They are conducting an enquiry into what happened, and we are awaiting the full results of that enquiry. It would not be in the interest of the enquiry for me to talk further about it at this moment.

Question: Is the meeting between Indian and Chinese Prime Ministers taking place tomorrow? What are the issues to be discussed during the meeting?

Foreign Secretary: The bilateral relationship that we have with China will obviously be in focus during the forthcoming meeting between our Prime Minister and Premier Wen Jiabao of China in Thailand tomorrow. This is a relationship that has developed in many many areas in recent years. It is also a relationship that is a complex one. You are aware of the outstanding issues that remain to be resolved between India and China. And obviously in meetings of this nature, especially meetings between the leadership at the highest level, there is an opportunity to address all these issues. Apart from that of course India and China are partners in the international context when it comes to many many multilateral issues of concern to the developing world, and these issues also form a part of discussions when such meetings take place.

Question: One question unrelated to the visits. Has the Dalai Lama applied for inner line permit?

Foreign Secretary: I am not aware of that.

Question: Does he need one?

Foreign Secretary: I do not believe he needs one. That is a technicality and this is best addressed to the Home Ministry. As you know, Arunachal Pradesh is an integral part of India.

Question: Has the Dalai Lama informed the Government of India about his proposed visit to Arunachal Pradesh?

Foreign Secretary: We are aware of the fact that the Dalai Lama had expressed an intention to visit Arunachal Pradesh but I have no further details at the moment.

Director (XP): Thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen, for your presence here today.

642. Departure Statement of President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil on her visits to the United Kingdom and Republic of Cyprus.

On Board Special Flight, October 26, 2009.

Good morning and a very warm welcome to all of you on board, as we embark on our journey to the United Kingdom and the Republic of Cyprus. A visit by the President of India to both these countries is taking place after nearly two decades. The purpose of my visit is to further enhance and consolidate the bonds of friendship. In this context, I am looking forward to discussions with my interlocutors both in London as well as in Nicosia.

My visit, at the invitation of Her Majesty the Queen, will be the first State Visit to the UK after the two countries decided to upgrade the relationship and became Strategic Partners in 2004. I will be in the United Kingdom from October 27 to 29. Apart from my interactions with Her Majesty the Queen and other members of the Royal family which includes a meeting with the Prince of Wales on the British Asian Trust, I will also be meeting with Prime Minister Gordon Brown, the Leader of Opposition and the leader of the Liberal Democrats. I am looking forward to the meeting organized at Westminster by the All Party Parliamentary Group on India. During the visit, I will address a business meeting organized by the UK India Business Council in which the Indian business delegation accompanying me will participate. I will attend a Banquet being hosted by the Lord Mayor of the City of London.

The United Kingdom has one of our largest Diasporas. The Indian community is doing extremely well and is making substantial contributions to the national life of the UK. Soon after my arrival in London, I will be meeting members of the Indian community at a reception hosted by the High Commissioner. Two prominent members of the Indian community Sir Ghulam Noon and Mr. Nathu Ram Puri, have procured Mahatma Gandhi's memorabilia at an auction. In a function at the Indian High Commission, these precious articles would be handed over to me to be brought back to India, where they belong.

India and the UK have strong historical and cultural ties and a shared commitment to the rule of law, pluralism and democracy. Our relationship with the UK has been evolving steadily. As I mentioned earlier, we have a Strategic Partnership with the UK since 2004. Bilateral trade and investment between the two countries has been increasing in a satisfactory manner. Our cooperation with the UK is across a broad spectrum and includes areas like Science and Technology, research, defence, IT, education, among others. In the field of education, the UK is working with us towards the establishment of a new IIT, Indian Institute of Science, Education and Research in Pune and one Central University.

In my interactions with the UK leadership, I look forward to an exchange of views on the broad political and strategic dimensions of our bilateral relationship.

I will not only be discussing areas in which we already cooperate well, but will also seek greater cooperation and collaboration in other areas where opportunities exist like in the infrastructure sector, healthcare, green technology and renewable energy sectors. I will also have an exchange of views on regional and international issues that are of interest to our two countries.

During my visit, I would reiterate our wholehearted commitment to the further upgradation and diversification of our multidimensional relationship with the UK as well as to strengthening our Strategic Partnership.

On the day of my departure from London, I will be participating in a ceremony to launch the Queen's Baton Relay at the Buckingham Palace for the forthcoming Commonwealth Games in Delhi next year.

After my visit to the United Kingdom, I look forward to my visit to Cyprus, a beautiful country. India and Cyprus are both ancient civilizations with rich cultural heritages and shared historical experiences. The close relations between our two countries are based on an understanding of each other's aspirations and concerns, which have found expression through support extended to each other on important issues.

Ever since the days of friendship between Pandit Nehru and Archbishop Makarios, regular high-level contacts between the two countries have been a feature of our special relationship. In Cyprus, I look forward to my meeting President Demetris Christofias to discuss ways in which our bilateral relations can be intensified, particularly through enhanced economic engagement in sectors like the knowledge industry, tourism, hydrocarbons and financial services, among others. Since Cyprus became a member of the European Union in 2004, coinciding with rapid economic development in India, opportunities for further strengthening our economic and commercial contacts have increased.

I will also be meeting the Archbishop of Cyprus, His Beatitude Chrysostomos II and the President of the House of Representatives, which is the Legislature of Cyprus.

Besides discussing bilateral and other issues with the leaders of Cyprus, I look forward to the opportunity of interacting with the business community of both India and Cyprus, in order to encourage them to explore the many opportunities for mutually beneficial projects and proposals. I will also be interacting with the Indian community living in Cyprus. They are important contributors to the friendship that exists between the peoples of India and Cyprus.

We will return to India on 1st November. I wish you a comfortable flight and a good stay in both the countries, and hope that you do get some time to see some of the beautiful spots in the two countries as well as interact with the local population.

643. Speech of President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Cypress - India Business Meet.

Nicosia, October 30, 2009.

H.E. Mr. Loucas Louca, Minister of Justice & Public Order, Smt. Purandeswari, Minister of State of Human Resource Development, India,

Mr. Manthos Mavrommatis, President of the Cyprus Chamber of Commerce & Industry,

Mr. Marios S. Andreou, President of the Cyprus India Business Association,

Mr. Vimal Mahendru, Leader of the Indian Business Delegation,

Ladies & Gentlemen,

It is a great pleasure for me to be here in the beautiful city of Nicosia in the midst of the friendly people of Cyprus and distinguished captains of business and industry. I would like to commend the Cyprus Chamber of Commerce and Industry for organizing this event to strengthen India-Cyprus economic relations.

Cyprus and India are close and trusted friends. We support the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and unity of the Republic of Cyprus. We value the consistent support extended by Cyprus on issues of significance to India. I am told that in the recent years our economic relations have increased, but we need to look at how to further expand these by adding new dimensions and areas of co-operation.

We admire the success of the people of Cyprus in achieving rapid economic growth and creating a strong service sector, in particular, the tourism industry and financial services. We have been following with great interest the development vision of the Government of Cyprus and its resolve to modernize its economy to a new technological era. We wish you all success in your development strategy. India, with its core competence in the IT sector and a large pool of skilled manpower, would be happy to participate in Cyprus's plan to develop its knowledge based industries.

The last two decades have seen a steady liberalization of the Indian economy. This period has also witnessed a rapid increase in the rate of economic growth. The global economic and financial crisis has had its adverse impact all over the world. However, even in the face of this, India has been able to grow at more than 6.5 percent, showing the resilience of its economy. All indications are that India is on the path to recovery. The stock markets have rebounded and market capitalization has crossed $ 600 billion.

India's stable economy and its democratic as well as transparent system makes it an excellent destination for investment. We are undertaking a massive infrastructure expansion programme requiring an investment of over US $ 500 billion over the next five years. This opens up many opportunities for global businesses for investment in India. I invite Cypriot companies to participate in bids for projects in India, individually or in joint ventures with Indian firms.

Our strong domestic demand and an upwardly mobile middle class population creates a big market and, hence, an attraction for the global business community.

A remarkable feature of India's economy is its emergence as a global player in the knowledge based industries. IT, biotechnology, pharmaceuticals, renewable energies have seen rapid growth. As I stated earlier, India today is ideally positioned to facilitate the Cypriot Government's policy to promote the country's pursuit in further developing hi-tech and knowledge-based industries. Apart from IT, tourism, financial services, Agro-food processing, pharmaceuticals, hydro-carbons, automobiles could be some of the areas of potential cooperation. I am confident that Indian and Cypriot industrialists and business people will utilize the opportunities available in Cyprus for mutual benefit.

Our bilateral trade is US$ 68 million. Considering that both countries have impressive global merchandise trade turnovers, our trade figures are very low. I call on this meeting to also focus on looking at ways to enhance and diversify our trade relations.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Since ancient times, Cyprus has been at the centre of busy trade routes linking Europe, the Arab world and the Far East. The Cypriot people are known for their warm and hospitable attitude towards those who touch the shores of this island nation. This has facilitated the establishment of Cyprus as a hub of trade and sea communications. After joining the EU, Cyprus stands as the South-Eastern outpost of the European Union. It offers a springboard for expansion in the broad East Mediterranean. Indian business and industry should also look at the vast European Union market and the markets of Russia and Mediterranean countries that can be served with Cyprus as base.

I wish the captains of Indian and Cypriot business and industry all success in their deliberations. I remain confident that you will forge new partnerships which will be mutually beneficial. Your discussions could look at roadblocks and obstacles, if any, that may need government policy measures. I firmly believe that the potential of India-Cyprus economic relations is far from realized. Your joint efforts will further cement our friendly relations. My good wishes to all of you.

Thank you.

644. Statement to the media by President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil after talks with the Cypress President Demetris Christofias.

Nicosia, October 31, 2009.

I am very happy to be in this historic city of Nicosia. I am touched by the warmth and friendship with which we have been greeted and are delighted to be with our long standing and steadfast friends.

The close and trusted friendship between our two countries, as you know, is deep rooted and goes back to our struggles for independence. The founders of our nation, Mahatma Gandhi and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Archbishop Makarios shared a vision of a just world and bonds of personal friendship with each other. This mutual respect continued. This friendship continued between President Syrios Kyprianou and Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, whose 25th Death Anniversary is being observed today. It now falls on the future generations of both countries to continue this friendship. India has consistently stood for the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and unity of the Republic of Cyprus.

Our discussions today covered the entire gamut of bilateral relations, as well as international and regional issues of importance to both our countries. We reviewed the functioning of the institutional arrangements for dialogue between our two countries as also the agreements signed in the past few years which have created the necessary framework to enhance our relations.

We affirmed our desire to further develop our bilateral economic and commercial relations in a cross-sectoral manner. It is for this reason that an Indian business delegation accompanies me.

Economic development of Cyprus is a true success story. India rejoices in the rapid development achieved by the people of the Republic of Cyprus. Given its commitment to developing knowledge-based and hi-technology industry as one of the pillars of the economy, possibilities for cooperation with India in these areas are numerous.

IT and IT Enabled Services are areas of India's core competence. Biotechnology, R&D projects, Agro-food processing, financial services, pharmaceuticals, tourism, film industry, construction, automobiles are some of the other areas of potential cooperation. In our discussions, we also agreed that our bilateral trade which stands at US$ 68.7 million is much below potential and efforts to increase it should be explored.

We are happy to see the realization of aspirations of Cyprus in becoming a member of the European Union and in joining the Euro Zone. We see in these developments an opportunity to build on our economic and technological relations for the mutual benefit of our two peoples.

Mr. President, initiatives during your term have added momentum to resolve the long-standing Cyprus problem. The enthusiasm of the people at the opening of the Ledra Street crossing after 45 long years signified the hope and the desire of many people for unity. We wish you all success in achieving a resolution of the Cyprus problem in accordance with your aspirations and the resolutions of the United Nations Security Council.

India considers Cyprus a time-tested and valuable ally. We appreciate its support for India's permanent membership of the UN Security Council. Our shared commitment to freedom and democracy, multi-religious and multicultural society and common outlook on major regional and international issues, provide the basis for close cooperation in international forums.

I hope this visit will impart added momentum to our bilateral ties.

I have invited President H.E. Mr. Demetris Christofias and Madam Christofia to visit India at a mutually convenient date. We look forward to welcoming them in India.

645. Speech of President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Banquet hosted in her honour by the Cypres President Demetris Christofias.

Nicosia, October 31, 2009.

Mr. President,

Madame Christofia,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is, indeed, a pleasure for my delegation and me to be among time tested friends, on an enchanted island that legend ascribes as the home of the Goddess of beauty and love. Your country's ancient history, archaeological wealth, natural beauty and unique location at the cross roads of Asia, Africa and Europe make it not only a major tourism destination, but also a dynamic centre for shipping, financial services as well as a hub for frontier technologies. India applauds and rejoices in the achievements made by Cyprus, a close and trusted friend.

Your warm words of welcome and traditional hospitality have again underlined the very strong bonds of traditional friendship that have existed between our two countries. Just as Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Mrs. Indira Gandhi have been immortalised in memorials and streets named after them in Nicosia, Archbishop Makarios has been honoured in New Delhi, where a major road is named after him. We fondly remember the successful visit to India in 2006 of former President His Excellency Tassos Papadopoulos.

Excellency,

Our two countries share faith in democracy, respect for diversity, and strive for a peaceful environment in which our people can benefit from the fruits of rapid and sustainable development. We have both overcome conflict and adversity and, in the face of challenges, we have achieved much that we can be proud of. We, however, need to imbue our friendship with far more substantive cooperation on economic, scientific and technological fronts. Cyprus can be assured of India's full commitment to deepening and enhancing the bilateral relationship.

The many opportunities that exist for expanding our interaction should be seized upon. Information technology, renewable sources of energy, innovations in the automobile sector, sustainable tourism projects, infrastructure projects, health and wellness are some of the promising areas for further enhancement of our mutually beneficial engagement. Governments of both the countries need to encourage business people and institutions to impart greater energy in their mutual interaction. Just as the membership of the EU enlarges frontiers of opportunity of Cyprus, the rapid economic growth of India in recent years, even in the adverse global financial conditions, provides profitable opportunities for medium and long-term investments.

India values the consistent support that Cyprus has extended on issues of vital concern. By expressing support for the permanent membership of India in an expanded UN Security Council as well as for the India specific civil nuclear energy waiver at the Nuclear Suppliers Group, Cyprus has shown a deep understanding of our national aspirations. We appreciate the strong and unequivocal condemnation by Cyprus of the terrorist attacks on India. It is important that the perpetrators of terrorist acts are punished promptly so that justice and not impunity prevails. The international community must work together to defeat the forces of terrorism who are inflicting wanton destruction across the globe. This is important for peace and stability in the world.

Excellency, you are currently engaged in crucial negotiations to find a peaceful solution to the painful legacy that has divided your country. We noted with interest your speech at the UN General Assembly last month in this regard. I also recall that at your inauguration as President on 28th February 2008, you had said that you were inspired by a life-long vision: "The achievement of a just solution to the Cyprus problem and the building of a just society". India wishes you every success in transforming your worthy vision into reality.

Ladies and Gentlemen, may I request you to join me in a toast to:-

- the health and happiness of the President and Madame Christofia;
- the progress and prosperity of the friendly people of Cyprus; and
- the enhancement of the friendship between India and Cyprus.

Thank You.

646. Statement of President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil on her way back to New Delhi after completing her State visits to the United Kingdom and Cyprus.

On Board Special Aircraft, October 31, 2009.

We are meeting at a rather late hour but I thought that I would brief you about my just concluded State Visits to the United Kingdom and the Republic of Cyprus. The main purpose of my visits was to consolidate our traditionally friendly ties with both countries.

2. As I had mentioned during my interaction with you on the outward journey, the visit to the UK was the first State Visit from either side since India and the UK commenced their strategic partnership in 2004, and was taking place after a gap of 20 years.

3. My delegation and I were received with great warmth at the welcome ceremony at Windsor, which was impressive not only because of its grand pageantry but also for the enthusiasm shown by the hundreds of people who greeted the entourage as it moved to the Castle. This warmth, as you would have also witnessed, was evident at every stage, whether at the banquet at Windsor Castle or at the Guildhall of the City of London.

4. The outcome of the visit was fruitful. I had wide-ranging discussions with the UK leadership on bilateral, regional and global issues of mutual interest. Her Majesty, the Queen recalled with fondness her visits to India. She spoke about the unique friendship between our two countries which had been built on strong and deep foundations, and was manifest in the Strategic Partnership as well as the growing and dynamic economic relationship. Describing education as one of the most important pillars of the new partnership, Her Majesty referred to the more than thirty thousand students studying in universities in the UK and also mentioned the recent arrival in Cambridge University of the first group of scholars under the Dr. Manmohan Singh Scholarships.

5. I was also struck by the UK leadership's interest in and awareness about India. I saw a desire and commitment on the part of my UK interlocutors, across the entire political spectrum, for further strengthening and diversifying ties between our two countries. I reciprocated this in full measure.

6. UK's willingness to cooperate with India in the social sectors, particularly in the context of the Millennium Development Goals, was conveyed to me by Prime Minister Gordon Brown. He also expressed a keen interest in the ongoing cooperation between India and UK in the education sector, and the importance they attach to this component of our relationship. The issue of easier movement of our people to the UK, especially of IT professionals, was also discussed.

7. The strong trade and investment links between India and the UK figured prominently in talks. A high-level delegation of the Indian business community accompanied me to London. At the UK-India Business Council Meeting, the business communities of both countries expressed optimism about future prospects. I am confident that given the many complementarities of the two economies, there will be intensification of engagements and our business enterprises will contribute to this process.

8. Our Diaspora in the UK is hard working, industrious and successful. They have made a mark for themselves in diverse fields in the UK. I met a cross-section of the community members involved in the social, economic and political life of the UK. Many of them are also associated with British foundations working with India, including the British Asian Trust, a group of charities associated with the Prince of Wales. I had an opportunity to be briefed about the activities in India of this Trust at a meeting with the Prince of Wales. In my meetings, the positive role being played by the large Indian Diaspora and their significant contribution was clearly recognized and appreciated.

9. I interacted with Members of the British Parliament at a meeting organized by the All Party UK Parliamentary Group on India. As Parliamentary democracies, both our countries can benefit from regular contacts between Members of Parliament.

10. I attach a very special significance to the function held at India House, where memorabilia associated with Mahatma Gandhi was handed over to me. It was a profoundly emotional moment for me. We are carrying these precious items back to India. I also saw, at the Royal collection at Windsor, a small shawl made with yarn spun by Gandhiji and gifted in 1947 to Her Majesty the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh for their wedding.

11. The launch of the Queen's Baton Relay at Buckingham Palace on 29 October, in a manner of speaking, has started the countdown for the forthcoming Commonwealth Games in India next year. I have extended an invitation to Her Majesty the Queen, to visit India next year for the Commonwealth Games.

12. My visit to the UK was a reiteration of our strong commitment to the strategic partnership and our desire to further consolidate this important relationship. I am satisfied with what was achieved during the visit and am also confident that it will give a further impetus to the rapidly developing Indo-UK ties.

13. Cyprus is a country with which India enjoys a close friendship. This feeling comes across very tellingly when one enters the precincts of the Parliament building of the country which is located on Jawaharlal Nehru Avenue and has the statue of Mahatma Gandhi at the entrance. The same sentiment of a special relationship is demonstrated when the street on which the Indian High Commission is located is named Indira Gandhi Street.

14. My interactions with President Demetris Christofias reinforced our friendship. We discussed potential areas for enhancing economic co-operation, including IT, tourism, financial services, agro-food processing, hydrocarbons, in which we need to focus on, to convert the existing goodwill, into projects and programmes, with concrete results. We also reaffirmed our support for matters that are important to each other. Cyprus attaches great value to India's consistent support for its sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity. I reiterated our support. We too have received from Cyprus, strong and unwavering support on matters of significance to us, including support for our permanent membership in an expanded UN Security Council. He indicated that India could count on Cyprus as a reliable friend of India in the EU. As you know, all Presidents of Cyprus have visited India during their terms in office. I have extended an invitation to President Christofias and Madame Christofia to visit India at a mutually convenient time.

15. As Cyprus seeks to diversify beyond the traditional sectors of tourism, finance and shipping, it opens up opportunities for new economic and commercial partnerships. I encouraged the Indian business delegation accompanying me to explore the possibilities of working with Cyprus in areas which are mutually beneficial. I am glad that I was able to witness at the business event yesterday, the signing of a MoU for a joint venture solar power project in India, with technical and financial participation from Cyprus. As you are aware Cyprus is strategically located at the crossroads of three continents. Our businesspersons could explore markets in the EU, Russia and Mediterranean countries with Cyprus as the base. The growing Indian community in Cyprus can be important contributors to our growing relationship.

16. During my meeting with the President of the House of Representatives, we discussed avenues for cooperation between our respective parliaments. It is expected that a parliamentary delegation from Cyprus will visit India in the near future.

17. I also had a good meeting with Archbishop Chrisostomos II on our shared values and experiences that have enriched our respective multi-cultural societies.

18. The leadership and the people of Cyprus have genuine warmth and appreciation for the deep rooted friendship with India. Overall, my visit to Cyprus reinforced the strong bonds that already exist and helped define the contours of a future cooperation within the context of a rapidly changing world. 19. I return back home satisfied with the outcome of my visits to the UK and the Republic of Cyprus. I also hope that you all return home with pleasant memories of your visit.

FRANCE*649. Press Release of the Ministry of Commerce on the need to create a balance in Indo - French bilateral trade.*New Delhi, February 4, 2009.

Shri Kamal Nath, Union Minister of Commerce & Industry, has stated that India is in a phase of rapid economic growth and its engagement with the world community is increasing. During the bilateral meeting with the French Minister of State for Foreign Trade, Ms. Anne Marie Idrac here last evening. Shri Kamal Nath informed that Indo-French trade was US $ 8.85 billion during 2007-08 (exports - $ 2.6 billion and imports - $ 6.25 billion) and added that there is a need to work together to create balance in bilateral trade. The meeting was attended by Shri G.K. Pillai, Commerce Secretary; Shri Ajay Shankar, Secretary, Department of Industrial Policy & Promotion; senior government officials and representatives from trade and industry from both the countries.

Interacting with the French Minister, Shri Nath informed that India is a growing market for French products, including luxury products and stressed about the importance of establishing linkages between SMEs on both sides for laying a strong foundation for growth of trade and investment flows. Both sides agreed for enhanced bilateral cooperation in areas like information technology & telecommunications, posts, energy, roads, urban development, railways and agriculture.

Discussing about the status and progress in WTO negotiations, Shri Kamal Nath said: "India continues to believe strongly in a rule-based, transparent and fair multilateral trade regime. One of the factors which will have an important bearing on the conclusion of the Round is whether the developed countries would be willing to show the necessary flexibility for finalising a multilateral deal. However, India has been engaging constructively and actively with other fellow member countries of the WTO in the expectation that this would be forthcoming. A conclusion would of course depend on whether the WTO Members are faithful to the mandate and the final outcome reflects a clear balance between market opening and the development needs of the majority of the membership".

* The visit of the French Minister was also an occasion for the signing on 4th February of its first commercial nuclear pact with the French nuclear giant Areva. This will help build nuclear power plants and get supplies of nuclear fuel. Areva will supply two European Pressurised Reactors (EPRs) of 1650 MWe each for the plant to be built at Jaitapur in Maharashtra. The Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) was signed by S.K. Jain, Chairman and Managing Director, Nuclear Power Corporation of India Limited, and Anne Lauvergeon, CEO of Areva, in the presence of Minister of State for Commerce and Power Jairam Ramesh and Minister of State in the PMO Prithviraj Chavan and French Minister for Foreign Trade Anne-Marie Idrac. The Chairman of Atomic Energy Commission Anil Kakodkar, who was present, said this was just the beginning. Ms. Lauvergeon said her company was committed to supplying fuel for the lifetime of the reactors, pegged at about 60 years. Areva would meet the fuel requirements through its uranium mines located in various countries, including Australia, Kazakhstan and Niger. Ms. Idrac said the MoU was part of the deep and friendly strategic relationship between India and France. The two shared common views on climate change and the global financial crisis. France, she said, was proud to be part of this new relationship.

650. Speech by Foreign Secretary Shivshankar Menon on India's Foreign Policy at Institute Francais des Relations Internationales (IFRI).

Paris, February 4, 2009.

Ambassador Mathai,

Mr. Olivier Louis,

Ladies and gentlemen,

Thank you for asking me to speak to you today. It is an honor and a privilege to be asked to such a prestigious institution which has contributed so significantly to our understanding of the world.

I was asked to speak on India's foreign policy. Rather than cataloguing India's relationships, I thought I would speak briefly on the general characteristics of India's foreign policy, and then discuss in a little more detail two of our present preoccupations: how the strategic shape of the world may be affected by the present world economic crisis; and, the situation in India's neighborhood. I would then be most interested in hearing your views and comments, and could answer questions.

Characteristics

At their most general, the goals of India's foreign policy are no different from those of other countries - we seek peace and prosperity, or security and development. Our foreign policy seeks to encourage and create an external environment that furthers these goals.

At the same time, India's particular nature, history, geography and circumstances shape the unique cast of India's foreign policy and give it certain particular characteristics:

- India's size, challenges and choice of political values are, to a very great extent special to us.
- Twenty five years of 6% growth have made a difference to India and given our foreign policy certain capabilities, but we still have a considerable distance to travel. To abolish mass poverty in India by 2020 we need to keep our economy growing at 8-10% each year.
- India is and will remain a developing country for a considerable period; therefore, nation-building or the socio-economic transformation in India must be the primary concern of our foreign policy.

- As a consequence India's foreign policy has a strong multilateralist cast. It recognizes that security in today's world is indivisible. Equally, the pursuit of development and prosperity requires collective international effort. Today, and in the foreseeable future, the issues that will be crucial to India's transformation are global, requiring global solutions --- such as, energy security, environmentally sustainable economic growth, and an open rule-based international trading system.
- Indian nationalism has not been based on a shared language or common religion or ethnic identity. As we sought to build a plural, democratic, secular and tolerant society of our own, it was natural that we would look for and promote the same values abroad, such as democratic decision-making in the international system, and peaceful coexistence.
- Add to this the fact of India's strategic tradition and you will get some sense of why India's foreign policy is what it is. In Kautilya, the third century BC author of the Arthashastra, India has the oldest "realist" strategic tradition in the world. But he was followed in less than a century by Ashoka, the Mauryan emperor who renounced war for conquest by persuasion, an idealist who inspired many subsequent Indian leaders like Jawaharlal Nehru.

It is natural and clear that the primary purpose of independent India's foreign policy is to enable the domestic transformation of India from a poor and backward economy into one which could offer its people their basic needs and an opportunity to achieve their potential. Initially, in 1947, this had to be attempted in the Cold War world, divided between two heavily armed and hostile camps, each led by a superpower, and each saying that if you were not with them you were against them. It took courage and vision to choose, as Nehru and the leadership did, not to join either camp and to opt for non-alignment. Having fought so hard for our freedom, we are not ready to abdicate our independence of judgment to others.

India's immediate foreign policy objectives were, and remain, a peaceful environment, strategic space and autonomy, free of entanglement in conflicts or alliances, while we concentrate on our domestic tasks. Non-alignment, as this policy came to be called, is the ability to judge issues on their merits and their effect on India's interests or, as our first Prime Minister Nehru used to say, 'enlightened self-interest'.

To take one example of how this worked in practice. In 1974, in our search for strategic autonomy and mastery of technology, India tested a nuclear explosive device in a peaceful nuclear explosion (PNE). The world led by the Nuclear Weapon States reacted by forming a nuclear cartel, the Nuclear Suppliers Group (NSG), and by cutting off nuclear cooperation with India unless she agreed to forego a nuclear weapons programme and put all her nuclear facilities under international safeguards to guarantee that commitment. As the nuclear weapon states were not willing to do the same themselves, we refused to do so, suffering the consequences of technology denial regimes on our growth and development. But at that stage we lacked the relative power or capability to do more than to suffer in silence while keeping our options open.

The true realization of our foreign policy potential had to wait for the end of the bipolar world in 1989 and our economic reform policies, opening up the Indian economy to the world. Historically speaking, India has been most prosperous and stable when she has been most connected with the rest of the world.

In many ways, the period after 1991 has been the most favorable to our quest to develop India. The post Cold War external environment of a globalizing world, without rival political alliances, gave India the opportunity to improve relations with all the major powers. The risk of a direct conflict between two or more major powers had also diminished due to the interdependence created by globalization. The strength of capital and trade flows was directly beneficial to emerging economies like India, China and others. The evolving situation was one in which there was an opportunity for India. The period after 1991 saw a much more active Indian engagement with the neighbors, whether through repeated attempts by successive governments to improve relations with Pakistan, or border-related CBMs with China, or free trade agreements with neighbors starting with Sri Lanka in 1998, or the Ganga Waters Treaty with Bangladesh. The period since 1991 has seen a remarkable change in the scale of our ambitions, and in our capacity to seek to achieve them.

Equally important was another necessary condition which gave India space to work in: India's rapid economic and social transformation. As a result of twenty five years of 6% growth and reforms since 1991, India is today in a position to engage with the world in an unprecedented manner.

The contrast between the world's reaction to the 1974 and 1998 nuclear tests by India is instructive. In September 2008, thanks to work by friends like France, the NSG decided to permit international civil nuclear cooperation with India, thus ending India's nuclear isolation.

Today's World

Today, it seems that we may be on the cusp of a historic and fundamental change in the nature of the world situation. Looking at the world from India, it often seems that we are witness to the collapse of the Westphalian state system and a redistribution in the global balance of power, leading to the rise of major new powers and forces. The twin processes of the world economic crisis and economic inter-dependence have resulted in a situation where no power is insulated from global developments. Uncertainty in the international system has grown exponentially and rapidly. The only certainty is that the global landscape that emerges from the economic and financial crisis will be vastly different from what obtains today.

The economic crisis itself is a consequence of unsustainable imbalances in the global economy, of prolonged fiscal and trade deficits in certain countries matched by fiscal surpluses and astronomical foreign exchange surpluses in other countries. As of now it is impossible to say that these imbalances will indeed be corrected, or that the underlying pattern of savings and consumption which led to the crisis will be successfully altered. Ironically, stimulus packages will actually push economies away from the direction of basic adjustment required though they may be a temporary palliative. Exchange rate adjustments, (a higher Yuan or a lower dollar), would devalue assets and reserves that are needed to overcome the crisis. A successful readjustment of the fundamentals of the global economy would require an unprecedented level of coordination and understanding between several major powers that has never been achieved before in history, except when the balance of power was totally skewed by the effects of a twenty year crisis followed by a world war.

It seems likely that the present economic crisis will result in a much flatter distribution of power, or a more even balance of power, among the major actors on the global stage. Interdependence brought about by globalization imposes limits beyond which tensions among the major powers cannot escalate. As uncertainty in the system rises, each of the major powers is now following hedging strategies abroad while attempting to minimize the effects of the crisis on its own economy.

Equally, no one power can hope to solve issues by itself, no matter how powerful it is. What is in fact happening, (politically in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, and economically in the meetings of G-20 leaders and the G-8 plus G-5), is that major powers are coming together to form coalitions to deal with issues where they have a convergence of interests, despite differences on other issues or in broader approach. In other words, what we see is the emergence of a global order marked by the preponderance of several major powers where both cooperation and competition among them are intense. The result is a de-hyphenation of relationships with each other, of each major power engaging with and competing with all the others, in a situation that affords the powers increased strategic space but lessened capacity to create outcomes.

Paradoxically, some of the same forces of globalization - the evolution of technology, the mobility of capital and so on - which have led to the decline of the Westphalian state order are also the source of our greatest dangers. Some major threats today are from non-state actors, from trans-boundary effects of the collapse of the state system, or, at least, of its inadequacy.

Looking ahead, the factors of risk that threaten systemic stability come from larger, global issues. The greatest of these is the international community's ability to manage the readjustment of the world economy, the institutions that are supposed to run it and the resulting shifts in the balance of power. In turn, these will affect our ability to deal with questions like terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, energy security and environmental and climate change. With globalization and the spread of technology, threats have also globalised and now span borders. These are issues that will impact directly on India's ability to grow and expand our strategic autonomy. As I said before, it is obvious that no single country can deal with these issues alone. They require global solutions. They will also require much more flexible diplomacy, building coalitions on different issues rather than relying on a more limited range of strategic relationships.

India's Neighborhood

Among global issues, international terrorism remains a major threat to peace and stability. We in India are next to the epicenter of international terrorism in Pakistan. We have directly suffered the consequences of linkages and relationships among terrorist organizations, their support structures, official sponsors and funding mechanisms, which transcend national borders but operate within them. Any compromise with such forces, howsoever pragmatic or opportune it might appear momentarily, only encourages them. Large areas to the west of India, in Pakistan extending into Afghanistan have seen the collapse of state structures and the absence of governance or the writ of the state, with the emergence of multiple centers of power. The results, in the form of terrorism, clandestine nuclear proliferation, extremism and radicalism are felt not just by India but by the world.

For India the most graphic recent instances were the bombing of our Embassy in Kabul on July 7, 2008 and the Mumbai attacks of 26 November 2008. In each case the perpetrators planned, trained and launched their attacks from Pakistan, and the organizers were and remain clients and creations of the ISI. Two months after the Mumbai attacks, and one month after we presented a dossier of evidence linking the attacks to elements in Pakistan, we still await a response from the Pakistani authorities, and prevarication continues.

Sadly, the escalating violence since early 2007 in the form of ceasefire violations, cross-border infiltration and terrorist attacks from Pakistan came after a sustained effort by India and Pakistan to improve relations through the composite dialogue and back channel diplomacy which achieved unprecedented success. That dialogue has now fallen victim to internal developments in Pakistan. For India, a stable Pakistan at peace with itself is a desirable goal. We need a peaceful periphery in our own interest, and will work with all those in Pakistan and the international community who further that goal. Given the fragile and unfinished nature of the polity beside us, there is much that the international community can do to help. For instance, arms sales to Pakistan totally unrelated to the fight against terrorism or extremism are like whiskey to an alcoholic, a drug reinforcing an addiction, skewing the internal political balance, and making the consolidation of democracy more difficult.

The effects of the terrorist infrastructure in Pakistan have been felt in Afghanistan for a long time. For Afghanistan to regain peace, the roots of international terrorism in parts of Pakistan and its local sponsors will have to be eliminated. The Afghan people, like the Pakistani people, have made it clear on every available occasion, in elections or in other ways, that they would rather have nothing to do with terrorists and their political and other sponsors. India is working with Afghanistan to reconstruct the economy, carrying out projects for over US$ 1.2 billion.

Those responsible for the Mumbai attacks follow an ideology that recognizes no borders, and are known to be preparing attacks not only just in the neighborhood but across the world.

Fortunately, developments elsewhere in the subcontinent are more heartening. Nepal is undergoing a transition to multi-party democracy, drafting a Constitution and bringing a former insurgent party into the democratic mainstream. Bangladesh has successfully held free and fair elections proving that the people's desire for good governance is much stronger than extremist and other appeals. And in Sri Lanka the terrorist LTTE seem to be on the brink of losing their conventional military capability and hold on territory. India will work to enable the people of Sri Lanka, and the Tamil community in particular, to return to normal democratic life and economic reconstruction and development.

With our other neighbor, China relations are developing smoothly. China is now India's largest trading partner, and there is increasing congruence in our views on global issues. The quality of our strategic dialogue is improving steadily and difficult issues in the relationship are being addressed, without being allowed to hinder the growth of the bilateral relationship.

Conclusion

I have tried to give you some sense of what motivates and concerns India's foreign policy. As we seek to transform our country, we have always found France a reliable and valued partner. Today when we enter an even more uncertain world, we look to France and Europe, in which France plays such an important role, as partners in our quest.

Thank you.

The Prime Minister's visit is expected to further consolidate these warm and cordial ties and enhance the strategic partnership* between the two countries.

4. Visits at the highest level between the two countries have been taking place at regular intervals. Prime Minister last visited France in September, 2008 for the India-EU Summit in Marseilles on September 29 and the India-France Summit in Paris on September 30, 2008. Earlier in 2008, President Nicolas Sarkozy was the Guest of Honour at our Republic Day celebrations.

* Prime Minister Manmohan Singh's very brief visit to France, suddenly assumed new urgency following the G8's declaration which cast some doubts about countries having "full" nuclear cooperation with India. France, which signed a civil nuclear energy pact with India on September 30 last, is a member of both the G8 and the Nuclear Suppliers' Group (NSG). It may be recalled that already in February during the visit of the French Trade Minister the French nuclear joint Areva signed an MOU with the Nuclear Power Corporation of India for the supply of nuclear reactors with full guarantee of supply of nuclear fuel for their full life cycle. At its meeting in L'Aquila, Italy, earlier in July, the United States persuaded the G-8 to ban the transfer of enrichment and reprocessing (ENR) items to countries that have not signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Some observers did cast some doubt about French intentions in this regard. A question mark was therefore raised in some quarters as the Prime Minister prepared to visit France --how will the new declaration affect the agreement India signed with France last year? Will it remain unaffected by the new commitments on non-proliferation made by the G8 countries or would it undermine France's determination "to extend wide-ranging bilateral cooperation from basic and applied research to full civil nuclear cooperation, including reactors, in nuclear fuel supply, nuclear safety, radiation and environment protection and nuclear fuel cycle management?"

Atomic Energy Commission Chairman Anil Kakodkar, who co-signed the Indo-French agreement in Paris with French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner in September 2008, reacted to the latest reports on a G8 ban: "It would be a matter of concern if the G8 nations insisted on curbing transfer of nuclear enrichment and reprocessing technology and equipment to all the non-signatories of the nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty (NPT), including India", he said.

Media speculated that Pakistan and terrorism will be high on the Prime minister's agenda in Paris. France is keen to play a major role in the "Af-Pak" region and recently announced •300 million in economic assistance and another •12 million for rehabilitation of internally displaced persons during Pakistan President Zardari's visit to Paris on May 15. Pakistan Foreign Minister Shah Mahmood Qureshi had then quoted French President Nicolas Sarkozy as having agreed to a civilian nuclear agreement along the lines of the India-U.S. or Indo-French accords. However the Elysee Palace clarified that the talks had centred on Pakistan's "nuclear safety," but did not unambiguously deny such a possibility. In a communiqué, Mr. Sarkozy said he wished to "honour France's strategic partnership with India" through Dr. Singh's visit. France, he said, fully supported India's bid for a U.N. Security Council seat and had called for an enlargement of the G8 to include India, Brazil, China and other emerging nations.

on India - France review of bilateral relations.

Paris, July 14, 2009.

At a colourful ceremony this morning, Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh was the Guest of Honour at the Bastille Day Parade in Paris, France. An Indian contingent participated in the parade, and was the first contingent to march past the dignitaries on the saluting stand at the Place de la Concorde. In remarks after the parade, the Prime Minister noted the particular honour that this represented, and spoke of the global significance of Bastille Day, and the ideals of the French Revolution of liberty, equality and fraternity. Thereafter the PM attended a working lunch given in his honour by the President of France, Mr. Nicolas Sarkozy. Subsequently, at a brief appearance, President Sarkozy introduced the Prime Minister as Chief Guest to thousands of people gathered at the Elysee Palace National Day reception. The leaders also reviewed bilateral relations between India and France. India and France are strategic partners and bilateral cooperation extends to education, health, defence, space, peaceful uses of nuclear energy and several other fields. Relations have developed rapidly in recent years. In recognition of the closeness and intensity of these ties, an annual leadership summit has now become the norm. Both leaders expressed satisfaction at the steady deepening, broadening and development of the relationship. There is a strong convergence of interest on threats posed by terrorism and measures to counter it. The leaders agreed to further strengthen cooperation in the area. They also expressed satisfaction at the implementation of the civil nuclear energy and space cooperation and wide ranging defence cooperation. The Prime Minister reiterated the invitation to President Sarkozy to visit India. The President accepted the invitation and indicated that he hopes to visit India soon. (The Prime Minister left Paris for the NAM Summit in Sharm al Shaikh in Egypt later that day.)

653. Statement of the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to the media after the Parade in Paris on July 14.

Paris, July 14, 2009.

I am delighted to be present today at the National Day celebrations of France. The magnificent parade we have witnessed dramatises the strength and dynamism of this great nation. It was an honour for India to have a contingent representing all three services of our armed forces lead the parade. This reflects the friendship and strategic partnership between our two countries and the cordial ties between our armed forces. July 14 is a date important not only for France. The French Revolution marked a defining moment in world history when the aspirations of the common man began to acquire a central place in political and social life. The ideals of the French Revolution – liberty, equality and fraternity – helped to inspire our freedom struggle and guided the founding fathers of the Indian Constitution. I am grateful to President Sarkozy for giving India a place of honour on this great occasion. India-France relations and cooperation are growing in strength and vitality in all fields. We have a strategic partnership and have built vibrant political ties, with collaboration in energy, space research, defence, industry and commerce, science and technology, education, culture and tourism. It is my ardent wish that the partnership between our two democracies is further strengthened and deepened in the years to come. This will benefit the people of both our countries.

POLAND*656. Media Briefing by Secretary (West), Ministry of External Affairs Nalin Surie on the visit of President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil to Spain and Poland.*New Delhi, April 17, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good evening and a very warm welcome to all of you. As you know, Hon'ble Rashtrapati is going on a State visit to Spain and then to Poland. Secretary (West) Mr. Nalin Surie is here to brief you about the President's visit. He will be making an opening statement and, thereafter, he will be very happy to take some questions. To Secretary (West)'s right, we have Officer on Special Duty for Public Relations from President's Secretariat Ms Archana Dutta.

Sir, the floor is yours.

Secretary (West) (Shri Nalin Surie): Thank you Vishnu, and thank you all for coming this afternoon. Rashrapati will pay a State Visit to Spain and Poland from 20-27 April, 2009. Her first stop will be in Spain and thereafter Poland, from where she will return directly to New Delhi. This is the first ever State Visit by the President of India to Spain and the fourth State Visit by an Indian President to Poland. Rashtrapati would be accompanied by her husband, Dr. Devisingh Ramsingh Shekhawat. Other members include Hon'ble Dr. Ashwani Kumar, Minister of State, Department of Industrial Policy & Promotion, three Members of Parliament (Shri Shreegopal Vyas, Rajya Sabha and Smt. C.S. Sujatha and Smt. Ingrid Mcleod, both of the Lok Sabha) and an official delegation. A combined business team comprising members of CII, FICCI and ASSOCHAM and media persons will also be part of the Hon'ble President's delegation. Both in Madrid and Warsaw, Rashtrapati will be received with full State honours. In Madrid, Their Majesties the King and Queen of Spain and in Poland, the President of Poland and Mrs. Kaczynska will host banquets in her honour. In both countries, in addition to discussions with her counterparts, Rashtrapati will hold discussions with the respective Prime Ministers. We expect to sign two-three agreements each with both countries. These are agreements that would help further diversify the already close relations that exist between India and Spain & Poland. India's relations with both these countries are multifaceted. Our effort is to deepen and diversify these. Spain joined the European Union in 1984. It is the eighth largest economy in the world and has emerged since the mid 1970s as an effective democracy. It is our sixth largest export market in the EU. We see great potential for expanding our trade and investment links with her. It also has close interaction with the countries of Latin America, a region of the world with which our ties are also expanding rapidly. Poland joined the European Union in 2004 and is also a revived and flourishing democracy. We have a history of close relations with it. There is a thriving school of Indology in cities such as Krakow and Warsaw and our trade and economic interaction is growing well. In both countries, Rashtrapatiji will address meetings between our business delegation and business delegations from Spain & Poland. She will also address members of the Indian community in these two countries. We see further opportunities for collaboration between India on the one hand and Spain & Poland on the other in the fields of trade, investment, S&T, culture, defence, renewable energy, health and the fight against terrorism. You would recall that both Spain and Poland were supportive of India's quest for civil nuclear energy. We also cooperate well in multilateral organizations. Both Spain and Poland are important members of the European Union with whom we have a Strategic Partnership, a comprehensive Joint Action Plan and annual Summit meetings. Both countries are instrumental in helping us further strengthen the growing partnership between India and the European Union. Spain will hold the EU Presidency in the first half of 2010 at which time we will hold the Troika meeting at Ministerial level. Rashtrapatiji's visit to Spain and Poland is not only a signal of the importance that we attach to our relations with these two countries but also with the European Union. It is also reflective of our desire to sustain our high level bilateral engagement with Europe and to diversify our ties into new areas. There is much that we have to do together to jointly address major international issues such as terrorism, the current global financial and economic crisis etc.

Thank you. I will be happy to take questions.

Question: Will there be any agreement on terrorism with Spain and Poland?

Secretary (West): We will not have any agreement on terrorism with either Spain or Poland but we already have close cooperation with these countries on fighting terrorism. As you know, we have a Joint Working Group on Terrorism with the European Union plus with some individual countries of the European Union. Both countries had condemned the Mumbai terror attacks in unambiguous terms.

Question: There are reports indicating Al-Qaeda related bases in Spain. Spain itself has been a victim of Al-Qaeda led attack. So, there is considerable scope for enhancing counter-terror cooperation. Apart from this visit, what are we looking at in terms of long-term counter-terror cooperation? Is there a specific mechanism?

Secretary (West): When the Deputy Prime Minister of Spain was here earlier in the year we had discussions on this issue, which are being pursued. You are absolutely right. There are reports that Al-Qaeda is operating out of Spain. We are interested in working with Spain in the fight against terrorism, and they are interested in working with us on this subject. It is a process which is under way.

Question: We may have good trade with Spain but what about our trade with Poland? What is the two-way trade between the two countries?

Secretary (West): It was 1.2 billion dollars last year. But the potential is much higher. Poland is an economy which is doing extremely well. It is one of the new members of the European Union which is doing very well.

Question: What are the other common factors in which you think India and Poland can work jointly, maybe like fighting terrorism? In the European Union, Poland happens to be one of the recently joined members. What do you think is the potential between India and Poland? I remember that Mr. Shankar Dayal Sharma had visited Poland long time back.

Secretary (West): It was in October, 1996.

Question: Yes. After that I think there has not been any high-level visits between the two countries.

Secretary (West): Actually President Kaczynski came here in 1998 January. Their Prime Minister was here in 2003. There have been a lot of Ministerial visits on both sides. From our side there has not been a high-level visit for a while. That is why this President's visit is so important both to Spain and Poland. It fills in a vacuum which had begun to sort of come up, not because there is any effort on our part to reduce the importance of these countries. Our relations with both are extremely important. As a former Ambassador to Poland I can tell you we have a lot to do with Poland. We had a lot to do in the pre-democratic times and we have a lot to do now. But Poland has been focusing for many years since it became a democracy again on its internal sort of processes of reform, joining NATO, joining the European Union, and now again looking outwards. So, I think we have potential there. But with Spain, as you said, we already have a very large trade volume. It is over 4.5 billion dollars.

Question: You said we will be signing two-three agreements. In what are the areas and what kinds of agreements will they be? Can you throw some more light on that?

Secretary (West): I have done this with you before. I do not want to name the agreements yet because there are approvals which are still under way.

Question: Can you tell us at least the sectors?

Secretary (West): These will be sectoral agreements because with both countries the basic agreements are already in place. These are old relationships: these are not new relationships. The President's visit is intended to underline the importance we attach to these two countries.

Question: How large is the Indian community in Spain and Poland?

Secretary (West): The community in Spain is larger, about 20,000 to 30,000. In Poland it is much smaller. It should be under a thousand. I do not have a figure to give you off hand but I will give it to you later.

Question: You said there is a Joint Working Group on terrorism.

Secretary (West): Yes, with the European Union

Question: In view of 26/11 Mumbai attack, is there any further effort with these countries?

Secretary (West): As you know, we have Joint Working Groups also with countries like Germany, France, the UK, etc. A lot of bilateral cooperation is taking place post-26/11 with these countries and with the European Union as a whole. The whole world has been very concerned about what happened in Mumbai and we are getting cooperation across all continents.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much for coming.

657. Statement by President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil to the media on her departure for a state visit to Poland and Spain.

New Delhi, April 20, 2009.

I am delighted to be visiting Spain and Poland. Both are countries with which India has close relations, which we wish to further deepen and strengthen.

My visit will be the first State Visit by an Indian President to Spain and the fourth by an Indian President to Poland. The last visit to Warsaw was by late Dr. Shanker Dayal Sharma ji in October 1996.

Our relations with both Spain and Poland are multi-sectoral and we have useful exchanges in trade matters, investment, Science and Technology, tourism, culture, defence and renewable energy. Our collaboration with both these countries, in multilateral fora is of long standing. Both these countries were supportive of India's quest for civil nuclear energy.

India shares with Spain and Poland common values and principles such as plural democracy, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, tolerance, the determination to fight terrorism and to strengthen democratic values. I will be visiting the Parliaments of both Spain and Poland.

Spain has become an important trade partner. Last year our bilateral trade touched 4.5 billion US Dollars. There are, however, concrete opportunities for much more trade and investment, especially in this time of global financial and economic difficulty since we have clear complementarities that can be exploited. I see considerable potential in our working together with Spain in areas such as, agriculture, renewable energy -Spain is a leading power in wind and solar energy; tourism, automobiles, IT, infrastructure and Science and Technology.

Poland is a country with which we also have civilizational links. It has a long history of the study of Indology, and Sanskrit was taught in Krakow as early as 1893. Schools of Indology are flourishing in Krakow and Warsaw. Our trade exchanges have begun to grow and we exceeded 1 billion US Dollars in bilateral trade last year. Indian companies are showing growing interest in Poland in areas such as energy, health, Information Communication Technology and chemicals.

There is a presence of the Indian community in both Spain and Poland and during my visit, I will be interacting with them.

A composite business delegation comprising members of CII, FICCI and ASSOCHAM is accompanying me. It is my expectation that in their contacts with their counterparts in Spain and Poland they will be able to identify and concretize opportunities for doing business together in their respective areas of strength. I will address joint meetings between our businessmen with their Spanish and Polish counterparts in Madrid and Warsaw respectively.

My visits to Spain and Poland will also help consolidate our rapidly developing relations with Europe and the European Union. The European Union is a Strategic Partner of India and we are in the process of implementing a comprehensive Joint Action Plan.

Both Spain and Poland were forthright in their condemnation of the Mumbai terrorist attacks in November last year. We greatly appreciate that both these countries were forthcoming in expressing strong support in the global fight against terrorism. I am looking forward to my visit and discussions, and am confident that following this, we will begin a new phase in strengthening our partnership with these two important European countries, along with whom we face common challenges and the common determination, to strengthen the forces of peace, security and development.

658. Statement to the press by President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil.

Warsaw, April 24, 2009.

I am very pleased to be in this historic city of Warsaw among the friendly people of the Republic of Poland. Yesterday on my arrival, my first engagement was a visit to the Warsaw Uprising Museum, where I paid tributes to the patriotism and bravery of the Polish people. There has been a longstanding tradition of regular contacts at the highest political level between our two countries. My visit is a part of this tradition and seeks to boost relations. We also look forward to receiving His Excellency President Kaczynski and Prime Minister Donald Tusk in India on mutually convenient dates.

I wish to convey my sincere thanks to President the Government and people of Poland for the hearty welcome accorded to me and my delegation, reflecting the longstanding and abiding friendship between our two countries.

We have just concluded discussions with the President and his colleagues over the whole gamut of our expanding partnership. We agreed to cooperate in areas of Information Technology, biotechnology, pharmaceuticals, healthcare, tourism and the ongoing areas of defence, mining, education and culture among others.

While we took note of the healthy growth in our bilateral trade despite the current global economic downturn, we agreed that it is well under its full potential. Both sides have, therefore, agreed to look at ways of enhancing bilateral investments, trade and economic cooperation.

We have signed two agreements dealing with Tourism and Health and Medicine, which will open new areas of cooperation in these sectors. They also provide a sound framework for expanding people-to-people level contacts between our two countries.

I am happy to inform you that a business and industry delegation is accompanying me and parallel meetings are taking place to explore new avenues of trade and investments between our two countries. I will be addressing the business meet over lunch this afternoon.

I specifically note the interest of the Indo-Polish Parliamentary Group in promoting parliamentary exchanges. We fully reciprocate this and it will be our effort to further strengthen Parliamentary exchanges once our new Parliament is constituted after our General Elections conclude in May this year.

The India-Poland partnership has been built on mutual respect and our two countries have strong foundations of democracy and enterprise. We appreciate Poland's achievements in recent years, especially after it joined the European Union. India has also enjoyed a sustained partnership with the EU over several decades, that was upgraded to strategic level in 2004.

India and Poland cooperate closely in the United Nations and other international fora. We both take part in UN peace missions and collaborate on issues of international concern like climate change and global warming, negotiations in WTO and fight against terrorism.

I expressed to the President my Government's gratitude to Poland for its support for the India-specific waiver at the NSG negotiations in September last year. Mr. President, this would help India harness civil nuclear technology for meeting the mounting energy demand for its development process.

We renewed our commitment and determination to fight terrorism. India is involved in the reconstruction process in Afghanistan and both our countries have had to suffer loss of lives at the hands of the Taliban and Al Qaida. India has been a victim of ongoing terrorist attacks for more than two decades from across the border. The Mumbai terror attacks last November were a horrific example of such wanton acts of terrorism. I wish to thank Poland for its message of condolences and support. I would also like to take this opportunity to condole the gruesome murder of a Polish engineer by the Taliban in Pakistan in February 2009.

I have invited His Excellency President Lech Kaczynski and Mrs. Maria Kaczynska to visit India at a mutually convenient date. We are also looking forward to the visit of Prime Minister Donald Tusk.

My delegation and I will be visiting Krakow, the cultural capital of Poland, tomorrow and we return to India the following day.

I once again express my gratitude for the wonderful hospitality extended to us and would like to take this opportunity to convey greetings and best wishes from the people of India to the people of Poland.

Thank You.

659. Speech of President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Business luncheon meeting hosted by the leaders of the business and industry of Poland.

Warsaw, April 24, 2009.

I am delighted to address this distinguished joint gathering of leaders of business and industry from Poland and India. Poland has made remarkable progress since its shift to a market economy in 1991 and particularly so after joining the European Union in May 2004. The contribution of business leaders in shaping the national development agenda is well known. I am sure all of you present here have had a role to play in the success story of India and Poland's development.

The Agreement on Economic Cooperation between India and Poland was signed in Warsaw on 19 May 2006. The Joint Commission for Economic Cooperation under this Agreement is already operational and held its first meeting in New Delhi in May 2008. Business establishments on both sides would need to build on existing cooperation and mechanisms to identify areas of trade, investment and economic cooperation to move the Indo-Polish partnership forward. Polish companies have established a good presence in the Indian market. A very large number of Indian companies are also present in Poland.

Our bilateral trade has grown almost seven times over the last ten years and crossed the 1 billion dollar mark last year. But when we compare our bilateral trade to Poland's global trade of over US$ 400 billion in 2008, it is not even 0.4 percent of the total. I would, therefore, like to encourage business and industry leaders on both sides to suggest ways and means of realizing the full potential. However, it is a matter of satisfaction, that despite both countries being affected by the current global economic downturn, bilateral trade in 2008 maintained a healthy growth of nearly 50 percent over 2007. Trade statistics presented to me show that Polish exports to India grew by an impressive 84 percent while Indian exports to Poland grew by nearly 40 percent. I do hope that the mutual interactions at your Business Forum today will provide further impetus to these positive trends. We in India are committed to encourage further growth and diversification of our global trade, investment and economic cooperation with Poland.

I see a great future for Indo-Polish economic cooperation in the knowledge based industries, bio-technology, pharmaceuticals, automobiles and auto components, infrastructure, health tourism, higher education, R&D joint projects, among others. Our cooperation in Research and Development and joint ventures in Mining, Energy and Power generation is of mutual advantage to both countries.

The tremendous growth of India's large domestic market is well known. India's strong middle class, which is already larger than the population of the United States and may equal the entire population of the European Union in the not too distant future, would continue to grow and attract demand for capital and consumer goods alike.

India is now a production base and an outsourcing hub for several products ranging from agricultural goods to automobile components to engineering, design and high-end IT enabled solutions and services. Indian firms are now part of global processing chains. Our telecommunication, IT, bio-technology and pharmaceutical sectors are growing at par with the best in the developed world.

I am happy to inform you that the two Agreements signed today are related to Tourism and Health and Medicine. Both are promising areas for business development in both India and Poland. India has vast tourism potential. Poland also has good potential in the tourism sector and I understand that many health tourism resorts in Poland are up for privatization. The Indian systems of Yoga and Ayurveda, which are based on proven medical sciences, have now caught the imagination of the whole world. Besides these traditional disciplines, we also now pride ourselves with best super-speciality healthcare facilities in the world at highly affordable prices. Therefore, the two agreements we have signed today should go a long way in forging partnerships in both sectors between interested parties on the two sides.

Poland has high standards in University education, higher research and new technology development. India is also recognized internationally for its IITs, IIMs and IIITs. We are investing heavily in the education sector. We have made good progress in space sciences and civil nuclear energy development. Both our countries can benefit from each others' strengths in these fields.

Friends, in conclusion, I would like to invite the leaders of Polish business and industry to avail themselves of the opportunities in India and tap the vast potential that exists to multiply manifold the current level of our trade and economic relations. I would like to encourage my own compatriots also to avail themselves of all the advantages this friendly country offers. With the cooperative efforts of business leaders from the two nations, both countries will be able to leverage the core competencies of the two sides for the common good of all.

I wish you all success in your deliberations. My best wishes.

Thank you.

660. Speech by President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the banquet hosted in her honour by the Polish President Lech Kaczynski.

Warsaw, April 24, 2009.

Your Excellency President Lech Kaczynski,

Your Excellency Madame Maria Kaczynska,

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

May I first of all say how happy my delegation and I are to be in Poland, a country with which we have traditional ties of friendship and cooperation which we value very much.

I am deeply touched by the friendly welcome extended to us and the sentiments of goodwill that have been expressed, both towards me personally and my country.

My husband, I and members of my delegation also greatly appreciate the gracious hospitality that has been extended to us.

Since the time of our arrival in Warsaw, the natural beauty of your city, the meandering Vistula River, the historical buildings, green parks and squares have attracted my attention.

Mr. President,

India is an old civilization. Our people are steeped in a culture and ethos which has valued and promoted tolerance, diversity, pluralism, compassion and discussion and debate for more than three millennia. The Indian Constitution reflects these deeply ingrained values of the Indian people. India has been home to many cultures and religions of the world. We seek to build a peaceful and prosperous world.

Relations between India and Poland have traditionally been close and cordial. It is gratifying that leaders of India's freedom movement, Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Nehru and Poet Laureate Rabindra Nath Tagore and others, notably the Maharaja of Jamnagar also played a role in nurturing this friendship. Today, our two countries have mutual complementarities across a broad spectrum that includes sectors such as mining, energy, IT, pharmaceuticals, Science and Technology, education, culture among others.

Our bilateral trade could benefit from greater focus on mutual comparative advantages. I do hope that the accompanying business delegation from India has managed to network with their Polish counterparts so that the full potential of the trade and economic relations between the two countries is realized.

Our two countries have shared civilizational bonds for centuries. The Polish language also has some connectivity with Sanskrit, an ancient Indian language. There is thus a very useful foundation to enable us to enhance our cultural and people-to-people contacts. More and more Indians wish to visit Poland. We need to enhance academic and student exchanges. There should also be more media cooperation and exchanges of films and television programmes.

India and Poland share common values of freedom, human rights and democracy. International terrorism poses a major threat to these values and to international peace and security. We need to confront the menace of terrorism unitedly. We deeply appreciate in this context, Poland's unreserved condemnation of the terrorist attacks in Mumbai last November.

Both India and Poland are committed to the principles enshrined in the UN Charter. We believe that there is an urgent need to reform the United Nations to make it more compatible with contemporary realities. Our two countries cooperate well in the international fora. We greatly appreciate Poland's support for India's candidature for a permanent seat on an expanded UN Security Council. I should also like to thank your Government for Poland's support for an unconditional India-specific waiver by the NSG last September.

As I speak here today, in my country, the largest democracy in the world, the electoral process to constitute the new Parliament is underway. This is, indeed, a gigantic exercise involving an electorate of over 714 million people. Our robust democracy gives every Indian the right to have a say in the kind of Government they want to have to run their affairs.

Before I end, I would like to once again convey my gratitude for the warm hospitality that has been extended to me and my delegation. I can assure you, Mr. President, that we will carry many happy memories of our visit to your beautiful country.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

May I now request you to join me in raising a toast:-

- to the good health and happiness of President Lech Kaczynski and Madame Maria Kaczynski;
- to progress and prosperity of our two friendly people; and
- to the continuing friendship and growing co-operation between India and Poland.

661. Statement of President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil on her way back to New Delhi after completing her State visits to Spain and Poland.

On Board Special Aircraft, April 26, 2009.

We are returning to India at the conclusion of my State Visits to Spain and Poland. We have traveled together and you will agree that our journey has been very meaningful and productive.

I said to you when we left New Delhi at the beginning of this journey that my visit to these two countries was intended to consolidate our rapidly developing relations with Europe and the European Union. These are countries with whom we face common challenges and a common determination to strengthen the forces of peace, security and development. It was our intention to focus on this occasion on countries like Spain and Poland which we believe are not only important countries in Europe but also those which hold great opportunity for the further development of friendship and cooperation across the board.

I am particularly happy that our objectives have been fulfilled. We found, both in Spain and Poland, a common resonance and desire to more effectively and meaningfully cooperate in matters pertaining to trade, investment, development of infrastructure, renewable energy, energy, pharmaceuticals, agriculture, the auto sector, defence, tourism, IT, culture and education.

I also had a detailed exchange of views with the leadership both in Spain and Poland on the situation in our respective regions and agreed to strengthen our already useful cooperation in multilateral organizations, especially the United Nations. The global financial crisis was another factor that brought home to all of us that this is the right opportunity for us to leverage each others' complementarities and synergies.

The composite team of businessmen that accompanied me, I understand, had useful and productive discussions with their counterparts in Spain and Poland that are expected to lead to concrete business. What is particularly important is that in both countries, the governments have promised to lend strong support to the further development of the trade and economic partnerships. In my discussions, I stressed the need to ensure that our business people, tourists and other visitors do not face avoidable hurdles for entry into Spain and Poland.

I am happy that in both Madrid and Warsaw, I was assured that these two countries stand firmly with India in our long-standing fight against terrorism. Both countries strongly condemned the Mumbai terrorist attacks of last November and have shown solidarity in our time of need. I expect that our cooperation with them on this issue will strengthen in the months ahead.

I am also pleased that we have received support from both the countries I have visited for strengthening the India-EU strategic partnership. We attach importance to our relations with the European Union which represents, among other things, growing space for democracy in the world.

In both Madrid and Warsaw I was delighted to meet with the members of the Indian community. Our Diaspora represents an important and growing asset which we respect.

I had the pleasure of extending invitations to their Majesties the King and Queen of Spain, the President of Poland and the Prime Ministers of Spain and Poland to visit India. These invitations have been accepted and mutually convenient dates will be agreed for their visits to India after the new government has assumed office. These visits will enable us to sustain the focus on further development of relations with these two important European countries.

I return home fully satisfied. I also now have a much better impression and understanding of the cultural dimension of our relations with Spain and Poland; a dimension which needs to be further developed.

I would also like to thank all of you, members of the Indian media for being good traveling companions. I hope you enjoyed the visit as much as I did.

RUSSIAN FEDERATION*662. Press Release issued by the Department of Atomic Energy on signing a contract with a Russian company for the long-term supply of natural uranium pellets.*Mumbai, February 11, 2009.

The Department of Atomic Energy and TVEL, a Joint Stock Company of the Russian Federation have signed a contract today for the long term supply of 2000 ton of natural uranium pellets for India's Pressurised Heavy Water Reactors and another contract for about 60 Ton Low Enriched Uranium (LEU) pellets for Boiling Water Reactor units at Tarapur being operated by Nuclear Power Corporation of India Limited (NPCIL). For the two BWRs at Tarapur, Russia had earlier supplied fuel pellets on two occasions, and the present supply is a repeat of earlier contracts.

The president of TVEL with a team of high officials of his company attended the signing ceremony at the head office of the Department of Atomic Energy in Mumbai. The Directorate of Purchase and Stores of the Department of Atomic Energy signed the contract from the Indian side. Imported natural Uranium from Russia will be used in the domestic pressurized heavy water reactors under IAEA safeguards.

This is a major and second agreement, India has signed for the supply of fuel since the changes in NSG guidelines on September 6, 2008 to facilitate international civil nuclear trade with India. Earlier an agreement was signed with AREVA of France for the supply of 300 tons of uranium.

TVEL, a large Russian enterprise deals with nuclear fuel fabrication and supply. It supplies fuel to Russian and many other nuclear reactors in the world. TVEL is also the supplier for nuclear fuel assemblies for Kudankulam Nuclear Power Project (2 X 1000 MWe) being set up in collaboration with Russian Federation at Kudankulam, Tamilnadu. TVEL has already supplied in May 2008, the fuel required for initial years of operation for these reactors.

NPCIL is unique in having acquired, under one roof, comprehensive capability in all facets of nuclear technology namely – site selection, design, construction, commissioning, operation, maintenance and life extension of nuclear power plants

NPCIL has at present 17 Nuclear Power Reactors of 4120 MWe in operation and 5 Nuclear Power Reactors of 2660 MWe under construction. NPCIL has plans for significant capacity addition including nuclear reactors to be set up in technical cooperation with various countries.

663. Statement by President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil to the media at Kremlin Palace.

Moscow, September 3, 2009.

It gives me great pleasure to be here in Moscow at the invitation of President H.E. Mr. Dmitry Anatolievich Medvedev. I thank President Medvedev and the people of Russia for giving me the honour of being their guest.

My talks in the Kremlin with the President of the Russian Federation were highly fruitful and held in a frank and friendly atmosphere in keeping with the Strategic Partnership between the two countries. The time-tested relationship between India and the Russian Federation has been marked by continuity, trust and mutual understanding.

We reviewed ongoing bilateral cooperation between India and the Russian Federation and exchanged views on ways and means to further strengthen India-Russia bilateral cooperation in the future. We also exchanged views on regional and international issues of importance to our two countries.

We noted with satisfaction the level of contacts between the political leadership of the two countries including the established practice of holding annual meetings at the Summit level as well as meetings and exchanges at Ministerial and other levels. India and the Russian Federation are determined to continue and further expand the excellent political contacts between the two countries. We attach great significance to the establishment of regular inter-parliamentary exchanges and institutionalized mechanisms of contact between the executive and judicial bodies of India and the Russian Federation. We look forward to the further intensification of these contacts.

We noted that there are ample opportunities for further expansion of relations, especially in the fields of space, energy including hydrocarbons and peaceful uses of nuclear energy, high technologies and military-technical cooperation.

We expressed satisfaction with ongoing efforts to achieve the bilateral trade target of US$ 10 billion by 2010 that has been agreed to by both sides. We also agreed that given the potential for economic cooperation that exists between the two countries, existing levels of bilateral economic cooperation remain much below their potential. The private sectors in both countries need to take a lead on this issue.

I am particularly pleased with the fact that my visit coincides with the celebrations of The Year of India in Russia. President Medvedev and I would be participating in a Gala Concert showcasing the colorful mosaic of Indian culture during my stay in Moscow.

I am looking forward to my meetings with the Prime Minister of the Russian Federation, His Excellency Mr. Vladimir Vladimirovich Putin and also with the Chairman of the Federation Council and the Chairman of the State Duma. In the second-leg of my visit to the beautiful city of St. Petersburg on 5th and 6th September, I would be meeting the President's Plenipotentiary Representative to the North Western Region of Russia as well as visiting the world famous Museum, the State Hermitage, and Peterhof.

The bonds between India and the Russian Federation are special and enduring and founded on civilizational and historical ties between the two countries. My visit to Russia reaffirms the priority that India and the Russian Federation accord to the Strategic Partnership between the two countries.

Thank you.

664. Speech of President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Banquet hosted in her honour by the President of the Russian Federation Dmitry Medvedev.

Moscow, September 3, 2009.

Excellency President of the Russian Federation,

Excellencies,

Distinguished Guests,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Mr. President,

Thank you for your warm and affectionate words of welcome. I appreciate your kind words on India and India-Russia bilateral relations. Let me also convey my gratitude at the generous hospitality that has been extended by our Russian friends to me and my delegation. I have been immensely impressed by whatever I have seen and observed so far. It is, indeed, admirable how Russia has been able to harmonize modernity with tradition, prosperity with connectedness to the roots of its culture and advanced technology with respect for traditional values. Like Russia, India is a pluralistic democracy possessing ethnic, cultural, religious, regional and linguistic diversity. Like Russia, India too is embracing change while not losing sight of her ethos, civilizational principles and values. The unique resonance in our relations has been sustained over time by the cementing force of our common interests, shared vision and interaction as two vibrant civilizations.

India and Russia have a firm sense of conviction and belief in each other's strength and stability. As two large and influential democracies, India and Russia have the onerous responsibility of playing a significant global role in promoting democratic values, building a unified, just and democratic world order. We should also work together for a comprehensive system of collective security based on respect for rule of law and international norms, reciprocal trust, mutual benefit, equality and cooperation as well as for a future international order based on multi-polarity. Both countries are faced with similar challenges from the divisive forces of extremism and international terrorism. It is satisfying to note that while our challenges are similar, we also share common views and similar approaches.

Mr. President,

This is my first visit to Russia. However, no Indian, especially an Indian of my generation, is a stranger to Russia. We have long been familiar with the slogan "Hindi-Rusi bhai bhai", made popular by Prime Minister Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and First Secretary Nikita Khrushchev. And indeed, our friendship has stood the test of time, as our two countries have come to each other's aid in times of difficulty.

The tradition of trust and friendship has been taken to new levels in recent years. Our Strategic Partnership has seen unprecedented levels of cooperation in space, defence, nuclear technology and other hi-tech areas. Recent years have also seen what are called multi-vector foreign policies being pursued by many countries, including India and Russia. However, I can assure our Russian partners that, even as we improve our relations with other countries it will not be to the detriment of our tried and tested friendship.

Mr. President,

Your successful visit to India in December last year provided the opportunity to review all aspects of bilateral cooperation between our countries. Decisions taken and agreements reached during your visit are being satisfactorily implemented. Joint work is being carried out on the large number of documents signed during your visit. Our traditionally strong bilateral relations have rested on foundations of political, defence and economic exchanges which are of a substantial nature. Besides strategic areas such as energy, space and defence, mutual investments in industries, high-technology, cooperation in Information Technology, banking, finance, management and other service sectors, are some areas that offer plenty of scope. Culture and tourism promote economic cooperation, goodwill and people-to-people contacts between nations. In this context, contributions of the 'Year of Russia' in India and the 'Year of India' in Russia are significant.

Mr. President and Dear Friends,

Let us hope that our cooperation will become a landmark in the history of our bilateral relations. I am confident that we will continue to work together and take our traditional friendship to new heights.

Ladies and Gentlemen, may I request you to join me in raising a toast to:

- the health and well being of His Excellency the President of the Russian Federation;
- the long-standing traditions of close and continuing friendship and cooperation between India and Russia; and
- the prosperity, success and happiness of the friendly people of Russia.

Thank you.

666. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Defence on the 9th meeting of the India-Russia Inter-Governmental Commission on Military Technical Cooperation.

New Delhi, October 15, 2009.

Two major agreements to boost Defence Cooperation between India and Russia are likely to be signed during the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh's visit to Moscow later this year. Decks for the signing of the two agreements were cleared today during the ongoing visit of Defence Minister Shri AK Antony to Moscow. The first agreement will be on extending the Military Technical Cooperation for ten years from 2011 to 2020 and the second relates to After- Sales Product Support for Defence Equipment of Russian origin.

The outlines for the two agreements were hammered out during the 9th Meeting of the India-Russia Inter-Governmental Commission on Military Technical Cooperation (IRIGC-MTC) which concluded in Moscow today. The two-day meeting was presided over by Shri Antony and his Russian counterpart Mr. Anatoly Serdyukov.

The meeting reviewed the status of various ongoing bilateral defence cooperation projects. The Commission also reviewed the status of two major projects for joint design and development of the Fifth Generation Fighter Aircraft (FGFA) and the Multi-Role Transport Aircraft (MRTA). Both the Defence Ministers expressed the hope that the recent rounds of consultations between technical experts on both sides would result in greater progress in these projects. The Russian side assured of continuing technical support and technology transfer in accordance with the agreed schedules for the indigenous production of T-90-S tanks and SU-30MKI fighter jets in India. Shri Antony stressed the need to ensure that there were no slippages in these projects.

On the sale of the aircraft carrier Admiral Gorshkov, both sides agreed that the cost negotiations would continue to find a mutually acceptable solution. Issues relating to defence supplies in a number of other projects were also reviewed in detail by the Commission. The Russian side responded positively to India's request to expedite proposals for setting up facilities for modernisation, repair and overhaul of military aircraft including MiG-29-Upgrade in India.

In his opening remarks to the meeting yesterday, Shri Antony said India and Russia have an enduring strategic partnership and defence ties. He described Russia as a time tested and dependable friend of India. Shri Antony emphasized that the Indian Government was determined to strengthen the bond in all areas of bilateral relations. He noted that over the years defence relations between India and Russia have evolved from a simple buyer-seller relationship to a broadbased partnership where both countries are involved in joint design, development and production of defence equipment. Taking note of the structured mechanisms for defence interactions with Russia, Shri Antony said that Russia is the only country with which India has such a well established multi-tiered mechanism which has contributed to the strengthening of bilateral ties.

The Indian delegation to the two-day IRIGC-MTC meeting included the Defence Secretary Shri Pradeep Kumar, Secretary (Defence Production) Shri Raj Kumar Singh and other senior officials of the Ministry of Defence and the Armed Forces.

669. Interview of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to the Russian media.

New Delhi, December 4, 2009.

Question: For many decades, Russia and India have enjoyed friendly and strong relations while the whole world has witnessed drastic changes. Do you feel that there is the need for adjustment in international relations in order to meet the challenges of modern times? And what could be the role of Indo-Russian relationship in this context?

Prime Minister The India Russia bilateral relationship has been growing from strength to strength ever since we first established diplomatic relations in 1947. We view our relationship with Russia as an enduring friendship that has stood the test of time. Our relations with Russia enjoy a strong national consensus in India. The people of India can never forget the help and support we have received from Russia in difficult moments of our history.

India, like Russia, has sought to respond to the changes in the international system through different ways, including by broadening our engagement with the rest of the world. Our objective in India is to create an external environment that is conducive to meeting the developmental aspirations of our people, and to address the key challenges of our times - the global economic and financial crisis, energy security and climate change, terrorism, and reform of global institutions of governance. We are however clear that our growing engagement with the rest of the world cannot be at the cost of our time tested ties with Russia. Russia is an important factor of peace, stability and security in the world.

An effective response to the regional and global challenges we face demands that both India and Russia further intensify their Strategic Partnership. As two large pluralistic democracies undergoing rapid economic transformation, we share many common interests and have similar viewpoints on global issues. During my visit to Russia I propose to discuss with President Medvedev the steps we can take to raise our Strategic Partnership to the next level.

Question: Our countries are strategic partners with an already broad range of cooperation lines. Which new spheres, to your mind, should be explored from the point of view of cooperation opportunities? What are the priorities of our relationship for the nearest future that you are going to discuss with the Russian leaders?

Prime Minister: The India-Russia Annual Summit is the principal vehicle to advance our Strategic Partnership. Every such Summit has contributed to this process. It involves discussions on a broad range of subjects from bilateral cooperation to collaboration in international fora and discussions on global issues of common concern.

In my talks with President Medvedev and Prime Minister Putin, I hope to have an indepth discussion on all aspects of our relations. For several years now trade and investment ties between India and Russia have lagged behind. The trade target of US$ 10 billion that we are likely to achieve in 2010 is well below our potential, given the size of the Indian and Russian economies. We need to widen our trade basket, and promote greater investments in each other's countries. Pharmaceuticals, Information Technology and diamonds can become areas of future growth.

During the recent meeting of our Inter-Governmental Commission in Moscow, the energy sector was identified as a thrust area of cooperation. We would in particular like to see further progress in the hydrocarbon sector, which has been under discussion for sometime. Indian companies have developed world-class capabilities and can work with their Russian counterparts in both upstream and downstream sectors. India's energy needs are vast, and this area offers huge potential for win-win cooperation.

India and Russia have a history of close collaboration in the area of civil nuclear cooperation. New opportunities in this sector are opening up, and we would like to see greater Russian participation in our nuclear energy expansion programme. We must revitalize our cooperation in the cutting edges of science and technology, biotechnology, nanotechnology, and transfer of high technologies. Defence cooperation is a key pillar of our relations. We would like to strengthen it, and move towards joint design, research, development and manufacture.

We will also be discussing regional and global issues, particularly the situation in Afghanistan, terrorism, climate change and measures to revive the global economy.

Question: Your visit to Russia will coincide with the closure of the Year of India in Russia, which gave many Russians a chance to learn more about the rich Indian cultural heritage. What do you think about the role of culture as well as people to people contacts in general in building relations between our two countries?

Prime Minister: The Year of India in Russia this year, and the Year of Russia in India last year provided the people of both countries an opportunity to better understand modern India and modern Russia.

India and Russia enjoyed a strong tradition of people-to-people exchanges until the late 1980s. Russian thinkers, writers, painters, and artists have had a profound effect on India, just as our scholars and artists have had on Russia. We are keen to revive this tradition by promoting greater number of exchanges between our parliamentarians, media personnel, academics and scholars. We must in particular focus on promoting exchanges between our youth, who need to have much greater exposure to the achievements of each other's countries. In my view, this is extremely important because both our countries are undergoing rapid transformation, and we should not be bound by old stereotypes.

Question: India actively participates in such formats as RIC (Russia-India-China), BRIC (Brazil-Russia-India-China), G20 etc. what is the significance of such multilateral mechanisms in the new global architecture?

Prime Minister: Such multilateral groupings represent the growing interdependence of the world we live in. It is becoming increasingly clear that today's global challenges can only be addressed by cooperative effort, with the full and equal participation of major and emerging powers and economies. Such groupings are in many ways the building blocks of the emerging global architecture. India and Russia cooperate closely within the UN systems. The similarity of our views on most global issues enables us to also coordinate closely within the newer multilateral formats like BRIC and G-20. I believe we contribute significantly through these bodies in providing balanced responses to global issues like the economic downturn and climate change and indeed, in working towards a system of global governance that corresponds to the realities of the 21st century.

Question: It is not your first visit to Russia. What thoughts and emotions flash through your mind while you are preparing for the trip? What is the most vivid personal impression after your numerous visits to Russia?

Prime Minister: This will be my sixth visit to Russia as Prime Minister. For me, every visit has been a journey in consolidating and cementing the historic bonds of friendship that exist between us. There is complete mutual understanding between our countries, and a mutual stake in the success of the other.

In all my visits to Russia, I have been struck by the openness, warmth and friendship with which I have been received. I feel perfectly at home, and no stranger. I attribute this to the personal commitment of the Russian leadership to relations with India, and the strong mutual empathy that exists between our peoples.

We have seen this over the decades, beginning with Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru's first visit in 1955. I would feel most gratified personally if the new Russia and the new India can sustain this long-standing partnership by harnessing the tremendous goodwill our peoples have had for each other in the past.

Question: Is there a major message from India and from Indian people that you are carrying to our country and that you are carrying to President Medvedev and Prime Minister Putin. We know that you are a very great and honest friend of our country. That is why I am asking this.

Prime Minister: Ladies and Gentlemen, I have been to Russia five or six times during the last five years. Every time I have been in Russia I have received great warmth and affection from all the people who I came in contact with. Both President Medvedev and Prime Minister Putin are great friends of our country. I sincerely hope that this visit of mine will further develop bonds of friendship and that our strategic partnership with Russia will get deeper, broader in content.

Question: Indian economy is showing a very impressive growth. Quarterly figures have proved it. When do you expect the economy of India to rebound, recover from the global crisis which has affected it and to reach the desired level of nine per cent annual growth?

Prime Minister: Indian economy has been affected by the global slowdown. Before the global slow down our economy in the previous four years was increasing at an annual rate of nine per cent per annum. Last year, because of the global slowdown the growth rate declined to about 6.7 per cent. This year we expect the growth rate to be 6.5 to seven per cent. In two to three years' time, I am confident that the Indian economy can bounce back to the growth rate of about nine per cent per annum. I say this for many reasons. Our savings rate is about 35 per cent of our GDP. Our investment rate is about 37 per cent of GDP. With these savings rate and investment rates, we can sustain a growth rate of nine per cent without difficulty. With an investment of 37 per cent and the capital output ratio of four is to one we can easily attain the targeted growth rate of nine per cent per annum, which I expect we will do in the next two to three years.

Question: How do you see the situation in Pakistan? In this context what can be done by India together with Russia and other friendly nations to effectively contain international terrorism in your area?

Prime Minister: Russia has been a great friend of our country. It has stood by us through very difficult times. We face in the subcontinent the onset of terrorism aided, inspired and instigated by our neighbour. Russia and India can work together to devise effective counter-terror strategies through coordinating our intelligence and information system. We can help each other because Russia like India has also been the victim of terrorism. We also believe that Russia being a great power can influence the conduct of Pakistan. Our hope is that Russia's influence will be utilised to convince Pakistan that the strategy of using terror as an instrument of state policy is counter-productive, it runs counter to a policy of good neighbourliness. On our part, if Pakistan territory ceases to be used by terrorists, we see immense opportunities for our two countries to work together in cooperation. There are immense opportunities of expanding trade, investment and technology flow between our two countries.

Question: Mr. Prime Minister, Russia and India have in the past had very large deals but mainly in the defence area. Today we have certain problems, especially with Admiral Gorshkov and other areas, with the defence deals. Are you going to be discussing these and also looking at newer businesses perhaps in the nuclear domain to build nuclear power plants and also enhancing the civilian business between the two countries?

Prime Minister: Cooperation in the field of defence has been a very important aspect of our cooperation with Russia. We have been able to get equipment and technologies from Russia which were not available to us from any other countries. Simultaneously, Russia has played a very important role in helping India to develop its nuclear energy programme, helped us in developing our space programme, and in many areas of science and technology we have actively collaborated with Russia to the enormous advantage of our economy and our polity. When I go to Russia naturally we will review our relationship in its diverse fields, including defence relationship, how we can strengthen, how we can develop new technologies in the field of defence. Of course, Admiral Gorshkov will figure in my discussion and I am confident that we can find practical solutions to the problems that have arisen. Collaboration between our two countries in the field of defence is a very vital aspect of our development. It will stay that way for many years to come. Cooperation in the field of nuclear energy has been a very important pillar of our cooperation with Russia and we have identified now new sites for collaboration with Russia for nuclear power projects. I see enormous opportunities in defence, in science and technology, in atomic energy, in space programme and in the development of our trade and investment relations which have not grown as fast as we both would like them to grow.

Question: Prime Minister, I would like to draw your attention to a smaller problem but because of this it is not less important for my people. President Medvedev is very much particular nowadays about pushing forward new programmes of production of good quality and cheap medicines for our people. We have a very good cooperation with India in this field. What can you say about the prospects of Indian investment in technology and in finance for creation of plants for producing drugs in the territory of Russia?

Prime Minister: Indian pharmaceutical firms have built up enormous capacities in the field of medicines and pharmaceuticals. World over, in generic drugs Indian companies have acquired a name for themselves. I sincerely hope that Russia and India can explore avenues of cooperation whereby Indian pharmaceutical concerns can help to expand the quality healthcare in particular in the supply of generic drugs to the Russian public at affordable costs and prices.

Question: Since the year 2006, in India the programme of national human space flight is being implemented as was proposed by you. How do you estimate the current results of that programme? Is India is cooperating in this field with other countries except Russia?

Prime Minister: Russia is the foremost co-operator and collaborator with India in the development of our space programme. In the spacecraft of Chandrayaan our two countries collaborated. Now we are planning a human space vessel. That also will provide enormous opportunities for cooperation between Russia and India. As of now the cooperation that we have with Russia, or the way we want it to grow with Russia, I think is far in excess of any cooperation that we have or we plan to develop with other countries.

Question: The issue of visas between the two countries still remains difficult to many people from the Russian side and the Indian side. Are you looking at working on this during your trip or in the near future to increase the validity of the visa making it a ten-year multiple visa.

Prime Minister: We are in favour of developing closest possible business and people- to-people contact between our two countries. Whatever obstacles exist in the development of these people-to-people contacts, they should be discussed and effective remedies should be found. If visas are a problem, I think the visa regime needs to be liberalised. We will explore all possibilities to expand cooperation on people-to-people basis.

670. Press Conference of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on the visit of Prime Minister to Russia.

New Delhi, December 5, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Vishnu Prakash): Good evening and welcome to the Press Conference. Foreign Secretary is here to brief you about the forthcoming visit of Prime Minister to Russia. She would be making an Opening Statement and would be happy to take a few questions thereafter. I would also like to introduce a colleague, Mr. Ajay Bisaria, Joint Secretary (Eurasia), who is to the right of Foreign Secretary. May I now invite Foreign Secretary to make her Opening Statement?

Foreign Secretary (Smt. Nirupama Rao) - Good Evening to all my friends from the Media,

I am here to brief you today on the Prime Minister's visit to the Russian Federation that begins tomorrow. Prime Minister will be in Moscow for the Annual Summit Meeting with the Russian President, Dmitry Medvedev. This will be the Prime Minister's second visit to Russia this year. You will recall that Prime Minister visited Yekaterinburg in the Russian Federation in June, on his first visit abroad after the formation of the new Government to participate in the BRIC (Brazil Russia India China) and SCO (Shanghai Cooperation Organisation) Summits.

2. As you know, our ties with the Russian Federation are historic, close and uniquely enduring. These ties are based on a strong national consensus in both countries that has cut across ideologies or political conditions. Our bilateral relationship has been re-energized with the declaration of a Strategic Partnership between our two countries during the visit to India in 2000 by the then President Putin. Since then, our partnership has diversified enormously and you can see that today the relationship is a uniquely strong and expanding one, particularly in the fields of defence, nuclear energy, hydrocarbons, space research and science & technology. We are now working to stimulate our relations in the field of bilateral trade and investment. We in India consider Russia to be an old and valued friend which is at the same time a country with a huge untapped potential for increasing our bilateral engagement. The warmth and desire for deepening engagement, we feel, is strongly reciprocated on the Russian side. Prime Minister has recently said that during his visit to Russia and in discussions with President Medvedev, we propose to discuss steps to raise our strategic partnership to the next level.

3. Let me now outline the programme. Upon arrival tomorrow, PM will have dinner with President Medvedev at his dacha, where the two leaders will get a chance to have an informal conversation before the formal proceedings at the Kremlin begin. On Monday, PM will be meeting President Medvedev for a restricted format meeting as well as for delegation level talks, when a whole range of bilateral, regional and global issues will be discussed. PM will also be holding wide ranging discussions with Prime Minister Putin. The two Prime Ministers will together be attending the closing ceremony of the 'Year of India' celebrations in Russia. Prime Minister, along with Prime Minister Putin, will also address the CEOs Council, which will hold its first full-fledged meeting since it was conceived in 2008. This Council comprises CEOs of some of the biggest and most important companies in India and Russia, and is aimed at stimulating further engagement between the private sectors of the two countries. Prime Minister will also be attending a meeting of Indologists where Russians scholars and academics with an informed interest in India will be presenting their views on the civilizational engagement between India and the Russian Federation.

4. As you know, the last few months have seen a very intensive bilateral engagement with the Russian Federation. Beginning with the State visit of President Patil in September 2009, we have had visits by Commerce and Industry Minister, Shri Anand Sharma, Raksha Mantri, Shri A.K. Antony and External Affairs Minister, Shri S.M. Krishna to the Russian Federation in the months of October and November 2009, when diverse aspects of the bilateral relationship have been reviewed and the path ahead has been charted out. We have also hosted the Ninth Trilateral Meeting of the Foreign Ministers of India, Russia and China in Bengaluru on 27 October 2009, when we had an exchange of views on various issues in a trilateral format. We hosted the Russian Deputy PM Mr. Sobyenin in November and I had detailed Foreign Office level consultations last month with my counterpart, Deputy Foreign Minister Denisov. The Annual Summit Meeting is of course the most important event in our annual calendar and we see it as the principle vehicle to take forward the Strategic Partnership with Russia.

5. Prime Minister will be accompanied by Dr. Karan Singh, President of ICCR, National Security Adviser and officials of the Ministries with the most intense engagement with the Russian side. Several captains of industry will be in Moscow to participate in the CEOs Council which will be co-chaired on the Indian side by Shri Mukesh Ambani, Chairman, Reliance Industries.

6. We expect to sign a few agreements which will reflect the breadth of our relationship and particularly, the depth of our cooperation in the defence sector. The agreements that are expected to be signed during the visit are-

- o Agreement on extending the Programme for Military and Technical Cooperation for the period 2011-2020;

- o Agreement on After Sales Support for Russian arms and military equipment supplied to India;
  - o Protocol to the Agreement on Cooperation in Development and Production of Multi-Role Transport Aircraft (MTA);
  - o Dollar credit line Agreement between Vnesheconombank of the Russian Federation and the Exim Bank of India for the extension of a 100 million dollar credit to Russia for certain imports of equipment from India;
  - o MoU on cultural exchanges between India and the Russian Federation.
7. A Joint Declaration will be issued by the two leaders during the visit on deepening our strategic partnership to meet global challenges.
8. In addition to these, we are currently in the advanced stages of finalizing a bilateral framework Inter-Government Agreement on Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy. Several rounds of negotiations have already taken place between our experts and we are hopeful that the agreement will be finalised during the visit. This agreement envisages broad-based cooperation on a range of technologies and know-how in the realm of peaceful uses of nuclear technology.
9. As you are aware, we have an existing agreement with Russia (of 1988) for cooperation in the construction of two 1000 MW nuclear power units. In December 2008, we concluded an agreement for four additional units at Kudankulam. The Government of India has also recently agreed to allocate one more site for nuclear power reactors, supplied by Russia: this is at Haripur in West Bengal.
10. Our defence cooperation has for long been a key element of our relationship. We have moved well beyond a buyer-seller relationship to joint production through the transfer of relevant technologies. In fact, the development of the Indian defence industry has been in large measure due to the strong relationship we have had with Russia and the Soviet Union earlier. A very robust bilateral institutions mechanism exists to discuss the defence relationship. The apex of this structure is the inter-governmental commission headed by the two defence ministers on military-technical cooperation. During the annual summit, this relationship will be reviewed at the highest level. Some of the ongoing flagship projects reflect the depth of this cooperation. These are:
- i) Aircraft carrier Vikramditya or Gorshkov;
  - ii) Multi-role Transport Aircraft

- iii) Fifth Generation Fighter aircraft
- iv) Production of SU-30 MKI aircraft
- v) Production of T-90 tanks

11. Another critical element of our relationship is our cooperation in the hydrocarbon sector. As you know, India's ONGC (Videsh) Ltd. has made significant investments in the Sakhalin I project of about 2.7 billion dollars. We are hoping to intensify this cooperation with further participation in oil & gas fields in the Russian Far-East.

12. As our Prime Minister said recently, Russia is an important factor of peace, stability and security in the world. We view our relationship with Russia as an enduring friendship that has stood the test of the time. Our relations with Russia enjoy a strong national consensus in India. The people of India can never forget the help and support we have received from Russia in difficult moments of our history.

Question: Can you tell us more about intensifying cooperation in oil and gas? Does it have to do with Sakhalin-III?

Foreign Secretary: As I have just mentioned in my opening statement, cooperation in the field of oil and gas is a very significant sector in our bilateral cooperation with Russia. I mentioned, of course, Sakhalin and the participation of ONGC Videsh Limited. We are also looking at the expansion of this cooperation so that the dimension that we have provided to this interaction in petroleum and natural gas is further strengthened. In fact, Sakhalin-III is also under consideration at the moment.

Question: Is there any progress on finalising the price for Gorshkov? Will this be taken up there?

Foreign Secretary: Let me say that all issues relating to our defence cooperation with Russia receive the attention at the highest possible level in both our countries. And the issue of Vikramaditya or Gorshkov is under discussion. Its renovation and the costs thereof are under active discussion between the two sides. These discussions are held in an atmosphere of mutual accommodation. I have no doubt that we will arrive at a mutually satisfactory solution very soon.

Question: Russia and India have a very good cooperation on Afghanistan. There is sharing of information and both countries are trying to stop the spread of drugs from this area. Will it be discussed in the Annual Summit as to what more steps can the two countries take in this regard?

Foreign Secretary: In fact, this was an issue that I was also able to discuss with my counterpart Deputy Foreign Minister Denisov when he was here last month. Both our countries agree that the resurgence of Al Qaeda and the Taliban in Afghanistan pose a serious threat to peace and stability in our region and the world. Both our countries also agree that the fight against terror cannot be selective and you cannot make facile distinctions between the so-called good and the bad Taliban. Both India and the Russian Federation are committed to a democratic, pluralistic and stable Afghanistan. We are equally committed, and this is the point you made at the outset, to full-fledged efforts by the international community to combat the illegal narcotics infrastructure in Afghanistan.

Question: There is a point of view in the Russian media that during the Soviet period relations between our two countries were, if not warmer, much more constructive and active. What is the Indian point of view on this subject? What do you think of the relations nowadays?

Foreign Secretary: The relationship between India and the Russian Federation is a time-tested relationship. It is a rock solid relationship. It is multidimensional and it has its own momentum and logic. I believe sincerely and strongly that it is a relationship on an upward trajectory and can hardly be impacted by the paths of other bilateral relationships. So, I think the challenge before India and the Russian Federation today is to further expand and strengthen and deepen our strategic partnership. There is the affirmative nature of this relationship that has stood the test of time. As I said in my opening remarks, we attach the highest value and importance to our relations with the Russian Federation.

Question: PM Begum Hasina is coming very shortly. Is the issue of ULFA militants still in Bangladesh being taken up before her arrival? Also, have we brought up the issue of this road in Demchok with the Chinese?

Foreign Secretary: As far as the issue of discussing the matter relating to Indian insurgent groups that operate across the border in Bangladesh, this is an issue of ongoing discussion between the Governments of India and Bangladesh. Our Home Secretary level talks have just concluded. I want to say that both sides have a very constructive dialogue on this issue. The cooperation between our two Governments has been very positive. And on the issue of the road in Demchok, I think I have answered this question before. I was asked this a few days ago. You asked me whether we have taken this up with the Chinese. It has been taken up with the Chinese side at one of the flag meetings that we have at the ground level. Let me say that the whole issue of the differing perceptions of the Line of Actual Control in the area around Demchok has been taken up on many occasions with the Chinese side. This is not a new issue that has cropped up in the discourse relating to the boundary question between India and China. We are aware and the Chinese are aware that there are differences in perception about the Line of Actual Control in this area and both sides are working to resolve these issues peacefully through dialogue and negotiation.

Question: I have two questions, Madam. There is a statement made by Pakistan Prime Minister Gilani that they have evidence of India's foul play in Balochistan. What is our response to that? Secondly, there are reports that Paresh Barua is in China. Are we taking it up with China? Do we look forward to take it up diplomatically with China?

Foreign Secretary: On the first question that you just asked, we have said this before and I say it now, there is not a shred of evidence to corroborate what the Pakistani authorities have been alleging about the so-called activities by India in Balochistan. Balochistan is an internal affair of Pakistan. It is not our habit, it is not our policy, to interfere in the internal affairs of neighbouring countries or for that matter any country. And I hope Pakistan will follow a similar approach. On China, Paresh Barua is wanted in India for crimes against the Indian state, against Indian people, and we continue to seek his apprehension. We are in touch with our neighbouring countries about these matters. We expect all our neighbours to behave responsibly on this issue.

Question: You have just said that the highway issue has been taken up with China. In the meanwhile, is the road construction going on or have we stopped it till we sort this out?

Foreign Secretary: I am not aware of any instructions having been passed on to the people working in that area to stop the construction.

Question: It seems it is the sixth time that the Prime Minister is visiting Russia. When does the Russian President come to India?

Foreign Secretary: We have the system of Annual Summits between India and the Russian Federation and we will be discussing dates for the visit from the Russian side not only during this visit but also through diplomatic channels. Our Prime Minister has invited Prime Minister Putin to visit India and we are very optimistic that that visit will take place in the first half of 2010.

Question: There have been suggestions in a section of the media that the format of Annual Summit between India and Russia should be changed. Because of the political reality in Russian Federation, because of Putin and Medvedev duo and the power equation over there, the format of annual summit should be changed. This view was expressed in some sections of the press.

Foreign Secretary: The press is free to express its views on such matters. We take note of all these views that are expressed. But I want to say that our relationship with the Russian Federation is historic. It is close, it is enduring. And this relationship has been re-energised by the declaration of Strategic Partnership which I referred to in my earlier remarks. Given the fact that the bilateral relationship has diversified enormously in recent years - especially in the field of defence, nuclear energy, hydrocarbons, space research, science and technology - obviously you have to stimulate this dialogue, you have to intensify cooperation. And the annual summit meetings play a key role in this regard. I think this is an institution that we value and that we wish to preserve and to take forward.

Question: You have referred to the Inter-Governmental Framework on civilian nuclear energy. You said it is in an advanced stage of negotiations. Could you just share some thoughts on it? What will be the thrust on it?

Foreign Secretary: Let me repeat that the Inter-Governmental agreement on peaceful uses of atomic energy, that is a framework agreement in this sector, is under discussion between our two sides, and we expect this to be finalised shortly. However, it is important to remember that even before the finalisation of the IGA, cooperation in this important sector has been ongoing between our two countries.

Question: *We want to know is there any probability of an agreement between India and Russia in the space sector or there will be discussions about a share in Glonnass? Our second question is whether in the case of Admiral Gorshkov there will be finalization of the price? Will the price of Gorshkov not be settled? (free translation from the Hindi text)

Foreign Secretary: On the subject of the aircraft carrier I have already answered a question earlier in this press conference. I invite you to refer to that. The subject is an issue of ongoing discussion between the two sides. We are approaching this in a very positive way from both sides and we hope to arrive at a mutually satisfactory solution regarding the price very shortly. As far as cooperation in the field of space technology goes, this is a critical and crucial area for cooperation between India and the Russian Federation. It has been for some time. We expect the projects that are on the anvil in this regard to be taken forward including the one you referred to just now.

Question: Madam, there have been reports that the Radar which Russia supplied to us for the Sukhoi fighter planes are also being supplied to China which is presently installed in their J-17 aircraft which China is passing on to Pakistan. Are you planning to take this up with the Russian authorities?

Foreign Secretary: We have seen the reports in this regard and obviously we would discuss this with the Russian side.

Question: Foreign Secretary, India has Strategic Partnership with a number of countries. How is the one that we have with Russia different? You have been stressing on that.

Foreign Secretary: Yes. It is true we have Strategic Partnerships with a number of countries. But when we define our Strategic Partnership with Russia - and I think my remarks during this briefing point in that direction - you are talking of a time-tested relationship with one of our closest friends. You are talking of a multidimensional relationship, particularly in the field of defence, nuclear technology, hydrocarbons, space, trade, investment. So, the fact that this relationship has so many dimensions to it provides value to the bilateral relationship. Let me say that our strategic partnership with Russia - and we have said this time and time again very emphatically - exists on its own merit and it is not in any way to be seen as diminished by the relationships that we have with other countries with which we have Strategic Partnerships. The relationship with Russia is of crucial importance to India and it will remain so for the future. I only see it being intensified and developed and strengthened in the years to come.

Question: Madam, you spoke about protocol on MTA. Could you tell us about the progress in FGFA (Fifth Generation Fighter Aircraft) and whether discussions will be held on procurement of additional fighters?

Foreign Secretary: I am not going into details in that regard. I would say that these are issues that are being discussed between the technical experts, the officials in both sectors that are involved in such cooperation, and this is moving forward. This technical level discussion that is under way is a discussion that involves experts, technocrats. The fact, as I mentioned is, it is not a buyer-seller relationship any more. It is a relationship that involves design, development and technology. So, to answer Pranay's earlier question, it is the best example of a Strategic Partnership.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much. Have a very good evening.

671. Statement of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh prior to his departure for Russia.

New Delhi, December 6, 2009.

I am leaving today for Russia at the invitation of President Dmitry Medvedev for the Annual India-Russia Summit. I had earlier visited Russia in June 2009 to attend the BRIC and Shanghai Cooperation Organisation Summits. President Medvedev had earlier visited us in December 2008.

The Annual Summit is the principal mechanism for the advancement of our strategic partnership with Russia. This is a partnership based on the solid foundation of long-standing friendship, deep mutual trust and strong convergence of interests. Over the years, our multifaceted cooperation with Russia has acquired greater depth and maturity through joint efforts. We seek to strengthen these ties further.

At the Summit meeting with President Medvedev, I hope to review the status of our bilateral cooperation, including in the key areas of defence, civil nuclear energy, space, science and technology and hydrocarbons. I will also exchange views with the President on key regional and global issues such as terrorism, recovery of the global economy, energy security, climate change, nuclear disarmament and reform of international institutions.

During the visit, I will also meet Prime Minister Vladimir Putin, under whose Presidency we had established the strategic partnership between our two countries in 2000. Prime Minister Putin and I will jointly attend the closing ceremony of the Year of India in Russia. I also look forward to meeting the members of the India-Russia CEO's Council along with Prime Minister Putin. These events symbolize the mutual desire of both countries to enhance people-to-people contacts, and expand our trade and economic engagement, which is well below our true potential.

I also look forward to interacting with Russian intellectuals and scholars during this visit. We need to build upon the tradition of study and research of each other's countries through greater contacts between the media and academic circles.

I am confident that my visit will be yet another step forward in consolidating our cooperation with Russia and in reinforcing the fact that the India-Russia strategic partnership is a factor of peace and stability in the evolving international situation.

672. Opening Remarks of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the joint Press Conference with Russian President.

Moscow, December 7, 2009.

His Excellency President Medvedev,

Ladies and Gentlemen of the Media,

I would like to begin by conveying to the Government and people of Russia the deepest condolences on behalf of the Government and people of India on the most tragic incident which took place in Perm and to join them in their mourning today. Our thoughts are with the friends and families of the bereaved.

I thank His Excellency President Medvedev and the people of Russia for the warm hospitality extended to me. This is my second visit to Russia in six months and I am delighted to be back again.

Relations between India and Russia are characterised by deep mutual trust and confidence. They are based on shared interests and common perceptions on global issues. Russia is a major global power and a factor of peace and stability in the international system. India accords the highest priority to its relations with Russia. This is a relationship that stands on its own footing and is not influenced by our relations with any other country.

I am most satisfied with our discussions today.

I conveyed to President Medvedev the special importance we attach to strengthening the economic dimension of our ties. We expect the India-Russia CEO's Council to play a much bigger role in realising this objective. I will be meeting the members of the Council later today together with Prime Minister Putin. We have decided to set a trade target of 20 billion US dollars by 2015. We have identified the areas of energy, Information Technology and Communications, and pharmaceuticals as the new thrust areas for cooperation.

We welcome greater Russian participation in the expansion of our nuclear energy programme.

The successful conclusion of negotiations on an Intergovernmental Agreement on Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy is a major step forward in strengthening our existing cooperation in this field.

I reiterated to President Medvedev our keen interest to similarly expand our cooperation in the hydrocarbon sector. Given India's energy needs, and the world class capabilities of Indian companies in the oil and gas sector, this is an area of vast untapped potential.

The Agreements that we have signed in the field of defence cooperation, in particular on the Programme for Military and Technical Cooperation for the period 2011 to 2020, will provide the basis for an intensive and broad based cooperation in this vital area.

We are grateful for the support given by the Government of Russia for the holding of the Year of India in Russia. We would like to build upon this by focussing on greater exchanges between our youth, institutions of higher learning, parliamentarians, business leaders, media, scientists and researchers.

We also discussed regional issues, including the situation in Afghanistan. Both India and Russia have an interest in a stable, prosperous and moderate Afghanistan, and we have agreed to regularly consult each other on this important issue.

We have also agreed to enhance our cooperation to meet the grave challenges of terrorism and religious extremism that emanate from our region and threaten both our societies.

We reviewed our collaboration in the United Nations and multilateral forums like the G-20. India and Russia can play a significant role in ensuring that the process of global economic recovery is sustained, balanced and inclusive. We have agreed to work towards a successful and comprehensive outcome at the climate change Conference in Copenhagen.

I have invited President Medvedev for the next Annual Summit in Delhi in 2010. We look forward to the visit of Prime Minister Putin in March next year.

These high level exchanges are a defining characteristic of our relations, and reflect the strong political commitment on both sides to continue to strengthen our Strategic Partnership.

Thank you.

673. Joint Declaration issued following the visit of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to Russia for the annual Summit meeting with the Russian President Dmitry Medvedev.

Moscow, December 7, 2009.

Following the official visit of the Prime Minister of India Dr. Manmohan Singh, to Russia at the invitation of President of the Russian Federation, Mr. Dmitry Medvedev, for the Annual Summit from December 6 to 8, 2009, the Republic of India and the Russian Federation, hereinafter referred to as the "Sides",

REITERATING their aim of deepening and strengthening in every way the close, friendly and historic India-Russia bilateral relationship;

RECALLING the Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation between the Russian Federation and the Republic of India of 28 January 1993 and the Declaration on Strategic Partnership between the Republic of India and the Russian Federation of 3 October 2000;

REAFFIRMING their desire to strengthen international peace, security and stability and to enhance mutually beneficial cooperation between states in order to build a just and democratic world order;

EMPHASIZING the importance of ensuring sustainable development, of expanding and modernizing their economies and of improving the well-being of their citizens; hereby declare that:

1. The Strategic Partnership between India and the Russian Federation is the culmination of the long and multifaceted bilateral relations that have flourished between the two countries since the establishment of diplomatic relations in April 1947 and is a key foreign policy priority for both the Sides. This deepening partnership is not impacted in any way by the engagement of the two countries with the rest of the world. It is a time-tested and enduring friendship which is mutually beneficial and which has emerged as a factor of peace and stability in the region and the world.

The Sides recognize that an effective response to the regional and global challenges in the future demands that India and Russia intensify their Strategic Partnership. As two large pluralistic democracies undergoing rapid economic transformation, India and Russia share many interests and viewpoints on global issues. They undertake to take steps to deepen bilateral cooperation and raise their Strategic Partnership to the next level.

India and Russia value their Annual Summit as the principal vehicle to advance their Strategic Partnership.

2. India and Russia share the view that radical changes taking place in the international system, do not just pose new challenges and threats, but also provide opportunities to build a new, democratic and fair multipolar world order-based on collective approaches, supremacy of international law, and adherence to the goals and principles enshrined in the UN Charter.

3. India and Russia share the common commitment to reform the global economic governance system based on the principles of equity and justice, taking into account the need to ensure the full-fledged participation of major economies and developing countries in reforming the world's financial and economic system in line with the new economic realities.

India and Russia note that, in spite of a diverse range of international stake holders and the interlinking effects of globalization, a modern state is the main tool for reconciling public interest with securing the rights, freedoms and interests of individual citizens, and continues to be the basic building block of international relations.

4. The Sides emphasize that the emerging system of international relations should be based on the principle of indivisible security, have a universal character and should encompass all states and all major spheres of international relations. The Sides note that maintaining international peace involves equal security for all states without exception. The security of some states should not be achieved at the expense of the security of others.

5. The Sides are convinced that only collective efforts by the international community as a whole, can successfully meet challenges such as overcoming the global financial crisis, ensuring energy and food security and addressing an issue of global concern such as climate change.

6. India and Russia express their support for international efforts aimed at global, complete and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons. In this regard, India welcomes the intention of Russia and the United States to conclude a new Treaty on Further Reduction and Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms.

India and Russia stress that the proliferation of nuclear weapons and its possible link to terrorism poses a threat to international peace and security, undermines security of states, complicates progress toward nuclear disarmament and may negatively affect prospects for wider international cooperation in the sphere of peaceful uses of nuclear energy. The Sides pledge to work together for global non-proliferation.

The Sides reaffirm their commitment to prevent the deployment of weapons in outer space and to maintain outer space exclusively for peaceful use and cooperation for the sake of all mankind.

7. The Sides are convinced that the international community should enhance efforts to combat terrorism in all its forms and manifestations. The United Nations Global Counter-terrorism Strategy and the respective resolutions of the UNGA and UNSC should be steadfastly implemented, in particular UNSC resolutions 1267, 1373 and 1540. Both Sides call upon the international community to comply with the provisions of international counter-terrorism conventions and protocols including the principle, 'either prosecute or extradite', regarding the persons accused of committing acts of terror. The Sides strongly call for an early adoption of the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism. The Sides intend to further develop Indian-Russian bilateral cooperation in combating new challenges and threats, including such cooperation within the framework of the India and Russia Working Group on Combating International Terrorism.

Russia expressed solidarity and support to the Government and people of India in connection with terrorist attacks in Mumbai on November 26-29, 2008 and both Sides underscore the need to bring the perpetrators of the attack to justice.

India supports Russia's efforts to maintain peace and stability in the Caucasus.

India expressed sympathy for the victims of the attack of the "Nevsky Express" by terrorists on November 27, 2009 in Russia, and supports the Government of the Russian Federation in its determination to eliminate terrorism from Russian soil.

8. The Sides welcome the result of the presidential elections in Afghanistan and agree that the people of Afghanistan and the international community face a clear and present danger from terrorist and extremist elements which must be tackled resolutely before peace and stability can be restored in the region.

The Sides emphasize that the resurgence of the Al Qaeda and Taliban in Afghanistan threatens the progress made over the last few years. In this regard, they condemn the terrorist attack on the Indian Embassy in Kabul on October 8, 2009. They agree that the fight against terrorism cannot be selective, and drawing false distinctions between 'good' and 'bad' Taliban, would be counter-productive. They highlight the need for strict observance of the sanctions regime against persons and entities listed by UNSC Committee 1267. The Sides reaffirm their long-term commitment to a democratic, pluralistic and stable Afghanistan. They are in favour of enhancing the role of the International Security Assistance Forces in combating the illegal narcotics infrastructure in Afghanistan. In this context, India appreciates the convening by the Russian Federation of an International Conference on Afghanistan under the aegis of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation on March 27, 2009.

9. The Sides share the international community's concern with the continuing acts of piracy and armed robbery off the coast of Somalia. The Sides assert that measures to combat piracy should be implemented in compliance with international law and that persons guilty of acts of piracy must be brought to justice.

10. India and Russia emphasise the urgency of effective international action to combat climate change and in this context, affirm their readiness to continue to work constructively for the success of the UN Conference on Climate Change in Copenhagen in accordance with the principles and provisions of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change and the Bali Action Plan, bearing in mind the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities of states.

11. India and Russia agree to enhance bilateral cooperation in the energy sector, including joint projects by Indian and Russian hydrocarbon companies. While promoting bilateral energy cooperation efforts, the Sides also support the modernization of the architecture of the global energy market. The Sides agree to discuss and develop an appropriate international legal system that would promote transactions in the energy sector in a universal, equitable and non-discriminatory manner, taking into account the interests of suppliers, transit states and consumers of energy resources.

12. India and Russia welcome the finalisation of the Agreement on Cooperation in the Use of Atomic Energy for Peaceful Purposes and look forward to developing and intensifying broad-based cooperation between the two countries in the area of nuclear energy including such areas as joint scientific research, implementation of nuclear power projects and setting up of fuel supply arrangements.

On these aspects and in regard to the development and intensification of broad-based cooperation as mentioned in the Framework Agreement, the Sides will conclude specific instruments.

13. The Sides consider effective interaction on timely response to natural and man-made disasters and mitigating their social and economic impact as an important sphere of international cooperation.

14. India and Russia call for strengthening bilateral and international cooperation in countering the threat of extremely dangerous infectious and other contagious diseases.

15. The Sides underline the urgency for ensuring international information security as one of the key elements of the whole international security scenario.

16. The Sides agree to further strengthen their cooperation on issues related to the reform of the UN and its Security Council. The reform of the UN Security Council should be carried out in a manner that reflects contemporary realities and makes it more representative and effective in dealing with both present-day and emerging challenges. Russia considers India a deserving and strong candidate for a permanent seat in an expanded UN Security Council.

17. The Sides welcome the Pittsburgh Summit's landmark decision to institutionalise the G-20 as the premier forum for international economic cooperation and are convinced that this process should be implemented on the principles of equality among all the participants, transparency and mutual consideration of interest. In the context of the international financial and economic crisis, they commend the timely and strong policy response for growth, until durable recovery is assured. They reiterate the importance of the comprehensive package of regulatory measures to prevent recurrence of the crisis. The Sides welcome the Pittsburgh Summit's focus to address reforms of the international financial institutions in order to improve their credibility, governance and effectiveness, and look forward to implementing the G-20 decisions within the agreed timelines. The Sides reaffirm their commitment to avoid protectionism in all its forms. The Sides favour the streamlining of the G-20 process, including defining rules of procedure, ensuring transparency in work methods and equitable rotation of G-20 Summits. In a spirit of friendship and cooperation, they look forward to working closely together, as well as with others, in the G-20 framework.

India and Russia also favour closer cooperation and equal interaction between developed countries and major developing countries in other international formats, including the Heiligendamm - L'Aquila Process.

18. The Sides note the growing efficacy of close multilateral cooperation in the Asia Pacific region as a means to enhance economic cooperation in the region and to maintain regional peace and stability to confront global challenges of security and development of the 21st century. In this context, the Sides express interest in strengthening bilateral and multilateral interaction in different related fields.

19. The Sides consider the interaction in BRIC and RIC formats to be an effective tool to promote strengthening a more balanced and predictable international system as well as a core element to shape a multipolar world order and to ensure sustainable world development in the post crisis setting.

20. Both Sides welcome the progress registered by the BRIC dialogue. They note that the first stand alone BRIC Summit in Yekaterinburg, Russia, in June this year has given it a direction for future growth and added new vistas of cooperation for the coming years. The Sides look forward to early meetings of BRIC Energy and Agriculture Ministers and implementation of other initiatives suggested by the leaders at the first BRIC Summit. The Sides underlined the importance of BRIC Finance Ministers' meetings in the context of G-20 meetings. Noting the Track-II events organized by think-tanks, they express satisfaction that the BRIC dialogue at Track-II level is also progressing well.

21. The Sides welcome the enhanced interaction in the trilateral format and recall the successful holding of the Ninth Trilateral Meeting of Foreign Ministers of India, Russia and China in Bengaluru in October 2009. The Sides appreciate the exchange of views on regional and global issues that was facilitated by this meeting and call for intensified exchanges of information and ideas on the important issues of the day for the benefit of the people of the three countries and for peace and stability in the region.

22. The Russian side appreciates the representation at the level of Prime Minister from India in the Summit Meeting of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) at Yekaterinburg, held on 16 June 2009, as it is indicative of the importance India attaches to the SCO. The Indian side welcomes the increased involvement of Observer states in the activities and meetings of the SCO and seeks a more constructive engagement in the Organization in economic, counter-terrorism and culture related activities. The Russian side supports India's full membership in the SCO. The Sides recognize that the SCO represents a vast land mass rich in cultural diversity, creativity and resources that has evolved to be an important regional organization promoting peace and stability and fostering economic development in the region.

23. Russia is confident that engagement of India in the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) will enhance capacity-building and effectiveness of the APEC mechanism, and encourage enhanced trade and investment cooperation in the region. Russia supports India's membership in the APEC and will work towards lifting the moratorium on expanding the APEC's membership.

24. India believes that Russia's involvement in the Asia-Europe Meeting (ASEM) will greatly help to improve interregional cooperation, mutual understanding and confidence within Eurasia, and in this respect India supports Russia joining that dialogue forum at the 8th Asia-Europe Meeting to be held in Brussels in 2010.

25. The Sides express satisfaction at the intensity of the bilateral engagement since their last Summit meeting, including the State Visit of the President of India to the Russian Federation in September 2009. The Prime Minister of India extends an invitation to the President of the Russian Federation to visit India for the next Summit meeting in 2010. The President of the Russian Federation accepts the invitation with pleasure. The leaders look forward to an ever deepening partnership encompassing diverse strategic and other areas of cooperation which would herald a new chapter in the abiding ties of friendship and mutual confidence between India and the Russian Federation.

674. Statement by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao to the media on Prime Minister's visit.

Moscow, December 7, 2009.

The visit of Prime Minister to the Russian Federation has demonstrated in ample measure the depth and the strong vitality of the India-Russia Strategic Partnership. It has been a most successful and very productive visit. The discussions held by Prime Minister with President Medvedev and Prime Minister Putin have been substantive and detailed, and the leaders have focused on priority areas of the partnership and how we intend to take these forward through intensive efforts by both sides in the months ahead. The Agreements concluded during the visit have also reflected the great depth of the relationship, its stability and maturity, and the mutually beneficial nature of our bilateral relations. Ours is a partnership that is multi-dimensional in the true sense. It is a partnership of strategic importance, and it is a partnership that works for the development and progress of the peoples of both countries, and for peace and stability in the region and the world. The tradition of Annual Summits between the leaders of India and Russia has served most effectively to impart vision and a forward-looking perspective to our dialogue and cooperation. The momentum of our relations with Russia is indeed strong and dynamic and we will now prepare for the visits of President Medvedev and of Prime Minister Putin to India, at the invitation of our Prime Minister.

PM arrived in Moscow yesterday afternoon on his second visit to Russia within six months, to a warm ceremonial welcome. Later, in the evening, he was hosted by President Medvedev for an informal dinner at his Dacha at Barvikha. The two leaders had a warm and detailed exchange of views on several regional and global issues, including the situation in the Af-Pak region the global financial situation, the role of the G-20, and climate change issues.

This morning, PM went for a solemn wreath laying ceremony at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. Thereafter, he proceeded to the Kremlin for a restricted format meeting with the Russian President. They had highly fruitful discussions on a number of bilateral, regional and international issues. This was followed by delegation-level talks, with the participation of senior officials from both sides.

The following bilateral agreements were signed in the presence of the two leaders.

1. Agreement between the Government of the Republic of India and the Government of the Russian Federation on the Programme for Military and Technical Cooperation (MTC) during the period 2011-2020. (The agreement would help enhance the operational capability of the Indian defence forces in the next decade by providing various defence equipment/ systems, and will also facilitate capacity development of the Indian defence industry. The agreement provides for acquisition, licensed production, upgrades and modernization of defence equipment as well as the development of new and advanced weapon systems.)
2. Agreement between the Government of the Republic of India and the Government of the Russian Federation on After Sales Support for the Russian Arms and Military Equipment supplied to the Republic of India. (The agreement would facilitate timely and adequate supply of spares and services for maintaining a high level of readiness and integrated maintenance of Russian-made military equipment supplied to India.)
3. Protocol to the Agreement of the Government of the Republic of India and the Government of Russian Federation on Cooperation in Development and Production of Multi-Role Transport Aircraft of November 12, 2007. (This is an amendment to the existing Agreement.)
4. Agreement between the Government of the Republic of India and the Government of the Russian Federation on Cooperation in Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy. (The agreement on cooperation in the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes initialed today marks the culmination of expert-level negotiations, which were going on for the past few months. The IGA signed in 1988 was for the construction of Kudankulam 1 and Kudankulam 2. The IGA signed last year was for the construction of additional reactors at Kudankulam. The IGA initialled today is a broad - based agreement, and lists several areas for cooperation, including R& D, construction of nuclear power plants, supply of uranium etc. The agreement provides for up-front consent for reprocessing of spent fuel and also includes a provision that any termination will be without prejudice to ongoing contracts and fuel supply obligations. In addition, it includes provisions which are common with other agreements such as application of IAEA safeguards, retransfer mechanism, and non-interference in our unsafeguarded programme.)
5. Programme of Cultural Exchanges between the Government of the Republic of India and the Government of the Russian Federation for the Years 2010-12. (The agreement will ensure continuation of exchanges between the two Governments in the fields of art & culture and intensification of people-to-people contacts).

6. Dollar Credit Line Agreement between Vnesheconombank (Bank for Development and Foreign Economic Affairs), Russian Federation and EXIM Bank of India. (The agreement intends to extend a Line of Credit of US$ 100 million by EXIM Bank of India to Vnesheconombank for financing export of Indian equipment, technology, goods and services to Russia).

The Annual Summit is the apex level mechanism of the India- Russia Strategic Partnership and discussions between PM and President Medvedev spread over the informal diner yesterday evening and today morning covered our extensive cooperation both at the bilateral level as well as on international issues. The discussions, especially on global issues, are reflected in the Joint Declaration adopted at the conclusion of talks. Titled "Joint Declaration between the Republic of India and the Russian Federation on deepening the Strategic Partnership to meet Global Challenges", the Joint Declaration encapsulates a shared vision on many global issues, and reflects the desire of both sides to take their relationship to the next level.

PM also had intensive discussions with Prime Minister Putin this evening. Prime Minister Putin, as the then President, established the Strategic Partnership between India and Russia in 2000. They discussed ways of reinvigorating efforts to enhance bilateral trade and investment relations, science and technology cooperation, proposals for expanding India's cooperation in the development of the hydrocarbon sector in Russia, defence, nuclear and space cooperation.

Following their talks, the two Prime Ministers addressed the India-Russia CEOs Council Meeting, which is an important mechanism for boosting private sector cooperation between the two countries. From the Russian side, the co-chair of the Council, Vladimir Evtushenkov, spoke of the prospects for cooperation in the field of telecommunications. The potential for collaboration in the pharmaceutical industry was stressed. The Indian co-chair, Mukesh Ambani spoke of the opportunities for Russian participation in the infrastructure development sector, and cooperation in pharmaceuticals (including joint development of new technologies in the health sector), as also telecommunications.

The scheduled Closing Ceremony of the Year of India celebrations that would have been attended by PM and Prime Minister Putin was cancelled as a mark of respect for the victims of the fire tragedy in the city of Perm. PM personally expressed his condolences to both President Medvedev and Prime Minister Putin for the incident on behalf of the people of India.

675. Media Interaction of the Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on board the Special Flight of the Prime Minister on way back to New Delhi from Moscow.

December 8, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Foreign Secretary is here accompanied by the Media Advisor to talk to you about the Prime Minister's recently concluded visit to Russia. After her opening remarks she will be happy to take a few questions. May I invite you, Madam, for your opening statement?

Foreign Secretary (Shrimati Nirupama Rao): Thank you, Vishnu.

Ladies and gentlemen, you would have seen the text of my remarks to all of you as of last evening. I was on my way to the Media Centre but, of course, the weather in Moscow prevented me from reaching my destination. So, I had to turn back and hence you had the written text of my remarks.

All I would like to add to those remarks is that this has been an extremely successful, productive and satisfying visit by any definition. I think most of all it has reinforced the fact that India and Russia have a very close and, as I have said before, rock-solid strategic partnership that works in the interest of both our countries.

You have seen the Joint Declaration that we released yesterday on deepening our Strategic Partnership to meet global challenges. It is a very detailed and elaborate document. I would advise you to read it carefully because in many ways it charts out, it maps out the dimensions of this relationship and speaks about the priority that we attach to it at the political level, the perfect understanding that exists between the leaders of the two countries and indeed at various sectoral levels. This is a very productive partnership. It is a partnership that works in the interest, as I said, bilaterally of both countries, and it also promotes peace and stability in our region and in the world.

Prime Minister's discussions with Russian leaders have been very in-depth, very wide-ranging. As you know, soon after he landed in Moscow he was invited to a private and informal dinner hosted by President Medvedev at his dacha outside Moscow. It was a beautiful setting, wintry Moscow evening with a lot of warmth indoors, and the conversation flowed very freely. The two leaders discussed the situation in our region after briefly dwelling on the bilateral relationship. The bilateral relations were discussed in-depth yesterday morning at the restricted-level talks, at the delegation-level talks. So, during the informal dinner they exchanged views on a wide range of topics.

They began with the issue of the Copenhagen Conference. President Medvedev is going there, as you know, and Prime Minister will also be there at the Summit on the 17th and 18th of December. Then they spoke briefly of the Inter-Government Agreement (IGA) on Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy that we initialed yesterday, and how important this agreement is in terms of taking our cooperation forward in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. We will come to that later perhaps in the Question-Answer Session.

Then they discussed the situation in the region. They spoke of the situation in Afghanistan and Pakistan, briefly on relations with China, and the role of the G20 in the global economic and financial crisis and how Russia and India are viewing the current situation. They both felt some more time will be taken for a complete recovery of the state of global economic health. This was, as I said, an in-depth discussion. During this dinner, Mr. Sergey S. Sobyenin the Deputy Prime Minister was present. There was also Mr. Sergey V. Lavrov, the Foreign Minister and Sergei E. Prikhodko Aide to the President of Russia. From our side, National Security Advisor and I were there.

At the press conference yesterday addressed by both leaders you saw the statements, you heard them speak. I think it was evident to all of you the deep sense of conviction that exists on both sides about the validity and about the total credibility of this relationship in all fields. The agreements that we signed yesterday and the Joint Declaration, of course, have elaborated on the theme of this visit, I think very powerfully and eloquently.

Prime Minister's discussions with Prime Minister Putin were also very very good, extensive, in-depth. As you know, Prime Minister Putin, during his tenure as President of the Russian Federation, was instrumental in the creation of our Strategic Partnership in 2000. In many ways he is an architect of that partnership, has in many ways also seen it grow over the last few years and has been very open and vocal in his advocacy of a very close and intimate India-Russia relationship. That was very evident in his remarks at the delegation-level talks yesterday. The depth of detail and his knowledge of the finest features of this relationship were in evidence throughout.

He has obviously been monitoring progress on this relationship very closely with his aides and other departments of the Russian Government. So, we were able to have a little tour d'horizon of cooperation in defence, science and technology, space, of course the nuclear cooperation, cultural exchanges, trade and investment of course which is the new area of focus I think very legitimately and very validly, because the potential that exists for bigger and stronger relations in this field is recognized on both sides.

Trade still is at a rather low level considering the size. Both India and Russia are trillion dollar economies but we have at this moment a figure that really does not measure up to the potential. So, we have set targets not only for 2010, 10 billion dollars, but for 2015, 20 billion dollars. We hope the multiplication will go on and we will see dramatic increases of business and trade exchanges.

At the CEOs' Council which met yesterday, the best and brightest of Indian and Russian industry were present there. Both Prime Ministers addressed the CEOs' Council. You have seen the text of their remarks, I am sure. Following this there was a brief interaction. Because of paucity of time I guess we could not take it too much into the evening. From the Russian side they spoke of their interest especially in cooperation and business interaction in telecommunications, pharmaceuticals. And from our side we spoke of the potential and possibilities for Russian investment in our energy sector, in infrastructure development - which is a big strength on their side - and, of course, as they had also said, the telecommunications and pharmaceuticals. Especially in the development of generic drugs which Russia has great use for I think there was a very clear recognition from both sides that this is an area that we must devote and invest more resources, more time and more energy and focus not only at the Governmental level but at the level of the trade and business communities on both sides.

This morning, Prime Minister met with a group of Russian intellectuals drawn from think tanks and universities all of whom have distinguished themselves in various fields of research and intellectual activity. I am not just talking of India-Russia relations but I am talking of issues like relations between Russia and the United States, Russia and China, Afghanistan, sustainable development, Russia today. The whole issue of where Russia stands today after a period of great political change and transition over the last two decades was also very much in focus. So, this was a discussion that spread over a little over an hour.

There were four or five of these intellectuals who gave presentations to the Prime Minister, spoke on the topics I have just enumerated, after which Prime Minister addressed them and spoke about our deep interest in deepening more such discourse at the intellectual level because this relationship is also about ideas, about generating more ideas, more initiatives and the intellectual capital that sustains this relationship, that is the lifeblood, the oxygen of this relationship. Both sides recognized that we must ensure that there is perfect communication.

A lot of the intellectuals also mentioned that there is a great deal that needs to be done to close the knowledge gap between India and Russia because as times have changed and Russia has transitioned over the last few years - it is a proud democracy - there has been a lot of change in Russian society, in Russian politics. In the process perhaps the extent of focus as far as ordinary people are concerned and at the level of universities and academia on India has in a sense got diluted. I am not saying it has disappeared entirely. I believe that there is a very strong affirmative approach to India and to understanding India better. But now I think we would like to devote much more resources to understanding India more at the academic and intellectual level, at the level of the media, at the level of reporting on India, so that people in Russia could be more informed about developments, about the changes in India, about the strengths of our democracy, about the growth of our economy, the dynamism that is inherent in India's growth as an emerging world power today. All that needs to be articulated to the Russian people and that was also very much stressed by the intellectuals when they spoke to Prime Minister today. And likewise in India we need to do more to spread the word about developments in Russia. That was also stressed.

So, all in all, I believe this was a very satisfying visit and a very successful visit. I think we have reason to be very optimistic about the prospects for future growth of our relations with Russia. As you know, President Medvedev will visit India next year to carry forward the tradition of Annual Summits between our leaders, and Prime Minister Putin has also accepted our Prime Minister's invitation to visit India. That visit is in all likelihood going to take place in March, 2010. So, at the level of the Government of India, at the Foreign Ministry level we have a lot of work, a lot of preparations to complete.

In conclusion I would like to say that this has been a very productive visit and has fulfilled all our expectations. Thank you.

Question: We have this Climate Change Summit round the corner. What was the nature of discussion between our Prime Minister and the Russian President on this particular issue? Could you throw some light on that? Secondly, at the CEOs' Council meeting, did the Russian businessmen flag any areas of concern? If they did, what was PM's response?

Foreign Secretary: On the second question first. This is the first meeting really of the CEOs' Council. Of course, the CEOs are continuing their deliberations. They are having meetings beyond what we had yesterday. So, obviously the practical issues that crop up between the business communities of the two sides when they engage in commercial activity would obviously be discussed at that level. Obviously there is a lot that needs to be clarified, needs to be streamlined, and needs to be made easier when it comes to doing business between the two countries. But suffice it to say that at the political level there is a clear sense of direction that we must move forward, that we must remove any roadblocks and obstacles that exist and make doing business easier between the two countries. We are not shying away from recognizing that if the potential has to be realized, and it will be realized, we have to create a bigger bandwidth literally. In the figurative sense we need better bandwidth. But at the CEOs' meeting yesterday we did not really go into these issues. It was basically a very positive and a very forward-looking vision that even the business communities, the CEOs had. They were the top CEOs of both countries there. Mr. Evtushenkov, the Co-Chair from the Russian side, spoke of his very close attachment to India and how this has grown with every visit he has made and he was very positive.

On the Copenhagen Summit, this was touched upon in the meeting between Prime Minister and President Medvedev at the dacha dinner that they had. Both of them are going to Copenhagen. Both leaders said that we should work to build that level of consensus that can ensure a successful and equitable outcome for the Conference of Parties at Copenhagen.

Question: Good afternoon, Madam. Just to take forward whatever you have said on the CEOs' Council meeting, off the record lots of Indian CEOs say law and order situation is not right in Russia and it is a very difficult country to do business in. In fact, one CEO even said if our men have to be beaten up by them, they might as well be beaten up in Bihar, why should I send them to Russia? Was this specifically discussed?

Foreign Secretary: No, it was not discussed at that time. As I said, they are having further meetings. I agree with you that we have to be frank and we have to be open in this communication and we have that level of confidence on both sides. I think it is necessary that we are able to articulate whatever concerns we have and see how best these can be sorted out. For business to move forward obviously you must have a climate that is conducive to transact business.

Question: Secondly, Madam, yesterday after the briefing the JS(XP) told us that Admiral Gorshkov deal was done but there were no details forthcoming. Can we have details of the price and the delivery schedule?

Foreign Secretary: No. I am afraid I cannot give you any details. The Russian team is in Delhi at the moment. The negotiating team is in Delhi. I think we moved closer to finalization of a price and we will have to go through the necessary procedures and clearances before we can officially announce it. I would not be able to disclose anything to the media at the moment.

Question: Madam, I want to just take you to the Joint Statement. There is a reference in it to the shared perceptions on good Taliban and bad Taliban. Can you just give us a little bit of a context of where that comes from and why?

Foreign Secretary: Yes, the facile distinctions, false distinctions between good and bad Taliban. I think Russia and India are on the same page when it comes to recognizing the very serious dimensions of the clear and present danger that we face from terrorism and extremism in the Afghanistan-Pakistan region. The Russians also together with us do not see any validity in the argument that you can distinguish between so-called good and bad Taliban. That distinction just does not exist. Terrorism, extremism in this region are all interconnected. Countries like India and Russia face a similar threat. That is the basis of the arguments that we have put forward as far as the situation in Afghanistan is concerned and how we see the activities of the Taliban. What also came across very clearly in the discussions that Prime Minister had with President Medvedev was that Russia, like India, sees the need for effective tackling of the situation in Pakistan, if you have to come to a satisfactory conclusion of settling the terrorist problems that afflict Afghanistan at the moment.

Question: Madam, you said India-Russia relationship is very close and we have had Foreign Office consultations earlier also. What happened to the issue of Russians in India who want to convert their visas into work visas? And why are work permits of Indians not being extended in Russia? I think this has been raised several times. First-time visitors to Russia are detained for long hours at the Russian airports.

Foreign Secretary: As far as the issue of employment visas for Russian experts, particularly the government experts who are engaged in defence cooperation projects and also the Kudankulam project, we have worked out arrangements. We have decided to extend their business visas up to 31st December. We have also worked out an arrangement whereby the government experts will be able to have their business visas converted into employment visas in situ. They do not have to leave the country for that. But as far as the other categories of businessmen and other experts who are in India on business visas, they will of course have to go through the normal processes, leave the country and then apply for employment visas and come back. But I think it has been streamlined to a large extent. In fact, this issue was not raised during this visit. On the Indians in Russia, we are engaged in discussions at the consular level between the Foreign Ministries of the two sides and we hope that we can come to a satisfactory solution soon.

Question: Madam, Russia has endorsed our candidature for permanent seat in the UN Security Council. What scope do you see for that? Secondly, what in your view are the implications of our relationship and our cooperation with Russia for our cooperation with the US?

Foreign Secretary: On the issue of India's candidature for a permanent seat on the UN Security Council, I trust you have read the reference in the Joint Declaration. Russia has been a strong supporter of our candidature. This is an issue on which, of course, discussions are ongoing within the United Nations. As you know, we are part of the G4 - the Group of Four countries, Japan, Brazil, Germany and India - and we work together. We consult with each other in taking our strategies forward on this issue. Obviously, we have to build a range of support for our case and this is exactly what Government is engaged in at the moment. Our candidature is a very serious one. We feel that by every definition India's case to become a permanent member of the UN Security Council is a very legitimate one. Many of our friends and partners recognize that and endorse our candidature. But obviously there is more work that needs to be done and this is exactly what we are doing within the United Nations. There is also the case for our candidature for a non-permanent seat, which we are contesting for next year. This is also a campaign that is underway and all the time we are increasingly gathering support for our case.

To answer your second question, we have said very clearly that each relationship stands on its own. As far as Russia is concerned, it was said on many occasions during this visit, our relations with other countries do not in any way affect the stability, the solidity and the vitality of our relations with Russia. With the United States, Prime Minister's recent visit to the United States has underlined the importance that we attach to our strategic and global partnership with the United States. This was elaborated in many ways during the recent visit that Prime Minister had to Washington. It just demonstrates the strengths and the effectiveness of India's foreign policy today that we are able to build these very substantive relationships with key partners, and I refer to the United States and Russia.

Question: Madam, the Petroleum Secretary is traveling with the Prime Minister. Any firm proposals that were discussed in the energy sector, especially Sakhalin-III which is up for auction?

Foreign Secretary: Let me say in case you have not heard of this as yet - this is fresh from the oven - OVL and the Sistema have signed a Memorandum of Understanding this morning, where both sides will jointly source oil and gas assets in Russia and other CIS countries. This is just as of this morning. There are obviously enormous prospects for oil and natural gas cooperation between India and several of the Russian companies because Russia has the largest gas reserves in the world. Now, talking of participation in Sakhalin-III, ONGC and Gazprom have been talking about this for some time. This is about jointly working on the Sakhalin-III project. The decision on the involvement of foreign participation in these projects is expected in early 2010. So, we have stressed our interest even during this visit in the discussions we had at the delegation-level talks yesterday.

Question: What was the response on the Russian side?

Foreign Secretary: Very positive. I think at the political level the response has been very positive. Obviously we have to work out these details. These are commercial transactions. But OVL and ONGC particularly remains in very close touch with Russian side. Of course, there is also interest in participation in the Trebs and Titov projects in Timan-Pechora region. Again since the ONGC and Rosneft have a very good record of cooperation, a very successful relationship in Sakhalin-I, we hope that the discussions on these projects will also move forward.

Question: Away from Russia to the US. FBI has formally charged David Coleman Headley for his role in 26/11 attacks. Will India seek his extradition for 26/11 crimes?

Foreign Secretary: I have of course not seen the details because we have been on this trip. I am aware that the details have been released about the investigations that are going on in the David Headley case in the United States. We will have to go back and study this a little more closely. Obviously, we would like to have access in order to interrogate these accused persons. We have been in close touch with the Americans. This is not just today or yesterday. Our contact with the American side, with the FBI on this has been underway for some weeks now. This is a matter that is under investigation. So, at this moment I do not want to say much more than this. I think you should also address this to the Home Ministry. I understand that the investigations have revealed a lot of very incriminating evidence about the involvement of David Headley in planning the 26/11 attacks and also on possible leads about involvement of persons and conspirators on the Pakistan side also.

Question: Madam, of late there have been a lot of violations on Indo-China border. Did our Prime Minister discuss this with Russian President or Prime Minister about these incursions by China? Both are engaging China. That is right. But since Russia is our good and time-tested friend, did you get some assurance or some sort of a positive response regarding our case?

Foreign Secretary: I think you are approaching this whole issue from a different angle. We did not go to Russia to seek assurances from the Russian side on China. I think the opportunity was availed of during the discussions Prime Minister had with President Medvedev to discuss the relationship that we are developing with China, and of course the complexities in this relationship. The outstanding boundary question naturally figured in these discussions and the efforts that are underway to seek a resolution to this issue and also, as I said, the complicated nature of the question as it exists today. We did not go into detail about Chinese incursions. We talked about the rise of China, naturally, and the relationship that Russia has with China today, the relationship that we are seeking to build with China, and also the Russia-India-China trilateral arrangement that we have put in place. As you know, the Foreign Ministers of the three countries just met in Bangalore in October. The Russian side and the Indian side, were able to talk about the trilateral cooperation also because trilaterally this concept has acquired more and more substance as these meetings have taken place. We are talking about cooperation in agriculture, in healthcare, at the level of political scientists of the two countries, business and trade ties. So, obviously there has been some momentum that has been created. The Russian side is aware of the complex nature of our relationship with China, the fact that we are obviously closely monitoring the situation in our border areas, the fact that we have taken up with China on every occasion the transgressions that have occurred into our territory, and the need for both sides to maintain a peaceful situation in the border areas.

Question: When this question came up, what was the reaction of the Russian leaders?

Foreign Secretary: The Russian leaders spoke about the history of their relationship with China and the fact that they had an outstanding border problem with China until a few years ago and that they settled it a couple of years ago. They fully recognize that border issues are complicated issues. They spoke of their own experience in this regard.

Question: Madam, yesterday President Medvedev in the Joint Press Conference had said that there are a lot of concerns about the nuclear arsenals of states, he referred to Iran, and called for a tighter control over the nuclear arsenal. Has India raised its worries with Russia regarding the safety of nuclear arsenal in Pakistan?

Foreign Secretary: The issue did come up briefly during the informal dinner that President Medvedev hosted in honour of Prime Minister the day before yesterday. We have on many occasions spoken and expressed our hope and our expectation that Pakistan will continue to safeguard its nuclear assets in a manner that ensures that there is no threat to our region. The Russian side is also sensitized to this issue. I think this was reflected in President Medvedev's response to us. They also discussed, of course, the Iran nuclear issue and recent developments relating to that.

Foreign Secretary: Thank you.

676. Suo Motu Statement in Parliament by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on the Prime Minister's visit to Russia.

New Delhi, December 16, 2009.

I rise to inform the House of the main outcomes of the Hon'ble Prime Minister's recent visit to Russia.

2. The Prime Minister visited Moscow from December 6 to 8 for the Annual India-Russia Summit; these summits have been held regularly since the bilateral relationship was re-energised with the Declaration on Strategic Partnership in 2000. This was the Prime Minister's second visit to Russia in the year 2009, after the visit in June to Yekaterinburg for the multilateral summits of the BRIC (Brazil Russia India China) grouping and the SCO (Shanghai Cooperation Organisation).

3. The Annual Summit marked the culmination of a period of intense high-level engagement with Russia. Rashtrapatiji was in Russia on a very successful State visit in September, 2009. While the Annual Summit remains the principal vehicle to drive the Strategic Partnership, a very effective and robust institutional mechanism is in place to stimulate various aspects of the partnership. I had the opportunity to carry out a detailed review of bilateral relations, as the co-Chair of the Indo-Russian Inter-Governmental Commission, which held its 15th meeting in Moscow in October. My counterpart, Russian Deputy Prime Minister Sergei Sobyenin, visited India last month to prepare further for the Prime Minister's visit. My Cabinet colleagues for Defence, Commerce & Industry and Petroleum & Natural Gas also visited Russia in recent months for discussions on cooperation in specific sectors under their charge. In November, I also had the opportunity to host in Bangalore the ninth trilateral meeting of the Foreign Ministers of India, Russia and China.

4. During his visit, Prime Minister had detailed talks with his host President Dmitry Medvedev and also with Prime Minister Vladimir Putin. The talks covered a wide range of bilateral as well as regional and global matters. Both Russian leaders expressed a strong desire to deepen the traditional friendship and expand it in different directions.

5. Prime Minister and President Medvedev released a Joint Declaration between our countries on "deepening the strategic partnership to meet global challenges". This Declaration reaffirms that the strategic partnership between us is a key foreign policy priority for both countries. It also emphasises that the enduring friendship between India and Russia is mutually beneficial, has stood the test of time, and has emerged as a factor of peace and stability in the region and the world. The Declaration reflects the strong coincidence in the views of the two countries on regional and global issues.

6. The two sides extensively reviewed economic and trade ties. It was felt that trade had lagged behind the potential at a level of around US$ 7 billion in 2008. The positive news is that despite the global economic downturn, India-Russian trade is expected to grow at about 8 per cent in the calendar year. A target of US$ 20 billion has been set up for the year 2015. An agreement was signed between the Russian Bank for Development and Economic Affairs (Vnesheconombank) and the EXIM Bank of India, extending a line of credit of 100 million dollars for financing the export of Indian equipment, technology, goods and services to Russia.

7. In order to give a fillip to business level ties, the Prime Minister and Prime Minister Putin attended a meeting with CEOs of the largest and most dynamic companies on both sides, and discussed ways of promoting trade. The two sides identified enormous opportunities for investments in India in infrastructure development; in the pharmaceutical sector (including the joint development of new technologies in health) and also in telecommunications.

8. Substantive discussions were also held with the Russian leadership on cooperation in the field of hydrocarbon energy. ONGC (Videsh) Ltd made investments of more than US$ 2.7 billion in the Sakhalin I project, which have ensured both energy security and profit. Both sides expressed a desire to build upon this cooperation through joint ventures and joint projects in new areas of promise in the Russian North and East for exploration of oil and gas. A Memorandum of Understanding was signed between ONGC and the Russian company Sistema for possible cooperation and joint projects in the oil sector.

9. The two sides finalised negotiations on an agreement on cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, and initialled the agreed text during the visit. The Agreement envisages several areas for cooperation, including research & development, construction of nuclear power plants and supply of nuclear fuels.

10. Russia's desire to intensify R&D cooperation is reflective of India's achievements in nuclear science and technology. Hon'ble Members are aware that cooperation in the field of atomic energy has been continuing with Russia for more than two decades. We have an existing agreement of 1998 for cooperation in the construction of two 1000 MW nuclear power units. In December, 2008, we concluded an agreement for four additional units at Kudankulum. The Government of India has also recently allocated one more site in Haripur (West Bengal) for nuclear power reactors supplied by Russia.

11. Cooperation in the area of defence remains an important element of the India-Russia relationship. The defence relationship has moved far beyond a simple buyer-seller equation to also encompass joint design and production of defence equipment. The two sides reviewed the status of the ongoing defence cooperation and projects. Three agreements on defence cooperation were signed during the visit. One of these is an agreement extending bilateral military and technical cooperation for ten years beyond 2010. The agreement would facilitate access for our defence forces and defence industry to latest Russian equipment and technology, including for indigenous production. It provides the framework for acquisition, licensed production, upgrades and modernisation of defence equipment as well as the development of new and advanced weapon systems. Another agreement signed relates to after-sales support for the Russian arms and military equipment supplied to India. This agreement would facilitate timely and adequate supply of spares and services for integrated maintenance of Russian-made military equipment supplied to India.

12. The two sides also discussed the long-standing Indo-Russian programme for cooperation in the space sector. It was decided to step up cooperation based on existing agreements in the flagship GLONASS (Global Navigational Satellite System) programme. Both sides expressed satisfaction at the pace of progress in other joint projects like Chandrayan 2 and YOUTHSAT.

13. Cultural exchanges and people to people contacts are a key element in the deepening of Indo-Russian relationship. An agreement was signed during the visit, on the programme of cultural exchanges between the two countries for the period 2010 to 2012. The 'Year of India' in Russia has just concluded with more than 150 different events in 2009, following up on the 'Year of Russia' in India in 2008. The scheduled closing ceremony was cancelled as a mark of respect for the victims of the fire tragedy in the Russian city of Perm. Prime Minister expressed the condolences of the people of India for this tragic event.

14. India and Russia have similar views on regional and international matters. On the situation in Pakistan, both sides expressed concern at the rise in the level of terrorist violence. On Afghanistan, the two sides emphasized the importance of continued engagement of the global community and agreed that drawing facile distinctions between 'good' and 'bad' Taliban could be counterproductive.

15. On the eve of his departure for Moscow, Prime Minister said that he proposed to discuss with the Russian leadership steps to raise our Strategic Partnership to the next level. It is clear from the outcomes of the visit that the relationship has indeed risen to a higher plane. The momentum imparted to the Strategic Partnership by PM's visit, will be sustained next year by the visit of Prime Minister Putin in March and President Medvedev later in the year for the next Annual Summit.

Madrid, April 21, 2009.

Hon'ble Mayor,

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen.

I am delighted to be here today in this most resplendent City Hall. Madrid has had the honoured status of the capital city of Spain for over four hundred years. While it possesses a modern, cutting edge and almost futuristic, infrastructure, it has preserved the look and feel of its rich history. Through its enormous contribution to all spheres of life, Madrid is truly the heart and soul of Spain. It is a welcoming city and a true meeting point of different cultures.

We are keen to strengthen our bilateral relations with Spain and I have no doubt that the city of Madrid will play an increasingly larger role, be it in the trade, economic and financial aspects or in the cultural, educational and scientific spheres.

Honoring me with the Key to the City of Madrid today, Hon'ble Mayor, manifests the sentiments of friendship and warmth that the people of Madrid have for India and its people. I reciprocate this gesture and wish to convey greetings, as much from the people of India as on my own account: May all the Madrilenos and Spaniards be blessed with success and prosperity as they endeavour to scale new heights!

Madrid, April 21, 2009.

Your Excellency President Bono,

Your Excellency President Rojo,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is my first visit to this wonderful country and I am delighted to be here. Spain is well known for its rich cultural heritage, its beautiful landscape and its friendly people. At the outset, I want to convey the warm greetings of the people of India to the people of Spain.

I feel privileged to have been received at the Congress. I am grateful for the courtesies shown. I shall treasure the mementoes that I have received on behalf of the Congress and the Senate.

Bilateral relations between India and Spain have always been cordial and have gained momentum in recent years. We whole heartedly support this trend. My visit to Spain is an expression of the importance that India attaches to a strong relationship with Spain. We seek to promote ties in all fields - political, trade and investment, cooperation in mutually beneficial areas like renewable energy, agriculture and tourism as also enhanced cultural exchanges.

The contribution of parliamentary institutions in this endeavour is crucial. I was glad to learn that parliamentary delegations from both sides have exchanged visits. The President of your Senate had led a delegation to India about two years ago and our Minister for Parliamentary Affairs and Deputy Chairman of the Upper House had visited Spain shortly before that. Such parliamentary exchanges enable a better understanding of each other's political processes. They need to be enhanced.

Both India and Spain are democratic states. The values that are the bedrock of our parliamentary system are tolerance, respect for diversity, freedom of expression and equality before the law. There is full participation of all citizens in the political, economic and cultural lives of our countries. Our representative institutions derive their power and authority from the people.

The biggest democratic exercise on earth is apace in India now. We have had 14 national elections to Parliament since our country became independent in 1947. We are currently conducting the 15th General Elections and would elect members to the Lok Sabha - the Lower House of our Parliament. Our election process is gigantic in scale. We have 714 million voters. On account of the large numbers involved and the geographical expanse of the country, the electoral exercise, which began on 16th April, will be completed in five phases, spread over a period of 4 weeks. The physical casting of ballot papers has been replaced gradually by electronic voting machines in the entire country, which has helped in faster counting of votes and declaration of results.

The democratic system in India has also been strengthened at the grassroots level. 3.2 million persons out of which 1.2 million are women have been elected as representatives to institutions of local self-government in the villages and municipalities of India. This is by far the largest number of elected representatives ever in history, or anywhere in the contemporary world. It is with the full participation of its people that India is building its future. We are an old civilization but a young nation, with a large majority of a youth population. We aspire for growth and prosperity based on our age old values of harmony and tolerance.

Excellencies,

As I mentioned earlier, the bilateral relationship between India and Spain has been growing in all spheres - political, commercial and cultural. Trade has grown five times to over US $ 4.5 billion in 2008 from US $ 900 million in 2000. Both trade and investment flows need to be further bolstered. It is for this reason that I have a business delegation accompanying me. People-to-people contacts between us are increasing through more frequent travels between the two countries. I am glad that there have been regular cultural exchanges between both countries. Let us work together to further strengthen friendship between our two countries.

I thank you for your kindness and your friendship and seek your continued cooperation in our common endeavour to deepen and diversify bonds between our two countries to the mutual benefit of our people.

Thank you.

682. Speech by the President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the State Banquet hosted in her honour by the King and Queen of Spain.

Madrid, April 21, 2009.

Your Majesties,

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

As I undertake this first State Visit by the President of India to Spain, I recall what Gurudev Rabindranath Tagore wrote to Zenobia Jimenez, the wife of the Spanish poet Juan Ramon, in October 1918: "there is something in the atmosphere, and in the physical aspects of your motherland somewhat similar to those in ours" These are also my impressions. The beauty of your country and the affection of the people are obvious attractions. I am deeply honoured by the warmth of the hospitality extended to me and my delegation.

I bring with me the greetings and good wishes of the people of India.

Relations between India and Spain are warm and friendly. The visit of the President of the Government of Spain, His Excellency Mr. Zapatero, to India in July 2006 was successful in providing an impetus to the bilateral relationship and the intensification of our bilateral engagement across various sectors. Subsequent Ministerial, Parliamentary and Track Two exchanges have maintained the regularity in bilateral exchanges.

An important area of congruence in our approach is the fight against terrorism. Terrorism is a scourge that both Spain and India face. Spain's message of solidarity and support after the Mumbai attacks were heartfelt and sincere, and we appreciate them.

We value the interest that Spain's business and industry show in India. Our bilateral trade has been growing significantly year on year and that is appropriate, bearing in mind the size and standing of the economies of our two countries. The challenge now is to give a fillip to the investment relationship, and I understand that in this globalised environment, Indian investors are looking at Spain, and at the same time, we would like India to be an investment destination for Spanish investors. I am also convinced that there are many other areas of cooperation waiting to be tapped for the mutual benefit of our people, for instance, renewable energy, agriculture and tourism.

The links between India and Spain cover many dimensions. The human element is particularly important in this context. The impressive number of Spanish travellers who visit India each year are also a valued resource in introducing the Indian kaleidoscope to Spain. The friendly spirit with which the varied aspects of Indian culture are received in Spain is heartwarming. These include the more than 500 Yoga ashrams in this country that offer an introduction to India's philosophy of life and healthy existence. For the youth and the students of the two countries to have opportunities to interact, our Universities should be encouraged to have exchange programmes that are mutually beneficial.

I wish to make particular reference at this point to the interest that has been shown in contemporary Indian art in recent months. There have been several splendid exhibitions of Indian art that culminated in the Madrid Contemporary Art Fair - ARCO. These have introduced another facet of the Indian landscape in Spain.

The India - Spain partnership progresses not only at the bilateral level but also at the multilateral and the EU levels. India particularly looks forward to the EU presidency of Spain during the first half of 2010, and hopes that India's Strategic Partnership with the EU would further strengthen during this period.

India looks at Spain as a friend. We seek to strengthen the bridges of friendship. There is potential for enhancing our relations in a wide range of fields and it is time to realize the concrete possibilities that exist between our countries.

Your Majesties, we in India fondly remember your visit to India close to three decades ago, in 1982. You were with us to share our joy as we celebrated our Republic Day - commemorating the day on which we adopted our Constitution. India has changed much since then and we hope Your Majesties will be able to undertake another journey to India at an early date to not only personally observe these changes but to add momentum to our bilateral relations.

May I now request all of you to join me in a toast: -

- to the good health and well-being of His Majesty the King of Spain and of Her Majesty the Queen of Spain;
- to the success and prosperity of the people of Spain; and
- to enduring friendship between India and Spain.

683. Speech by President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Business meeting.

Madrid, April 22, 2009.

Leaders of the Business Delegation from India,

Businesspersons from Spain and India,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am delighted to be here today at this joint meeting of the Spanish and Indian Industry. I appreciate greatly the initiative of the organizers of this extremely useful interaction. I especially thank Spain's major institutions, the Superior Council and the Confederation of Employers and Industries, and also the Indian side of the organizers, namely, the Confederation of Indian Industry, the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry and ASSOCHAM who have worked hard to realize this event.

It is a matter of satisfaction to see that trade between our two countries is growing. Last year our bilateral trade crossed the figure of US $ 4.5 billion. In the last two years it has grown over 50 per cent. Indian companies are present in Spain in the automobile, software, pharmaceutical, energy and infrastructure sectors and are doing well. Many Spanish companies are already present and active in India and thus aware of our growth story.

The Indian economy has witnessed an impressive growth of 9 percent in the last four years. Even today in the midst of the financial crisis, our economy is holding its ground well as compared to many others. Though our growth rate has been affected and fell to 7 percent in 2008, we expect to achieve a similar growth rate in 2009. Our objective remains to grow at between 9 to 10 per cent on a sustainable basis so that we can make a major dent on poverty. To sustain this level of growth, India needs to further strengthen infrastructure building. We have calculated that our needs in the next 5 years would be US$ 700 billion.

Your interaction with each other today would, I hope, set in motion, long-term collaboration based on the complementarities of our two economies. I would like to highlight six sectors where I see clear synergies between our two countries: infrastructure development, renewable energy, agriculture, R&D, tourism and cooperation in Latin America.

India is committed to creating world class infrastructure in highways, railways, seaports, airports, telecommunications, power generation, logistic parks, cargo handling, and warehouses and so on. Spanish enterprises are well known for executing large-scale projects in infrastructure and we invite them to take a closer look at opportunities unfolding in India in infrastructure development.

Energy is a vital sector for us - over 90 thousand Megawatts of new generation capacity is required in the next seven years and a corresponding investment is required in transmission and distribution networks. As we strive to meet our energy needs, we want to reduce our dependence on traditional sources of energy and increase the share of clean, new and renewable energy sources; in this endeavor, we are desirous of benefiting from Spain's expertise.

Agriculture is an area of priority for us. Last year, our rural market grew at an impressive rate of 25 percent compared to the 7 to 10 percent growth rate of the urban consumer retail market. We want to strengthen growth in agriculture and believe we can benefit from what Spain has achieved in the agricultural sector.

Given its very large pool of highly qualified and trained manpower, India offers attractive possibilities in joint research and development. We can forge mutually beneficial partnerships in areas as diverse as Information Technology, biotech, renewable energy and industrial design.

We wish to further develop our tourism industry. Spain is a world leader in this sector. The wide diversity of Spain's topography ranging from mountains to beaches has been developed well as tourist resorts. As a sub-continent, India too has vast and diverse landscapes and it has a rich cultural heritage. We would like to benefit from Spain's capabilities, capacities and experiences in all segments of the tourism industry including construction and operation of hotels, cruises, maintenance and management of heritage sites and development of other related infrastructure. This sector is open for 100 percent FDI through the automatic route and offers great potential.

In India, small and medium enterprises play a very important role in the economic and business activities of the country. They have added resilience to our economy and are the agents of growth. I understand that in Spain there are a significant number of SMEs in many sectors. Businesspersons of the two countries in this segment should also look at exploring investment opportunities and working together.

We recognize the major influence of Spain in the Latin American region and look forward to working together in exploring mutually beneficial business opportunities in that region. India is now increasingly focused on that region. My very first overseas visit as President was to Brazil, Chile and Mexico.

Our intensified engagement through mutual investments and projects would also have a favourable impact on our bilateral trade. Let us make it a joint endeavor to double our trade in five years.

Before I end, I want to compliment the Spanish business community who are steadfast in their endeavor to further relations with India. Some of them were in Mumbai in the hotels attacked by the terrorists in November last year. I was deeply touched to know that after coming back, they recommended that other delegations from Spain should continue with plans to visit India the very next month.

Ladies and Gentlemen, given the wide spectrum of areas in which our two countries can work together, I am confident that the members of my business delegation and their Spanish counterparts would have satisfactory discussions leading to productive relationships. Many centuries ago, Columbus had sailed for India. I can see the enterprising spirit of Columbus amongst the entrepreneurs and businesspersons present here. May you sail to India for trade, business ventures and investment. I wish you success in this endeavour.

Thank you.

UKRAINE*685. Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on humanitarian medical assistance to Ukraine to contain outbreak of influenza A (H1N1).*New Delhi, November 16, 2009.

In response to the appeal of the Government of Ukraine for humanitarian medical assistance following the outbreak of influenza A (H1N1) epidemic in certain western regions of Ukraine, and taking into account the close and friendly relations between the two countries, the Government of India has decided to urgently donate medicines worth one million US dollars to Ukraine.

As soon as the details of the requirements of specific medicines are finalized, arrangements would be made to rush the supplies to Ukraine.

The humanitarian medical assistance extended by the Government of India would be in addition to the significant donation of medicines already made separately by Indian pharmaceutical companies that have operations in Ukraine. These Indian companies, which are among the largest suppliers of medicines to the Ukrainian market, have come forward on their own to help Ukraine battle the current influenza epidemic.

UNITED KINGDOM*686. Joint Press Interaction of External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee and the Foreign Secretary of U. K. David Milliband.*New Delhi, January 13, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good afternoon to you all and welcome to the Joint Press Interaction.

First, the External Affairs Minister of India would be making a statement; next, the Rt. Hon. Foreign Secretary of UK would be making a statement. Sir, the floor is yours.

External Affairs Minister (Shri Pranab Mukherjee): Thank you.

Your Excellency, good afternoon. First of all, let me express my regret that we have kept you waiting because we were deeply engaged in conversation, both myself and Secretary Milliband.

I have had a very useful exchange of views and assessments with British Foreign Secretary Milliband. We have had exhaustive discussions covering bilateral, regional and multilateral affairs. India-UK relationship is unique in its historic depth, its complexity and ability to reinvent itself to meet contemporary needs. Our strategic partnership provides the basis for our multi-faceted interaction. Our strong political and economic ties continue to be the foundation of our partnership. Education, research and innovation are assuming importance in the India-UK engagement.

We spent significant time discussing the menace of terrorism, especially the cross-border terrorism, of which India has been a victim. We devoted attention to the terrorist attacks on Mumbai and the way to bring the perpetrators to justice. We have already shared with the British Government the evidence that has emerged linking the attacks with Pakistan. I stressed the need for concerted international pressure on Pakistan to take firm action.

Thank you and now I leave the floor to His Excellency Foreign Secretary Milliband.

Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom (Mr. David Milliband): Foreign Minister, friend, Pranab, it is a great privilege to be back in India and to be in India discussing with you big issues of bilateral, regional and international concern. I think that it is important to start by saying that we see India as the success story of this region, the success story politically, economically; the success story that in many ways is a beacon around the world as well as around the region. This is in a spirit of partnership and shared endeavour that I am here today.

When I came to India two years ago, I talked about the relationship between Britain and India now being a partnership of equals. Two years ago that was symbolized by the fact that Indian investment in Britain had overtaken British investment in India.

External Affairs Minister of India: Last year.

Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom: But it is a partnership of equals that exists from our Prime Ministers down. And our Prime Ministers worked very closely together when they were Finance Ministers and they have carried on that partnership; and I am delighted that we have been able to take forward our work not just meeting in London, not just talking on the telephone, not just meeting at Commonwealth and other meetings but also having the chance to start our dialogue here.

As you say, we have had an exhaustive dialogue, not yet an exhausting one, an exhaustive dialogue that has focused on what you rightly described as the menace that terrorism has shown itself to be in India over the last couple of months. But, of course, you have also pointed out to me that throughout 2008 Indian society was punctuated by a series of terrorist attacks of which the Mumbai terror was only the largest example. We are absolutely clear about the origins of this terrorist attack, and also about the responsibilities that exist in Pakistan to bring the perpetrators to justice. That is something that we have made clear to the Pakistanis directly and will continue to do so.

We also believe strongly that the response of the Indian Government to the Mumbai attacks both in terms of the strengthening of its internal defences but also in the way it has pursued a regional strategy of wisdom and of strength has been exactly the right response. And it is a response that has shown I think a maturity and a determination to tackle the roots of this problem that is wholly correct.

I think that it is also important to stress that there are hundreds of thousands of British citizens of Indian origin and of Pakistani origin who want nothing more than to see these two countries finding a way to live together and they support each other. And that is something that is a message that I want to bring from the British communities both of Indian and of Pakistani origin who continue to follow events in this part of the world extremely closely, as you know.

I think it is also important to say that as we move into the next part of our discussions, we will look beyond the region to some of the international issues that confront policy-makers. Notably in the foreign policy arena they relate to issues of nuclear proliferation, which is a major concern, they relate to issues of international governance where Britain has put itself at the forefront of calls for reform of the United Nations to give greater weight to countries like India.

And, of course, also the economic crisis that is a global crisis and which has precipitated a series of international meetings that will now culminate in London of the so-called G20, which I think has broken the stranglehold that the G8 previously had on economic debate. I know that Prime Minister Brown values very very highly the dialogue that he has been having and he will continue to have with Prime Minister Singh about how to address the economic issues. And we certainly see the G20 Summit in London not just as an opportunity to send the very clear message about coordinated action for growth, for jobs, as well as on the environment, but also to send a message about how the world needs to govern itself in the future with full and active Indian participation.

So, I am glad to be here and look forward to further talks today with the Prime Minister and with the Home Affairs Minister as well as taking forward my visit to India into rural India tomorrow and to Mumbai on Thursday.

Thank you very much indeed.

Official Spokesperson: Now the leaders will take two questions from each side. Given the time constraints, I would earnestly request you to restrict yourself to one question to one leader.

Question (Mr. Ajay Kaul, Press Trust of India): My question is addressed to the Foreign Secretary. India has shared evidence about Mumbai attacks with Britain. Do you think it is credible and actionable? Also, do you agree with India's assessment that official agencies of Pakistan could be involved?

Foreign Secretary: I think that the intelligence sharing in respect of the Mumbai attacks has been two way. We have been very committed to make sure that any British expertise is at the disposal of Indian and Pakistani authorities. In respect of the links back to Pakistan, I think those are clear. I have said publicly that I do not believe that the attacks were directed by the Pakistani State. And I think it is important to restate that. What is relevant is the approach of the Pakistani State to the LeT organization and the way the Pakistani State takes on the menace of the LeT organization.

Our approach to the Government of Pakistan has and will continue to be that it is clear where responsibility lies for the Mumbai attacks, with the LeT. It is, therefore, secondarily clear that the Pakistani Government and the whole of the Pakistani state apparatus have a primary responsibility, a fundamental responsibility, to tackle the roots of this organization and to develop new strategies for doing so. That is something that I think is very important that we use our links to Pakistan to take forward and that is certainly what we are determined to do.

Question (Ms Alex Crawford, Sky News): Hi, Mr. Milliband! I just wanted to ask a couple of questions. First of all, what are present options if this political strong arming against Pakistan does not yield any results, and so far it does not seem to have? Secondly, do you think the fraud exposed in Satyam Computers has blown a hole in the international confidence in India's IT sector? And, Mr. Mukherjee, if I could, how happy are you with the international community's response in the wake of the Mumbai attacks?

Foreign Secretary: Britain has a very strong historical interest, a very strong current cultural interest, and a very strong current geopolitical interest in Pakistan's political development as a more stable civilian-led democracy, but also its economic development and its security development. And the truth is that Pakistan is vital for the security of India, but also vital for the security of Afghanistan. Our engagement with the still relatively new civilian Government in Pakistan but also with other aspects of other organs of the Pakistani state is dedicated very very clearly to say that the modern threat to Pakistan comes from within its own borders, and comes from the terrorism that has claimed the life of Benazir Bhutto in 2007, and has led to a series of terrorist incidents in Pakistan and in India as well. And we see the correct approach as being what the Pakistani authorities call a multi-pronged approach, a security approach, a political approach, and an economic approach. That in our view is the correct strategy. But the difficult thing in counterinsurgency is not to write a strategy; the difficult thing in counterinsurgency is to put it into practice. And that is what the Pakistani Government need to do, and that is what they will have our full support in doing. And I believe that it is very very important that all friends of Pakistan and all friends of stability in Pakistan take forward that multi-pronged agenda as clearly as possible, and that is certainly what I am determined to do and what the British Government is determined to do.

Finally, in respect of the recent economic news in India, I do not believe that one bad apple means that the whole barrel is wrong. Quite the opposite, I think India's economic development has been based on real, sound macroeconomics, on entrepreneurial spirit, and on a zeal for innovation that I think has been a model in many ways to many parts of the world. And I am sure that the Indian authorities will deal with the recent case, today's case, very clearly and very appropriately and already are doing so. And so, I think it will be quite a wrong lesson to learn that this problem is one that points to a wider contagion that you described. It needs to be addressed on its own merits. And, of course, the Indian laws in respect of corporate governance need to be implemented in a hardheaded and clear way.

External Affairs Minister: So far as the terrorist attack is concerned, yes, we have received overwhelming support from the international community. Every country has its own perception on how to deal with a situation. And we do believe that this is a problem which is to be addressed collectively by the international community so that the perpetrators of terror attacks are brought to justice. Attack on Mumbai by the terrorists need not be looked at through the prism of Indo-Pak relationship. It is a part of the global terrorist activities. Terrorism has no respect for any boundary. They simply believe in violence and destruction. Therefore, it is the biggest menace to the humanity and it is to be confronted.

In respect of the other areas I do agree with Foreign Secretary that Indian economy, basic fundamentals being strong, and that is why it has been possible despite the meltdown impact over the international money and finance to maintain a reasonable growth, even for this year we are expecting to have around seven to seven and a half per cent, because of our high rate of domestic savings, high rate of investments coming from the domestic savings itself. For example, 37 per cent is our rate of investment and our rate of domestic savings is as high as 35 per cent. Therefore, the marginal are coming from the external sources, we have been able to overcome the impact of the meltdown. And in respect of the recent development, appropriate steps will be taken. One need not hit the panic button for that.

Question (Ms Geeta Mohan, Headlines Today): My first question to Foreign Secretary, Mr. Milliband. The Lashkar-e-Toiba (LeT) had morphed into JuD. Now, despite a ban the JuD held a rally in Lahore under a new name flouting the UNSC directive. Pakistan has constantly been on a denial mode. As a Permanent Member of the UNSC, how do you propose to counter it? And then my question to Mr. Mukherjee. India wants the perpetrators of the Mumbai attacks to stand trial in India. But Prime Minister Gilani ruled out this option in a statement two days ago. What can India do now and would India accept anything short of extradition?

Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom: I think that the responsibilities of the Pakistani state are something that we look to them to fulfill as strong friends of the people of Pakistan, and also as a member of the UN Security Council. I think that the first priority is to bring the perpetrators of this to justice. Now, in this country you know there is a history of people being arrested and then not being prosecuted or brought to justice. In this case it is essential that those who have been arrested are brought to justice, and if they are found guilty then properly punished. And that is an appropriate response to the evidence that has been presented. There is an important legal system in Pakistan. The legal system showed its independence in 2008 in the campaign it led against the previous Musharraf Government. And I think that the lawyers and justices of Pakistan have shown themselves to be people who act without fear or favour.

And I think it is very very important, therefore, that those who have been arrested are brought to trial on the basis of the evidence that has been accumulated. I also think, however, that there is a more fundamental issue which is about how the Pakistani State like any other country challenged by domestic terrorist organization takes on that terrorist organization. And the fundamental way in which you beat a terrorist organization is to take it on politically. And it needs to be taken on politically by Pakistan's leaders in a very frontal and clear way because the truth is that the grievances that the LeT organization seeks to play on in no way justify the actions that they have taken. And the political future of Pakistan depends on focusing not on historic rights and wrongs but on current challenges. And those current challenges are domestic, internal Pakistani challenges - economic, social but also political. I think that many people agree that the history of Pakistan where half of its history has been under military rule is one that has been a recipe for the sort of instability that can, if one is not very careful, spread out across the region. And I think it is vital, therefore, that the civilian Government are helped to succeed in an economic and social and political project as well as the security project.

External Affairs Minister: I do hope Pakistan as a member of the international community, is obliged to implement all the international conventions, norms and resolutions adopted by the Security Council to implement anti-terror activities and mechanisms. And also Pakistan as member of SAARC is expected to implement the SAARC Anti Terror Convention and the Protocol of 2004. I do hope the materials which we have provided to Pakistan, evidences which we have given, they will act on it and they will ensure that the perpetrators of this terror act are brought to justice, and some of the fugitives violating Indian laws who have taken shelter in Pakistan will be handed over to India for their proper justice.

Official Spokesperson: I do seek your understanding and once again request you to please restrict yourself to one question to one leader.

Question (Mr. Dean Nelson, The Daily Telegraph): I would like to address this question to both Foreign Secretaries. What specifically are we expecting Pakistan to do that they are currently not doing? And are we, by pushing the line on the expectation of criminal charges being brought, expecting them to do more than what we could guarantee in our own countries? We have after all seen a number of terrorism trials collapse before coming to trial in the UK.

Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom: As the head of the Security Service explained in London last week, the last couple of years have seen not just significant disruption of terrorist plots in the United Kingdom but also a significant success through the judicial system. And the Pakistani Government have themselves said that they want to prosecute those who have been arrested for the terrible crimes in Mumbai. And I think it is right that they do so. I believe that President Zardari is sincere when he says he wants to tackle the scourge of terrorism in Pakistan. And I think it is vital that the whole of the Pakistani state machine support him in doing that. I also think it is vital that the whole of the Pakistani population recognize that after the bloody years of the last couple of years, terrorism is a threat to Pakistan. Terrorism is not someone else's war in Pakistan. It is their own battle that they need to face if they are to build the sort of secure and decent society that they need. And, so, I do not think unreasonable demands are being made of Pakistan. Instead I think they are demands that are in Pakistan's interest and have been articulated by Pakistan's leaders. That is why I think the maturity and the wisdom, and the strength of the Indian response refusing to lurch into actions that could make the situation worse, has set the right example. And I think it is very important that Pakistan repays that by following through on an agenda for criminal justice that is in the interest of Pakistan as well as in the interest of India.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much. The Interaction now draws to a close.

692. Speech of President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Banquet in her honour by the Queen of the United Kingdom.

London, October 27, 2009.

Your Majesty,

Your Royal Highness,

Members of the Royal Family,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

May I first of all take this opportunity to say how happy my delegation and I are to be in the United Kingdom - a country with which we have traditional ties of friendship and cooperation which we greatly value.

My husband, I and members of my delegation greatly appreciate the gracious hospitality that has been extended to us. I am also deeply touched by the sentiments of goodwill which have been expressed, both towards me and my country.

Since my arrival in London, I have been struck by the energy and vitality of the city. London, in the truest sense is a big, old but dynamic city. It represents a microcosm of the world with people of different religions and races living together. It seems to be everyone's city - much like Delhi, the capital of India. The conclusion of a friendship arrangement between our two capital cities was, thus, natural.

Your Majesty,

The ties between India and the UK are built upon shared values and traditions. There are numerous commonalities between our two countries. We are vibrant democracies with a free press and active civil societies. We both believe in freedom, dignity and respect for the individual. Our countries are forward-looking, adapting to the challenges and trying to shape the outcome of the 21st Century. It is these shared experiences and objectives that have helped us to understand each other's vision and concerns leading to broad-based cooperation.

Our two nations reached a new milestone when we upgraded our relationship to a 'Strategic Partnership' in 2004. This symbolises mutual trust and confidence in each other. It also signifies a desire to work together.

Your Majesty,

There is admiration and appreciation for the United Kingdom and its people in India. There is also a sense of familiarity and a friendly feeling even among those who have never visited this country. The support and encouragement we received from the UK in the aftermath of the Mumbai terror attacks, not only from the leadership but also from the common public, from civil society, and the media was most heartening.

India and the UK are natural partners with an impressive array of complementarities. It is not surprising, therefore, that our two countries are now engaged in further strengthening our partnership in different areas including trade and investment, science and technology, education, counter-terrorism, culture, management of the global economy and issues relating to climate change.

Our business communities have confidence in doing business with each other. Bilateral trade is growing and, currently stands at 12 billion Pounds. While the UK is one of India's most important trade and investment partners, India has become one of the largest investors in the UK. These links are set to grow further. Cooperation in the Information and Technology sector is another high point of our relationship. Other sectors tell the same story. Education linkages are expanding rapidly. There are more than 30,000 of our students in the UK. There is a realisation that both India and the UK stand to gain through cooperation in the education sector.

Your Majesty,

The real strength of any relationship lies in the people-to-people contacts. The fact that almost a million people from our two countries travel annually for tourism and business purposes, and that there are over hundred flights a week linking various cities of India and the UK, forms a strong foundation to build on these contacts. The UK is host to more than one and a half million citizens of Indian origin, representing 2 percent of the population who, I am told, are contributing between 4 to 5 percent to the GDP here. They are also participating in the social and political life of the UK. The diaspora serves as a strong asset in the development of our relationship. We were delighted by the recent award of the 2009 Nobel Prize for Chemistry to a scientist of Indian origin, Dr. Venkataraman Ramakrishnan, who is currently based at Cambridge University in the UK.

Your Majesty,

We are proud to be part of the Commonwealth, which celebrates its 60th anniversary this year. We know that it has an important role to play in shaping opinion on important regional and global issues. As members of the Commonwealth, India and the UK are working together to strengthen this unique institution. Your support to this institution is most valued. I wish the upcoming Heads of Government Meeting in Trinidad and Tobago all success.

India is also hosting the Commonwealth Games in October 2010. Your Majesty, I take this opportunity to invite you to visit India on that occasion. A warm welcome awaits you there. It will also give you an opportunity to see how much India has changed since your last visit in 1997.

In conclusion, I would like to say that our bilateral relations have been, for some time now, perhaps better than they have ever been before. We are conscious of the need to continuously nurture it. As William Shakespeare said and I quote:-

"On such a full sea are we now afloat.

And we must take the current ?.." unquote.

The time has come to look at the present and to realise the potential that the future holds for both our countries in the fullest manner possible.

Your Majesty, with these words, I now propose to raise a toast:

- to the personal good health and happiness of Your Majesty the Queen and Your Royal Highness Prince Philip, Duke of Edinburgh and your family;
- to the continued well-being and prosperity of our two friendly peoples; and
- to the ever-deepening friendship between our two countries.

Long Live the United Kingdom!

Long Live India!

693. Speech of President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil at a function to hand over of Mahatma Gandhi Memorabilia.

London, October 28, 2009.

On behalf of the Government and the people of India, I thank Sir Ghulam Noon and Prof. Nathu Ram Puri for their generous gesture in making memorabilia relating to Mahatma Gandhi available to us.

Mahatma Gandhi, the Father of the Indian Nation, apart from a great leader, was a deeply humane person and a strong proponent of peace and non-violence. Mahatma Gandhi was not just an individual but a spirit, which not only influenced Indians but also many others around the world. Leaders such as Martin Luther King and Dr. Nelson Mandela were deeply influenced by his philosophy. Even the UN has accepted the importance of his philosophy and has therefore declared his birthday, October 2nd as the International Day of Non-Violence. His philosophy of Ahimsa and Satyagraha inspired millions across India during the freedom struggle and India's independence was won through the unique path shown by him. His vision of a participatory democracy, overall development especially of rural areas and building an equitable society, has been guiding the nation. He has a special place in our hearts and articles associated with him have a special meaning for every Indian.

We look at the efforts of Sir Ghulam Noon and Mr. Puri in procuring Gandhiji's papers and as well as other items gifting them to India, this time and on earlier occasions, as their tribute to Gandhiji and a symbol of their love and affection for India.

We, in India, are proud of Sir Ghulam Noon and Prof. Puri, who have, through their hard work and diligence achieved commendable success in whatever they have pursued. The piece of cloth that I have just received bears the signature of Sarojini Naidu and Pyarelal and some other important persons of those times. Mahatma Gandhi is not just a person to which only Indians can claim ownership, but is a part of humanity as whole. He was indeed a boon for India. The Indian diaspora is a significant asset for India's relationship with the countries where Indians have chosen to make their homes. In UK, the diaspora has carved a niche for itself and is widely respected for its achievements.

I would, once again, like to thank Sir Ghulam Noon and Prof. Nathu Ram Puri for the very commendable gesture they have made. I am sure that Gandhiji's thoughts and ideals have touched their lives as, indeed, it has of many others across the world. Gandhiji's ideology can be a very powerful instrument for building a peaceful and a tolerant world. Let us prove ourselves worthy of his legacy by our actions.

697. Address by Vice President M. Hamid Ansari at the Book Release Function of the book titled "For the Honour of India : A History of Indian Peace Keeping" by Lt. Gen. Satish Nambiar.

New Delhi, May 29, 2009.

I am happy to be back at the premises of the USI and to release this book that gives an authoritative account of the valiant contribution of our soldiers towards maintaining international peace and security. The book owes its origin to a suggestion of President Kalam; the effort of General Nambiar and his team of collaborators are impressive and commendable.

The term 'peacekeeping' does not figure in the Charter of the United Nations. The impulse for it comes from the first of the four Purposes of the UN, enunciated in Article 1 of the Charter. Secretary General Dag Hammarskjöld, who was said to have had 'almost a religious respect for the Charter', referred to peacekeeping as belonging to 'Chapter Six and a Half' of the Charter.

Over the years, peacekeeping has undergone massive expansion covering today 18 operations deployed in five continents encompassing over 140,000 personnel and budgeted cost exceeding US$ 7 billion. Its methodology has been subjected to periodic reviews, the most comprehensive of these being the Brahimi Panel Report of August 2000.

This book deals with three distinct aspects of Indian peacekeeping:

- 1) Peacekeeping through the institutional mechanism of the United Nations;
- 2) Peacekeeping undertaken through a multi-national/international commission such in the case of Indo-China;
- 3) Peacekeeping undertaken through bilateral formats such as the IPKF and Operation Cactus in the Maldives. These two were propelled by national security imperatives and are a category apart.

Experience of the last two decades indicates that India's policy preference in an increasingly complex global security scenario is for peacekeeping interventions through UN mechanisms.

Some characteristics of UN peacekeeping are noteworthy:

First, peacekeeping operations have multiplied since the end of the Cold War. While there have been only 17 operations during the period 1948-1991, there have been around 45 since 1991. The much anticipated New World Order commenced with a heavy dose of global disorder!

Second, peacekeeping operations have increasingly complex mandates and this is reflected in their nomenclatures - Truce Supervision, Military Observers, Verification, Transition Assistance, Confidence Restoration, Preventive Deployment, Stabilisation and Hybrid Operation, to name a few.

Third, UN peacekeeping operations have become the sole prerogative of the Security Council that defines their mandates and monitors their operation. Troop contributing countries that bear the human, and increasingly the material cost of peacekeeping, are consulted on a semi-formal basis but do not have a defined role in shaping mandates and in mission planning. The countries that do have a say in Council Resolutions often do not participate in their implementation. It is now not remembered that in the Cold War period there were two peacekeeping operations established by UN General Assembly mandates - the First UN Emergency Force and the UN Security Force in West New Guinea. These operations were characterised by negotiations with the participating countries where mission planning was done through an Advisory Committee of member states. Their operational and mission models deserve further study.

Fourth, peacekeeping is straying from traditional mandates. While consent of the parties, impartiality of peacekeepers and the minimum use of force remain cardinal principles, deviations have been devastating. Furthermore, peacekeeping is sought to be juxtaposed into nation-building. The irony of promoting democracy and nation-building through armed peacekeeping is indeed stark.

Fifth, there is an increasing trend to regionalise peace keeping and even to give post-facto endorsement to unilateral action. This raises disconcerting questions since it is only the United Nations that has the universal legitimacy and credibility to undertake this role.

Ladies and Gentlemen

UN Peacekeeping is a product of structural necessity of the global order and the institutional innovation of the United Nations 'to save succeeding generations', as the Preamble of the Charter put it, 'from the scourge of war'. Its theology is still evolving. The underlying dilemma, of reconciling the principle of state sovereignty with the imperatives of a globalising world committing itself to universal norms that transcend national borders, remains unresolved. The emergence of a global civil society, and the enhanced commitment to principles of human rights and other emerging norms for group and state behaviour, is propelling us towards modified patterns of conduct nationally and globally. At the same time selectivity, rather than universality based on principled adherence, determines conduct. The imperative of global order today demands peacekeeping on a vast scale, but the spirit and application of innovation to the UN structures and the Charter principles is lacking.

Despite this, India's commitment to peacekeeping in general and the UN peacekeeping in particular needs no reiteration. We have contributed nearly 100,000 troops, participated in more than 40 missions and 130 of our peacekeepers have made the supreme sacrifice and laid down their lives while serving in UN missions. Some of them are being honoured today at the UN Headquarters. We have acquired vast experience in peacekeeping and have the intellectual capital from our own experience in nation-building to tackle the complex scenario that today's peacekeeping faces. Our military, paramilitary and police forces have the requisite experience to match the challenge. The establishment of the Centre for United Nations Peacekeeping under the aegis of the United Service Institution of India has institutionalised this experience to make it available to other countries.

This book is timely. I am confident that besides enlightening the general public, it will facilitate a more focussed policy debate on the principles and mechanics of peacekeeping.

I once again thank Gen. Nambiar for inviting me to this function.

698. Statement by Minister of State Smt. Preet Kaur at the Plenary Meeting of the United Nations Conference on the World Financial and Economic Crisis and its Impact on Development.

New York, June 25, 2009.

Mr. President,

The United Nations provides a unique forum, with unparalleled legitimacy and inclusivity. This UN Conference on the World Financial and Economic Crisis and its Impact on Development is only the second such gathering held of the United Nations on the financial and economic system and architecture, the first being the UN Conference on the Monetary and Financial System held in Bretton Woods in 1944 with the participation of all the then 44 members of the UN. In that sense, this is a truly historic meeting. It is vitally important that this landmark event coupled with the UN's convening power is used to hear the voice of the entire global community on the extraordinary crisis being faced by the global economy today. Allow me, therefore, at the outset to express our appreciation for all your personal efforts in organizing this Conference.

Mr. President,

The global financial and economic crisis was the result of a failure of global regulatory and supervisory mechanisms, excessive speculation and excessive risk taking. This was further aggravated by global imbalances. There is now a general acceptance that the present economic and financial crisis is the worst recession since the Great Depression and the first ever contraction of global GDP in the post-War period. Given the magnitude of the crisis and the widespread meltdown, some have dubbed it the Great Recession.

Developing countries were not the cause of this crisis, but they are amongst its worst affected victims. Their exports have been hit and they are facing vastly reduced capital flows and foreign direct investment. The economic crisis coupled with the food and fuel crises of last year has slowed down their economic growth and casts an ominous shadow on eradication of poverty and achievement of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). The human dimension to this crisis is even more frightening with estimates of additional millions being pushed back into extreme poverty.

For governments in developing countries the loss in export earnings and remittances with adverse consequences on employment and growth has meant reduction in the fiscal space for investments in critical infrastructure and social sectors like education, health, etc. as much larger social safety nets have now to be financed. As Prime Minister of India, Dr. Manmohan Singh, had said at the G-20 London Summit: "While India will be able to manage, many other developing countries may not be in the same position and this is where the international community can help. We must ensure that countries hurt by the massive withdrawal of private capital that has taken place, are able to rely upon an increased flow of resources from the international financial institutions. This will help these countries to maintain a higher level of demand than would otherwise be possible and thus help global revival".

Mr. President,

Any new thinking for a more sustainable global economic system has to be based on a conscious policy where there is a building up of the capacities of the poorer countries and regions to play a healthy and equitable role in tapping the potential of free market for their prosperity and advancement.

Specific responses to the financial and economic crisis must address both short-term needs, as well as the longer-term imperatives of reforming structures of global governance, including here at the UN and at the Bretton Woods Institutions (BWIs).

These reforms need to redefine the role of institutions of global economic and financial governance to reflect contemporary realities of today while being rooted in pragmatism and collaboration. It is imperative that in key decisions and decision-making processes the voice and real participation of developing countries is substantially strengthened and increased.

The future shape of international governance, including of international financial institutions (IFIs) and the crafting of a new global financial architecture is, perhaps, the most far-reaching element of reform for providing global stability and security.

At the UN, the General Assembly must be revitalized along with a real reform of the Security Council. We believe that this requires expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories of the Security Council and reform of its working methods.

The present crisis has once again underscored the need for the Economic and Social Council to be robust and effective in coordinating global responses to global challenges for a better quality of life for the vast majority of humankind.

At the BWIs, the voice and quota reform needs to be accelerated so as to make these institutions both responsive and effective as well as credible and relevant in continuing to play vital roles in global economic affairs. Again, as my Prime Minister had said, "The world has changed greatly since the multilateral institutions were established and the role of these institutions needs to be redefined and their mandate suitably revised. The representation of the developing and emerging market countries in the decision making levels of these institutions also needs to be improved. Better representation is essential if the institutions are to have the legitimacy they need to play their role".

Mr. President,

Of immediate importance is the revival of the world economy. Counter-cyclical stimulus measures are, therefore, critical. There must be a substantial increase in lending by international financial institutions (IFIs) and the Multilateral Development Banks (MDBs) with increased limits for developing countries and emerging economies. The capacities of the MDBs to do so, including adequacy of their capital, requires to be urgently addressed.

There is a particular imperative to make good the decline that has taken place in capital flows to developing countries by increased multilateral and bilateral flows, including ODA. Increased resources for international financial institutions are very relevant but conditionalities associated with the use of these resources need to be softened, otherwise their deployment will be counter-productive in the countries affected.

Mr. President,

Measures to address the crisis should not create other problems for the future.

We need to address regulatory and systemic flaws. There should be better and transparent regulatory mechanism for capital markets, including the non-banking sector, redefine capital requirements to avoid pro-cyclicality, and avoid build-up of excessive leverage.

There should be a better system of surveillance and regulation. Surveillance should be even-handed with greater focus on the systemically important institutions. We also need to develop an effective early warning system to spot a build-up of risk. It is particularly important that in any such vulnerability assessment there is no intrusiveness.

In this context, it is particularly necessary that we should not permit protectionist tendencies, not just protectionism of trade in goods, but also protectionism in free flow of persons, protectionism in financial services as well as imposition of non-tariff barriers, to succeed in our response measures.

Developing countries have limited policy space. They must continue to have this space to determine measures that best fit their specific requirements.

Mr. President,

Insofar as India is concerned, we have fared much better than others though we are also affected and our growth rates have come down from the nearly 9% average of the past four years to 6.7% in 2008-09.

In response to the crisis, we have made aggressive use of fiscal and monetary policy, with particular focus on fiscal stimulus in infrastructure investment.

Our primary challenge is to get rid of chronic poverty, ignorance and disease, which still afflict millions and millions of our citizens. For this, we need a high rate of growth coupled with measures to make it inclusive.

We have endeavored to achieve this through huge investments in the rural and farm sector, a massive rural employment guarantee scheme, infrastructure development projects, major national food security and rural health missions, and an urban renewal mission.

Mr. President,

Leaders of some of the largest economies, the G-20, have met twice in the past months and declared their determination to instill confidence and restore stability to the world economy. They have also pledged to strengthen regulation, reform international financial institutions, reject protectionism and build recovery. The package of US$ 1.1 trillion to restore credit and growth together with national measures constitutes a global plan for recovery on an unprecedented scale.

India has actively engaged in the G-20 framework aimed at redressing the current global economic situation so as to bring the global economy back to the trajectory of sustained growth.

The Commission of Experts appointed by you Mr. President that included the former Governor of the Reserve Bank of India, Dr Y V Reddy, has also made several recommendations that deserve serious consideration.

Mr. President,

We have a vested interest in the world economy doing well as that is a key enabler for our growth too.

But as we strive for global solutions to this global crisis, we must remember that development or economic growth cannot be slowed, halted or sacrificed in the search for solutions to the crisis.

Thank you.

699. Extracts Relevant to UNGA Session from the Press Conference by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao.

New Delhi, September 19, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Vishnu Prakash): Good afternoon and welcome. Foreign Secretary is here to brief you about Prime Minister's forthcoming visit to Pittsburgh for the G-20 summit as also India's participation in the 64th session of UNGA at New York. After her opening remarks Foreign Secretary would be happy to take up a few questions.

Let me also introduce colleagues here with us. To Foreign Secretary's right is Mr. Asith Bhattacharjee, Joint Secretary to UN Division. To my left is Mr. J.S. Mukul, Joint Secretary, TC and Economic Relations, who is also MEA's sou Sherpa for the G-20 process. Ma'am the floor is yours.

Foreign Secretary (Nirupama Rao)

Thank you for coming for this briefing which I will do in two parts. First, I will brief you on Prime Ministers visit to Pittsburg, to attend the G-20 Meeting. Thereafter, I will outline the programme and other details of the high level segment of the United Nations General Assembly at UN headquarters in New York where EAM will lead India's delegation.

(For Briefing on G-20 Summit please see Document No.218.)

I will now turn to the UN General Assembly. EAM will be visiting New York to participate in the High-Level Segment of the 64th Session of the UN General Assembly. EAM is due to reach New York on 20 September and return on 27 September, 2009.

The 64th Session of the UN General Assembly started on 15 September, 2009. A High Level Event on Climate Change will take place on 22 September at which EAM will represent Prime Minister.

The General Debate of 64th UNGA, where statements are made by Heads of Delegation, will take place from 23 to 30 September 2009. The theme for this year's General Debate is 'Effective Response to Global Crises; Strengthening Multilateralism and Dialogue among Civilizations for International Peace'.

EAM will be speaking at the General Debate on 26 September at around 1700-1730 hrs. On the margins of the General Assembly, EAM will also have bilateral meetings with his counterparts from some countries.

A number of events are being held at the UN in the margins of the General Assembly. These include:

- High Level Event on Climate Change (22 September)
- XIV Summit Meeting of the Group of Fifteen (G-15) (25 September) preceded by Ministerial meeting (24 September)
- IBSA Ministerial Meeting by Brazil (21 September)
- G-5 Meeting (22 September)
- Ministerial meeting of the Group of Friends of the UNSG on Myanmar (23 September)
- Commonwealth Foreign Ministers' Meeting and the Ministerial Meeting on Terrorism (24 September)
- BRIC luncheon meeting by Brazil (24 September)
- High Level Meeting on 60th anniversary of establishment of UNRWA (24 September)
- Fifth India-GCC Political Dialogue (25 September)
- Group of 77 (G-77) Ministerial Meeting (25 September)
- Informal Meeting of SAARC Council of Ministers (26 September)
- Ministerial Meeting of the Group of Friends of the Alliance of Civilizations (26 September)

India will be represented at a high level at these events. Apart from the above, a number of countries are sponsoring other events: the USA is sponsoring an event in the Security Council on Nuclear Disarmament and also a conference with Troop Contributing Countries in UN peacekeeping operations.

The 64th UNGA session is taking place against the backdrop of an unprecedented global economic and financial crisis; the magnitude and extent of which has not been seen since the 1930s. Developing countries, though not responsible for this crisis, have been severely affected by its impact. Recent food and fuel price crisis and the challenge of climate change have threatened the pace of development and also sets the clock back in international effort to achieve the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs).

India's top priority in this session is to reinforce the international community's efforts to face contemporary global challenges of poverty eradication (particularly in view of global escalation of food and energy prices), climate change and sustainable social and economic development. It is essential that the forthcoming UNGA session builds upon global efforts to mitigate the impact of the financial and economic crisis and assist developing countries in successfully pursuing their developmental agenda.

The credibility of the architecture of institutions of international governance requires urgent reform in keeping with contemporary realities. Along with the reform of international financial institutions, India believes that it should be a priority for the international community to complete the long-pending process of UN reform, including reform and expansion of the Security Council in both the permanent and non-permanent membership categories.

It is a major priority for India to significantly improve international cooperation in counterterrorism efforts. We had presented a draft for Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT) in 1996. We have urged all Member States to make concerted efforts for the finalization and adoption of a CCIT during the current session of the General Assembly.

EAM will represent Prime Minister at a High Level Event on Climate Change being hosted by the UN Secretary General on September 22, 2009 at the sidelines of the UNGA in New York. The objective of this event is to provide political direction and momentum to the ongoing multilateral negotiations under the UN Framework Convention on Climate change (UNFCCC). It will not be a negotiating forum. The event will provide an important opportunity to articulate India's position on the climate change issue and the constructive approach that we are committed to playing in the multilateral negotiations under the UNFCCC leading to the 15th Conference of Parties in Copenhagen in December 2009.

Developing countries like India, which are vulnerable to and are already suffering from the impact of climate change, have an important stake in establishment of a truly global, transparent, rule-based and equitable climate change regime based on the principles of UNFCCC, which takes into account the imperatives of poverty reduction and economic development in developing countries and the historical responsibility of the developed countries.

India's approach on disarmament issues is well known. We believe that the United Nations can play a significant role in strengthening international security by advancing global disarmament goals and objectives. To provide the necessary momentum to international efforts on this issue, India supports the strengthening of the UN Disarmament machinery to promote multilateralism and international consensus.

Overall, the 64th GA session has several important issues on its agenda. For us, articulating the importance of multilateralism and participatory and inclusive international governance system is at the core of our approach. We will be participating in the General Assembly Plenary and Committee deliberations with this in mind.

Question: Madam, I just wanted to ask you if you have been able to fix a date for the meeting with the Pakistani Foreign Secretary, and if there is a date fixed for the meeting between the two Foreign Ministers in New York.

Foreign Secretary: We are working to fix the dates for the meetings of the Foreign Secretaries and the Foreign Ministers in New York, that is the meetings with Pakistan, and we are in the process of finalising these dates.

Question: Madam, I am going to back to Pakistan. We have heard from Mr. Qureshi recently. He says he does not have any expectations from the meeting in New York. What are the expectations Mr. Krishna and the Ministry have of that meeting?

Foreign Secretary: Our expectations are that Pakistan should focus seriously, in a concentrated and meaningful manner, on our concerns regarding the issue of terrorism that is directed against India from within Pakistani territory. And this has been consistently stated to the Pakistani side with sincerity, in all detail, by the Government of India and all the officials concerned. It is our expectation, it is our hope that Pakistan will address these concerns in full seriousness and full commitment so that the desired outcome can be reached.

Question: Is the Indian Prime Minister likely to meet the Chinese President during the G20 Summit? And, what is the status of India's application with the Asian Development Bank for the Arunachal Project?

Foreign Secretary: To answer your first question, there is no meeting that is being planned at the moment between our Prime Minister and his Chinese counterpart or the Leader of the Chinese Delegation to the G20 Summit.

On the issue of the Asian Development Bank project that you referred to, the Country Partnership Strategy that India had presented at the ADB has already been endorsed by the ADB. So, the matter stands there. There is really no pending issue now on that front.

Question: The loan application is cleared now?

Foreign Secretary: The Country Partnership Strategy has been endorsed by the Asian Development Bank.

Question: Madam, my question is on Prime Minister's comment of yesterday. He said in the Iftar party yesterday that he was in touch with the highest level authority in China about the current tension of alleged incursions. I would like if the Prime Minister talked to his counterpart or he talked to President Jintao. If yes, what is the nature of that talk? My supplementary question is that there is a general allegation which is made frequently for the last ten days that MEA is downplaying the incursions which have definitely increased because these are the official figures. Can you just clarify these two issues please?

Foreign Secretary: As far as your first question is concerned, let me tell you that we remain in constant touch, India and China, on all issues that are of mutual interest and of mutual concern to us as far as our bilateral relations are concerned and also on issues that go beyond the bilateral context. So, this is a relationship that we have been able to develop and that has matured over the years and has acquired many dimensions. A very important aspect of this relationship is the dialogue that we have been able to sustain, that we have been able to transact and conduct at the highest political level of the two countries. Therefore, the leadership level understandings and the contact and communication remains open at all times. That is the first point I wanted to make.

As far as the second point of the recent Chinese intrusions is concerned, I think enough has been said in the media about these issues in the last few days and perhaps weeks. There has been a certain hype and a certain intensification of volume if I may say, in terms of the manner in which these have been reported upon in the media. Having said that I would only base myself on ground realities and my appreciation of where the relationship stands today, as somebody who has dealt with it for many years now. As far as the intrusions are concerned, there has been no significant increase in the number of Chinese intrusions across the line of actual control in all sections of the India-China border. At the expense of repeating our position, let me do that, there is no mutually agreed or delineated line of actual control between the two countries. So, this is an issue that is yet to be agreed upon between the two sides. What happens, it is an eventuality in such a situation that you find that you have crossings over into what you regard as your side from the other side. This has gone on for a number of years now. This is not a new phenomenon, I would like to point that out. Having said that I would also like to point to the fact that contrary to popular perceptions, the situation along the areas of the line of actual control in the India-China border areas has remained peaceful for a number of decades now. We have mechanisms in place; we have confidence-building measures in place; we have communication links in place that enable each side to reach out to the other whenever there is a perceived problem or a situation that develops in the areas along the line of actual control.

I would like to underline the fact that these mechanisms have worked well and that there is good communication between the two sides. Whenever the situation warrants it we also take it up at the diplomatic level. So, this is a relationship in which there is regular communication, and there is understanding, and there is recognition on both sides that this is an important bilateral relationship, that outstanding differences between the two sides should be resolved peacefully through dialogue, through communication, as it should be between two nations as large as ours, with international responsibilities like ours, and with bilateral commitments such as ours.

Question: Madam, coming back to the China question, do you think in any way this troop movement alongside the border by the Chinese and the Indian side in Ladakh as well as around the area by Chinese side in some way is creating a cycle of mistrust and it can hamper the diplomatic work that had been done in the past with China?

Foreign Secretary: You are referring to media reports and I sought to guide your attention to the actual situation in India-China relations. The Chief of Army Staff has already spoken on this issue this morning when he referred to the fact that there has been no increase in the number of intrusions and the situation remains calm. So, I am not here to get into a debate on troop movements. Each country takes steps to safeguard its security in sensitive areas such as border areas but the central fact is that the situation remains peaceful and tranquil. We have open channels of communication with the Chinese side and the Chinese side with us to discuss all outstanding issues that need resolution.

Question: Pakistan has repeatedly said that continued stalled Composite Dialogue between the two countries would help those elements who are opposed to peace in South Asia. Secondly, Pakistan has said that any precondition to talks would not help any side and not acceptable to Pakistan. What are your comments?

Foreign Secretary: First of all let me say that engagement between India and Pakistan obviously works in the long-term interest of both countries, and there is obviously a potential that exists for that. But, let me also add that we cannot shut our eyes to the threat that exists in terms of terrorism directed against India from Pakistan and the Composite Dialogue is contingent, that process is contingent on an atmosphere free of terrorism and violence. Realising the potential is really not the issue here because the first step we need to take is to squarely address the issue of terrorism.

Question: I wanted a clarification on the ADB point. Is there a reference there to Arunachal as disputed?

Foreign Secretary: No, there is no reference to Arunachal Pradesh in the sense that you refer to. This is a Country Partnership Strategy looking at development assistance as a package.

Question: ....not audible

Foreign Secretary: That has nothing to do with the approval of the strategy. I think you are referring to something quite different. There is a Chinese position on the subject, what China has been saying on the issue of Arunachal Pradesh. But here, as far as the Country Partnership Strategy is concerned, it has been endorsed by the Asian Development Bank.

Question: Madam, you have just returned from Nepal. How was your visit? Are you going to discuss any specific agenda with Nepal on the sidelines of the UN Summit?

Foreign Secretary: I just returned from a very good visit to Kathmandu. It was my first visit there after becoming Foreign Secretary although I have visited Nepal on many occasions in the past. As I spoke to the media at the end of my visit, you are aware of the broad contours of my discussions and my meetings in Nepal. I wanted to say that we attach very important significance to our relations to Nepal, a very close friend, a very close neighbour. Our dialogue with the Government of Nepal and with the people of Nepal with whom we share the friendliest of relations - we only want to see that strengthened and deepened in the future.

Question: Madam, what is your reaction or rather Government of India's response on Afghanistan elections? My second question is that there have been repeated ceasefire violations at the borders by Pakistan. I am asking this question because yesterday DG BSF said that we are approaching Ministry of External Affairs to lodge a strong protest with Pakistan. Are we doing it?

Foreign Secretary: Thank you for that question on Afghanistan. We have welcomed, as you know, the successful holding of the Presidential and Provincial Council elections in Afghanistan on the 20th of August. As you also know, we have a historical relationship with Afghanistan which is a fellow developing, democratic country. We appreciate the determination of the Afghan people who participated in the election process despite the threats and attacks meant to disrupt the elections. Therefore, we congratulate all democratic forces in Afghanistan. We admire the fact that the elections were conducted by national institutions, unlike the previous elections in Afghanistan. So, it has been an Afghan-led process which will go a long way in strengthening democracy in Afghanistan. We also welcome the announcement of the preliminary results of all the votes counted, in which President Hamid Karzai has emerged as the leading candidate having secured I believe 54.62 per cent followed by Dr. Abdullah Abdullah at 27.75 per cent. So, we hope for an early and successful conclusion of the electoral process and the finalisation of the results after the completion of legal procedures. I wanted to reaffirm on behalf of the Government of India our commitment to strengthening our strategic partnership with Afghanistan and to reconstruction and development of a pluralistic and democratic Afghanistan.

As far as the question on cross-border firing is concerned, in fact there are certain objective circumstances which you have just referred to. There have been incidents of ceasefire violations apart from infiltration also from the Pakistani side of the Line of Control, which has been at a very high level in the last few weeks. There were cases of rockets being fired across the Punjab border and thereafter there was sniper firing at Border Security Force posts yesterday. There are, of course, mechanisms to deal with this and the DGMOs of the two countries have been in touch, as also flag meetings have been held. But the general issue is that it is the responsibility of Pakistan to see that whoever may be responsible for this from their side should not have the licence to carry out such acts which destabilise the situation.

New York, September 22, 2009.

Please see document No.767.

701. Statement by External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna at the General Debate of the 64th Session of the United Nations General Assembly.

New York, September 26, 2009.

Your Excellency, Mr. President,

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Please accept my congratulations on your assuming the Presidency of this 64th Session of the United Nations General Assembly. My delegation assures you of our fullest cooperation during your stewardship of this august Assembly that embodies the hopes, aspirations and our shared vision of peace and development for all the people of our planet.

Mr. President,

When this General Assembly ends next year, the United Nations would have completed 65 years of existence. These past decades have seen the world change in fundamental ways. Connectivity defines our global condition, and the challenges that we collectively face are global. The resolution of these challenges, as we are aware, require global approaches and solutions. What may happen in one part of the world has an impact on other regions.

In the context of these rapidly emerging changes and their deep and diverse effect, we must introspect more deeply on whether the United Nations and other global governance structures are geared to effectively meet the challenges that confront us all.

It is of concern that even after more than six decades, international governance structures are neither inclusive nor participatory. Consequently, these structures and institutions have not kept pace or evolved, with the changed nature, the intensity and the depth of contemporary global issues. The question therefore is: are these institutions able enough to address these challenges either adequately or satisfactorily?

The reform and restructuring of the global governance architecture is the critical need of our times and the voice of the developing world, including the small island nations and of Africa, is of principal and core relevance, if we are to have truly participatory and global responses to global challenges.

One need not look too far to identify these challenges. The economic and financial turmoil, which did not begin in the developing world, has affected developing countries the most. Growth has slowed down with recession overtaking many countries. The international response to this challenge has to be not only the measures that have been taken to stimulate economies but more importantly, to find ways to restructure the current international governance system which has failed to respond to the virulence of the financial and economic crisis. To gloss over this structural deficit of the current global financial and economic architecture, would imperil the future of a vast majority of the peoples of this world and presage greater difficulties in the future.

In the face of the current economic and financial crisis, hard-won gains in alleviating poverty, hunger, illiteracy and disease are being reversed. Today, the achievements of the Millennium Development Goals are seriously threatened. Policies of protectionism under these already adverse circumstances will exacerbate the serious situation that many countries face.

It is imperative that the United Nations act in concert to coherently overcome these challenges. India, which is actively engaged in the G-20 and other processes, has always stressed that developing countries must receive priority in any global response to the crisis.

The UN Conference on the financial and economic crisis held in June this year was opportune and provided a useful platform to collectively seek ways and means to respond to the crisis. We now look forward to an early implementation of the follow-up measures agreed to at the Conference, during the course of this General Assembly.

We believe that international trade and commerce has a central role to play in revitalizing global economic growth. We are committed to negotiations in the Doha Development Round. We strongly favour fair and equitable rule-based multilateral trade negotiations, which recognize and address the legitimate demands of the developing countries. India supports resumption of the negotiations at an early date and stands ready to engage with all WTG Members to complete the modalities and addressing any outstanding problems. To support this process, we also organized an international ministerial level conference in New Delhi on 3-4 September 2009.

Mr President,

At the centre-stage of multilateralism and international cooperation is the United Nations.

The UN is a platform where the world meets to express views and undertake commitments on global issues of mutual concern on an equal footing. No wonder then that the Charter of the United Nations begins with the inspiring words: "We the people of the United Nations . . . , ,J! Inclusiveness and collective action, in all aspects of the work of the organization is at the heart of its Charter. This vision must be our lodestar, the guiding principle of all we undertake. India is committed to working with member states to making the United Nations more relevant and tuned in to contemporary realities.

Reforming the United Nations is a matter of the utmost priority. Four years after the 2005 World Summit, there has not been much progress even as newer and more global crises and problems have emerged. We should not let slowness of action weaken the organization in the face of such challenges. Rather, we must work in concert to make it more robust and capable of effective response.

Reform in the three essentials of the Charter i.e. Peace and Security, Development, and Human Rights require our collective attention. The General Assembly must be revitalized in full measure and its role as the anvil of global deliberation must be strengthened. The ECOSOC must become the fulcrum of development. It must be accepted that the Security Council must be strengthened and made more representative by expanding its permanent and non-permanent membership. Ongoing intergovernmental negotiations during the last six months have unambiguously established that an overwhelming majority of Member States share the perspective that expansion in both categories of membership of the Security Council is needed.

Mr. President,

Climate change is one of the most important global challenges that we face today. Developing countries bear a disproportionate share of its adverse effects even though they are not responsible for it. Cognizant of the serious threat that climate change poses, India is engaged in the ongoing negotiations under the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change including in the upcoming Copenhagen Conference. India will work for an outcome that recognizes the development imperatives of developing countries and is rooted in the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

We also have to move away from concentrating on 'mitigation' only and ensure that there is a focus on adaptation, which is critical for developing countries. We are hosting a high-level global conference on "Climate Change:

Technology Development and Transfer" on October 22-23, 2009 in cooperation with the United Nations. The objective of this Conference is to help formulate a roadmap for technology in the context of climate change mitigation and adaptation to support the UNFCCC process.

Developing countries must be supported financially, technologically and with capacity building resources so that they can cope with the immense challenges of adaptation. Special efforts are required to develop programmes that address the critical needs of Small Island States and of the most vulnerable countries.

Poverty alleviation and livelihood security are central imperatives for India. For this, accelerated economic growth and energy security are critical drivers. In pursuing our development goals, India has been successful in significantly reducing its energy intensity. India will continue to pursue this path.

India is aware that the continuing volatility in the fossil-fuel markets together with the threat of climate change which makes the development of all renewable and clean energy sources, including nuclear energy crucial. In this context, international civil-nuclear cooperation is important.

India has also taken several independent initiatives to address the issue of climate change. We have put in place a comprehensive policy and legislative framework as well as a National Action Plan on Climate Change with separate Eight National Missions. An unprecedented afforestation campaign has been launched with doubling of the budget for forestry this year to US$ 1.3 billion and this increase is going to be sustained every year. The Prime Minister's Council has approved National Missions for Enhanced Energy Efficiency, and Solar Energy setting ambitious goals. We are supporting and facilitating major research to assess various aspects related to climate change.

Mr. President,

India attaches the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament and has an impeccable non-proliferation record. We welcome the renewed global debate on achieving a world free of nuclear weapons. This corresponds with India's longstanding and consistent advocacy of nuclear disarmament as one of the highest priority of the international community. We have put forward a number of proposals on nuclear disarmament in the UN, including a Working Paper in 2006, proposing elements to fashion a new consensus on disarmament and non-proliferation.

Last year, at the 63rd UNGA, consistent with India's longstanding commitment as articulated in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan in 1988, India reiterated its proposal for a Nuclear Weapons Convention for banning the production, development, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and to provide for their complete elimination within a specified time-frame. The international nuclear order cannot be discriminatory. Further, states must fulfill the obligations they have undertaken. Once more, with feeling and with commitment, India reiterates that proposal.

We will continue to engage with key countries to intensify this debate with the hope that greater international understanding could lend itself to a firm commitment for action on nuclear disarmament.

It was in this spirit that we supported adoption of a Programme of Work, including on a Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty (FMCT), in the Conference on Disarmament in May this year. This is consistent with India's position, to work with others in the Conference on Disarmament towards conclusion of a non-discriminatory, multilaterally negotiated and internationally verifiable FMCT, provided it meets India's national security interests.

We remain committed to a voluntary, unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing.

Mr. President,

India stands committed to the safeguarding of international peace and security. Over the past five decades, we contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers and have suffered the highest number of casualties in these decades. Strengthening the normative basis for peacekeeping operations and giving major Troop Contributing Countries (TCCs) a greater say, will serve to make peacekeeping more effective.

Mr. President,

The barbaric terrorist attack on the innocent people of Mumbai on November 26, 2008 reminds us of the daily and malignant menace that terrorism poses to all countries. There cannot be any justification whatsoever for such mindless terrorist acts. It is our collective responsibility and duty to work together to ensure that terrorists, organizers, perpetrators and supporters of such crimes are brought to justice.

To strengthen the international legal framework of the fight against terrorism, India had proposed a Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT). Discussions on the draft have gone on for far too long. It is time that the Convention be finally adopted. India earnestly calls upon all countries to make serious efforts in the next few weeks to arrive at a consensus on the text.

Mr. President,

Peace, security, stability and welfare of our neighbourhood is vital for India. There is a new beginning in Sri Lanka; in Nepal strengthening the peace process is in our collective interest; and in Afghanistan, the international community must remain intensively engaged and support its development efforts and the maintenance of peace and stability. India is committed to establishing good neighbourly relations and resolving all outstanding issues with Pakistan through peaceful dialogue.

Mr. President,

In conclusion, I wish to reiterate India's steadfast commitment to the work of the United Nations. Speaking to this Assembly 41 years ago, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi said and I QUOTE ".the United Nations is the trustee of the world's peace and represents the hopes of mankind. Its very existence gives a feeling of assurance that the justice of true causes can be brought fearlessly before the world. This Assembly and the agencies of the United Nations should, in all that they do, sustain those hopes and promote the causes of peace. UNQUOTE. The truth and conviction of these words are more meaningful today than ever before.

Thank you.

702. Opening Remarks of External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on his meetings in New York at his media briefing. New York, September 27, 2009.

Dear Friends,

Thank you very much for your presence here today.

You know that I have been here in New York for the past week in connection with the annual session of the United Nations General Assembly. I addressed the General Assembly yesterday; I am sure, a copy of my speech is already with you.

It is going to be 65 years next year since the establishment of the United Nations. The global order has since changed dramatically. The UN must also change and reflect contemporary reality. The thrust of my message was therefore the need for change at the UN. Obviously, in this context I underscored the need for an expansion of the UNSC both in its permanent and its non-permanent seats.

Of course, I also used the opportunity to stress the role of the UN to address urgent problems facing the globe. In this context, I urged the urgent adoption of the Comprehensive Convention against International Terrorism, which has been under negotiation at the UN for more than 15 years. On 22nd September I led the Indian delegation for the Climate Change Summit. The delegation included Minister of State for Environment & Forests, Shri Jairam Ramesh, and the Special Envoy of the Prime Minister for Climate Change, Shri Shyam Saran. Our central message was that India has a major interest in ensuring an ambitious and equitable outcome at the climate change negotiations in Copenhagen, which recognizes that developing countries need to pursue growth. Domestically, we are taking many measures to address climate, both on mitigation and adaptation. Many of these will have specific and time-bound goals.

On the sidelines of the UNGA, I attended a number of Ministerial meetings of various groupings of which we are members. These included IBSA (India, Brazil, South Africa), G-5 (India, Brazil, South Africa, Mexico, China) and BRIC (India, Brazil, China, Russia). These meetings were opportune in emphasizing the close coordination India and our partners on various global issues.

I also participated in the Commonwealth Foreign Ministers meeting, the annual meeting of the G-77 Foreign Ministers and the India - Gulf Cooperation Council Ministerial meeting.

You are aware that there were more than 50 requests for bilateral meetings with me. I met the President of Maldives and was able to meet a number of Foreign Ministers at the plurilateral fora and at key bilateral meetings. Our PR had hosted a reception for me, which was attended by the Prime Minister of Nepal, the Vice President of Suriname, and several Foreign Ministers.

My bilateral meetings included the US Secretary of State, the Foreign Ministers of Sri Lanka, Nepal, Singapore, Egypt, Afghanistan, the Secretary General of the Arab League, and as you are aware, just a little while ago, Pakistan.

My meeting with His Excellency Foreign Minister Qureshi was preceded by a detailed meeting between the Foreign Secretaries of India and Pakistan. We had a useful, constructive and candid exchange of views on the present situation in our bilateral relations. We both agreed that the future direction in our bilateral relations has to be one of deeper, sustained and meaningful relations. Being a neighbor, there is an imperative to have a mutually beneficial relationship with each other in the long term interests of our own countries and to realize our national developmental priorities. I utilized this opportunity to convey to Foreign Minister Qureshi our appreciation that for a sustained and meaningful dialogue process to succeed, it is essential to ensure an environment free of violence, terrorism and the threat to use violence. As you are aware, we do have serious and continuing concerns about terrorists and extremist groups in Pakistan which are a national security risk for us and for our people. Foreign Minister Qureshi conveyed to me the seriousness of his Government in bringing to book through their legal process those responsible for the terrorist outrage in Mumbai ten months ago.

Pakistan has taken some steps within its own legal system against those directly responsible for the attack on Mumbai and the processes thus instituted must gather further momentum. We remain concerned about the threat which groups and individuals in Pakistan continue to pose to us. I, therefore, underlined and reiterated in my meeting that concrete and effective steps against these individuals and entities can instill in us the confidence that commitments given by Pakistan that it would not allow its soil to be used for terrorist attacks against India would be adhered to. The case regarding Hafiz Sayeed is also one that concerns us as evidence available with us bring out his major role in the Mumbai Terrorist Attack Conspiracy.

Foreign Minister Qureshi conveyed to me that the trial against those accused for the Mumbai attack would begin shortly and that the Pakistan Government will take steps to see justice done. We will be monitoring developments on this score very carefully.

My meeting with Secretary Clinton reaffirmed the high importance of the unique and multi-faceted partnership between our two countries. PM's visit to Washington in November this year, will help further strengthen and broaden this relationship.

I had a fruitful discussion with Foreign Minister Spanta of Afghanistan and used the opportunity to convey that India stands for political stability and comprehensive development in a democratic Afghanistan.

I had the opportunity to underscore to the Sri Lankan Foreign Minister the importance of rehabilitating and resettling the IDPs on priority, and our hope to see their full integration.

703. Statement by Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor during the Commemoration of the 15th Anniversary of the International Conference on Population and Development at the 64th Session of the UN General Assembly.

New York, October 12, 2009.

Mr. President, Sir

As I am speaking for the first time in the UN General Assembly as the representative of India, please allow me to congratulate you on your election as the President of the General Assembly.

I am honoured and privileged to participate in today's open debate to commemorate the 15th anniversary of the International Conference on Population and Development, which was a major international initiative on an issue of critical importance for India.

Mr. President, Excellencies, Distinguished Delegates,

The International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) held in Cairo in 1994 was a landmark Conference. Overcoming deep divisions among member states, it succeeded in forging an unprecedented global consensus and integrated the diverse range of population, development and human rights issues into a blueprint for 20 years of action, popularly known as the Cairo consensus.

The Programme of Action addressed the complex interrelationships amongst population, economic growth and sustainable development, as well as population distribution, gender equality and empowerment of women, urbanization, migration, data collection and analysis.

For the first time, the population and development issues were dealt with in a holistic manner and individual human beings were placed at the very heart of the development process. There was a substantive effort to clarify the concept of reproductive rights and the programme also emphasized the centrality of reproductive health. It also acknowledged the central role of women and young people in the development process.

In my own country, this led to a shift in the Government's approach towards population stabilization from being target based to one based on making informed and voluntary choices.

The Cairo Consensus provided much of the groundwork for the Millennium Development Goals, which have now become the benchmark indicators for socio-economic development.

Mr. President,

I would like to pay tribute today to two women leaders of the UN system who have also been friends and close colleagues of mine: Dr. Nafir Sadik of Pakistan, the Secretary General of the Cairo Conference and a long-serving and effective leader of UNFPA, and Dr. Thoraya Obaid of Saudi Arabia, Dr. Sadik's dynamic and dedicated successor. Their work in promoting the rights of women remains indispensable to the future of our planet. India is bound to applaud and support their efforts.

Today's event offers us an invaluable opportunity to comprehensively review the progress made so far and analyse the challenges that lie ahead. The statements of the Secretary General and the President of the General Assembly have underscored the critical importance of realising the vision set out 15 years ago.

A review would indicate that the global achievements have been mixed at best. There have been slippages internationally as well as in many countries, including my own. It is a matter of regret that globally, we are still far from realizing the goal of universal primary education, infant and child mortality and maternal mortality rates continue to remain high and access to universal reproductive health is still distant in many parts of the world.

Nevertheless, it is my firm belief that these goals are still achievable. Resolute political will and concerted global action are needed to realise these goals. The benchmarks set by the ICPD Conference continue to highlight the onerous task ahead for all of us.

Mr. President,

India has been making a steady progress towards realizing the vision of the ICPD and attainment of the Millennium Development Goals. Despite the global economic slowdown, the Government of India has accorded very high priority to the education and health sectors, and has enhanced allocation by 19% to the social sector during the current financial year.

The National Rural Health Mission (NRHM), launched in 2005, is one of the biggest interventions of its kind in the health sector in the world. The NRHM seeks to significantly upgrade effective healthcare throughout India covering over 600 million people. It aims to improve access of rural people, especially poor women and children, to equitable, affordable, accountable and effective primary healthcare.

The Reproductive and Child Health Programme is one of the main components of the NRHM, and includes the ambitious programme of Janani Surakhksa Yojana (JSY), a safe motherhood intervention to promote institutional delivery with specific focus on poor pregnant women. So far, this programme has benefited more than 10 million women and has emerged as a major successful intervention in reducing maternal and infant mortality. As Dr. Obaid reminded us, no woman should die giving life. In statistical terms, India's Infant Mortality Rate is 55 per 1000 live births. Maternal Mortality Ratio has declined from 301 in the period 2001-03 to 254 in the period 2004-06. These are areas that require major attention on our part and our Government is seized of the problem. As regards the incidence of HIV/AIDS, it remains under 1% and is showing signs of reaching a plateau.

India's Family Planning Programme is one of the oldest in the world. It is based on the voluntary and informed choice and consent of citizens in availing of reproductive health care services. The programme aims at achieving population stabilization by addressing unmet needs through decentralized planning and programme implementation. At primary health care institutions, there has been an integration of the HIV/AIDS programme with reproductive health care.

India's Eleventh Plan recognizes that the "Development of Children is at the Centre of the Plan." This abiding policy commitment to an integrated approach to enhancing young child survival, growth, development and early learning is being translated into action through the Integrated Child Development Services (ICDS) Universalization with Quality Initiative. ICDS is today the worlds' largest early child development programme reaching out to over 78 million young children and pregnant and lactating mothers. There is added emphasis on convergence of services under various schemes and programmes including health, early childhood education and safe drinking water, so as to achieve the desired impact.

India has also embarked on ambitious programmes for human resource development. The Sarva Siksha Abhiyan (Education for All Campaign) launched in the year 2000, is a major national intervention towards achieving universal primary education and allowing us to reap the benefits of a demographic dividend from a young population.

This year the Government of India has brought into force the Right to Education Act. This Act aims to guarantee to each child, up-to the age of fourteen, the right to education. The Government has also launched a Female Literacy Mission this year with the aim of reducing female illiteracy by half, in the next three years.

Gender equity and empowerment have been guiding principles in the development policies of the Government of India. India's planning process is fully committed to enabling women to be equal partners in development. Gender budgeting has been introduced across all the sectors.

We have also moved on empowering women in the area of governance and decision making. The 73rd and 74th constitutional amendments introduced the provision for one-third reservation of seats for women in local self government institutions in India. We now have the distinction of having the largest number of women representatives in local government in the world and some three million of them hold elected office

Mr. President,

In these difficult times when the world is still grappling with the adverse effects of an unprecedented global economic and financial crisis, developing countries, where the crisis did not originate, have been the most affected. This threatens to undermine and even reverse the gains made so far in their arduous journey of development. Therefore, the need for donors to honour their pledges and the international community to keep up the stimulus and other efforts to spur the economies of developing countries cannot be overemphasized.

The Government of India remains firmly committed to realizing the vision set out in Cairo 15 years ago and to fulfilling the MDGs by 2015. While we shall certainly do all that we can domestically and within our capacities with our partners in the South, it is imperative that the international community meet its commitments in the global partnership that is critical for a better quality of life for all of us on our shared planet.

Thank you.

704. Statement by Minister of State Mrs. Preneet Kaur on 'Sport for Peace and Development: building a Peaceful and better world through sport and the Olympic ideal' at the 64th Session of the UN General Assembly.

New York, October 20, 2009

Mr. President,

I am honoured and privileged to participate in today's discussion on 'Sport for peace and development: building a peaceful and better world through sport and the Olympic ideal'.

As I am speaking for the first time in the 64th session of the General Assembly, please allow me at the outset to add my voice to that of all the others in congratulating you on assuming the Presidency of the General Assembly.

Mr. President,

By its very nature, sport is about inclusion and participation. It brings individuals and communities together and bridges ethnic and cultural divides.

It transcends social-cultural barriers, geographical borders, and promotes peace and harmony.

It also provides for understanding the importance of discipline and leadership.

Mr. President,

Sport is an inalienable part of the educational process and an essential component of a child's development.

It also fosters their physical and emotional health and building valuable social connections.

The fundamental elements of sports, including obvious benefits of physical and mental well being, make sports a most useful tool to support the achievements of the Millennium Development Goals.

Moreover, sporting activities have a unique convening power to spur social communication and advocacy.

They are most effective tools for social mobilisation supporting activities such as HIV/AIDS education and immunization campaigns.

In re-channelizing destructive impulses and harmful actions such as drug abuse and involvement in crime, the efficacy of sport cannot be overemphasized.

Mr. President,

A mastery over sports was considered as important as the knowledge of scriptures in ancient India.

The education system in modern India is trying to continue and build upon this heritage and respect for sports and physical education.

The effort of the Government of India has been for broad-basing sports and provision of modern sports infrastructure.

A National Sports Policy was adopted by India in 2001.

The Ministry of Youth Affairs and Sports in the Government of India has the national level responsibility for sports with the Sports Authority of India being its principal arm for nurturing talent and for provision of infrastructure, equipment, coaching and other facilities.

And, here, if I may add a personal touch - I am, indeed, proud that India's National Institute of Sports is located in my constituency, Patiala and my family has been and is intimately connected with the Olympic movement.

The Government has also encouraged the National Sports Federations to function more efficiently and is also encouraging the active involvement of business and industry in the promotion of sports.

Mr. President,

We are proud that New Delhi will be hosting the next Commonwealth Games from October 3-14, 2010.

These games are a unique, world class, multi-sport event held once every four years amongst the member countries and territories of the Commonwealth.

The three core values of the Commonwealth Games movement are humanity, equality and destiny, which were adopted by the games movement in 2001.

These values inspire and unite millions of people and symbolise the broad mandate for holding the games within the Commonwealth.

Last year, India organised Commonwealth Youth Games, a sub-event of the Commonwealth Games in Pune in October 2008.

Mr. President,

The founder of modern Olympic Games, Pierre de Coubertin, had said, "Sport must be the heritage of all men and of all social classes".

India is steadfast in its commitment to the Olympic charter and, as in previous years, is cosponsoring in the General Assembly the resolution on 'Sport for peace and development: building a peaceful and better world through sport and the Olympic ideal'.

We are also very pleased that the 2016 Olympics have been awarded to Rio de Janeiro in Brazil, a fellow developing country, and that the 2010 FIFA World Cup will be hosted by South Africa, a first for the African continent. We are also co-sponsoring the resolution on the '2010 FIFA World Cup in South Africa'.

We also wish Canada all success in organizing the XXI Winter Olympic Games and X Para-Olympic Winter Games and commend Singapore's initiative to organize the Youth Olympic Games.

We have no doubt that the hosting of major global sporting events in developing countries would contribute in an immense manner to the advancement of sports in developing countries and spur developmental activities.

Mr. President,

Sport is a reflection of the society. The degeneration of values in the society - violence, corruption, hooliganism, deception and drug abuse are also making inroads in sport.

Concerted vigil and resolute action are needed to prevent intrusion of these evils and to protect the noble ideals and spirit behind the Olympic Games and other sports.

It must be our endeavour to promote sports and a culture of sports in our countries. This can only contribute in promoting development, peace, friendship, cooperation and understanding among peoples.

I thank you.

705. Statement by Minister of State in the Ministry of External Affairs and Head of the Indian Delegation Mrs. Preet Kaur to the High Level Conference on South - South Cooperation.

Nairobi, December 2, 2009.

Mr. President, Excellencies, and Distinguished Delegates

I am honoured and privileged to participate in the High Level United Nations Conference on South-South Cooperation.

At the outset, please allow me to express our deepest gratitude to our host, His Excellency President Mwai Kibaki and the Government and people of Kenya, for the warm hospitality and for the excellent arrangements made in Nairobi.

I also wish to express our sincere thanks and appreciation to you, Mr. President, and to the United Nations Secretary General for the painstaking efforts made for ensuring the success at Nairobi.

My delegation associates itself with the statement of Sudan on behalf of the G-77 and China.

This Conference marks the 30th anniversary of the adoption of the Buenos Aires Plan of Action on South-South Cooperation.

It is a valuable opportunity for a comprehensive review and to explore ways and means to further strengthen South-South Cooperation.

Mr. President,

Our world is passing through turbulent times. We are confronted with multiple crises - the financial and economic crisis, impact of climate change, concerns on energy, and food security. Even though developing countries are not responsible for these crises, they threaten to seriously impair our development agenda and the progress that we have made so far on the Millennium Development Goals.

Mr. President,

We have a vital stake in evolving a more sustainable and equitable global economic system. An important imperative is the reform of global governance structures. The Bretton Woods Institutions need to change their decision-making processes to give adequate vote, real voice and proper representation to developing countries to reflect contemporary economic realities. At the UN, the General Assembly must be revitalized and act on issues of global concern. The ECOSOC should take real stock of global economic and social issues. And, the Security Council must reflect contemporary realities through an expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories and by improving its working methods. The global development agenda has to be inclusive, going beyond the Millennium Development Goals and the Doha Financing for Development process. In this context, I would like to emphasize the need to implement the outcomes of the Brussels Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries, the Almaty Plan for the Landlocked Developing Countries and the Mauritius Strategy for the Small Island Developing States.

Mr. President,

India's links with Africa are civilizational and we are committed to develop a comprehensive partnership with Africa. The India-Africa Forum Summit in New Delhi last year was reflective of this affinity and friendship.

We are happy that for our business sector, Africa is a natural partner and numerous Indian companies have large and active ventures that contribute to the economies of both Africa and India. These ventures span critical growth areas including information technology, biotechnology, pharmaceuticals, medical sciences, renewable and non-conventional energy and remote sensing. The Pan African E-Network project that seeks to bridge the 'digital divide' between Africa and the rest of the world is one of the most far-reaching initiatives undertaken by India. We are also happy to see our TEAM-9 initiative with our partners in West Africa and our cooperation with NEPAD bearing fruit. The Government of India has extended over US$ 3 billion concessional lines of credit to countries in Africa and this figure is now enhanced to US$ 5.4 billion for the next five years. India has unilaterally agreed to duty-free and quota-free market access to goods from 34 Least Developed Countries in Africa.

Mr. President,

India has a unique experience in nation-building given our large, complex and most diverse setting. As we have strived over more than sixty years since our Independence to give our people a better life, we have developed many capacities and capabilities that are critical for development and nation building. It has been our endeavour to share our experiences and knowledge with fellow developing countries. India has partnered to mutual benefit many of the countries in our region for infrastructure development. We have been in the forefront of pushing for removal of trade barriers in our region and better connectivity. We are happy to be able to contribute to the nation-building process underway in Afghanistan. Recognizing that upgradation of skills, empowerment and capacity building are key development needs, India established the Indian Technical and Economic Co-operation (ITEC) Programme as early as 1964. ITEC is today a major instrument and flagship programme of the Government of India for extending our technical cooperation and assistance to developing countries. It is demand-driven and response-oriented.

The ITEC Programme has, since its inception, expanded manifold and today covers 158 partner countries spread across Asia and the Pacific, Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean, Eastern Europe and CIS countries. As part of the ITEC Programme, India allocates and funds 5000 vocational training slots every year in over 200 short, medium and long-term courses at 42 Institutes of eminence considered to be leading facilities in their field of specialization with many of them gravitating towards hi-tech areas like IT.

ITEC is also a platform for India's partnership for feasibility studies, infrastructure projects and deputation of experts. ITEC has very wide coverage and has acquired a brand image across the developing world. The ITEC Programme fully symbolizes the true spirit of India's commitment and endeavour for South-South Cooperation.

Mr. President,

South-South Cooperation has come a long way with a remarkable rise in South-South trade, finance and investment flows over the last decade. From 1995 onwards, South-South merchandise trade grew on an average by 13 percent, reaching 2.4 trillion dollars, or 20% of world trade in 2007. However, the challenges continue to be daunting with poverty eradication, hunger and basic health needs still remaining unmet in many developing countries. North-South cooperation and triangular cooperation involving the North are critical to achieving these objectives. We urge our friends and partners in the developed world to adhere to their commitments. The long-set target of 0.7% of Gross National Income as ODA needs to be honoured as a matter of priority. South-South Cooperation is a much broader and deeper concept than traditional North-South aid-driven cooperation. It is a cooperative partnership between developing countries embedded in the sharing of expertise, knowledge, experiences, technology, and provision of assistance based on one's national capacities and as an expression of solidarity and mutual cooperation. It is entirely voluntary in nature and furthers national development priorities with national ownership at its centre. However, cooperation between countries of the South is neither a substitute to North-South Cooperation nor should it be used to dilute the quantum of North-South Cooperation or look at it from a traditional donor-recipient perspective. The UN system must further South-South Cooperation and also facilitate triangular cooperation by bringing in resources from the North and harnessing Southern capacities, expertise and experience. This would also help develop capacity within the South, in the implementation process itself. India is happy to participate in triangular cooperation and is an active participant in the Heiligendamm-L'Aquila process and through the India, Brazil and South Africa initiative, IBSA.

India has always remained steadfast in its commitment and efforts to advance the collective cause of the South, bilaterally and within the framework of regional and multilateral groupings. It is with this positive and constructive spirit that we participate in this Conference. South-South cooperation is not a mere phrase for my country, but a way of life, an enduring commitment, a philosophy for growth and development together.

Thank you, Mr. President.

DISARMAMENT

706. Statement by Permanent Representative to the Conference on Disarmament Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao to the Disarmament Conference, Geneva, February 3, 2009.

Mr. President,

The Indian delegation congratulates you on your assumption of the Presidency. We would like to assure you of our full cooperation in the discharge of your responsibilities. We would also like to thank you for the able manner in which you have undertaken consultations with the membership of the Conference. We associate ourselves with the Statement made on behalf of the G 21.

We commence the 2009 Annual Session against the backdrop of an uncertain international situation resulting from multiple challenges to global peace and security. As member states of the single multilateral disarmament negotiating forum of the international community, we have a responsibility to work together to fulfill the mandate of this Conference to negotiate multilateral treaties which while addressing the challenges to international security also safeguard our vital national security interests.

That this Conference has been unable to move forward on its main vocation- negotiation of multilateral treaties of universal application- for over a decade now is a cause for disappointment. The obstacles to such progress are not the CD's Rules of Procedure or its Rule of Consensus. We hope that Conference is able to reach common agreement on substantive issues to take forward our work. As in previous years, India will contribute constructively to discussions with the aim of the CD commencing substantive work by reaching consensus on its Programme of Work.

Mr. President,

India attaches the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament. India's Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh reiterated in UN General Assembly on 26th September 2008, India's proposal for a Nuclear Weapon Convention, banning the production, development stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and to provide for their complete elimination within a specified time frame. This is consistent with India's long standing and steadfast commitment to universal non-discriminatory and total elimination of nuclear weapons which was put forward in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan in 1988.

India has put forward a number of proposals at the General Assembly on Nuclear Disarmament. The 63rd session of the General Assembly approved a Resolution sponsored by India on a Convention on the prohibition of use and threat of use of nuclear weapons, which calls upon the CD to commence negotiation on an international convention prohibiting the use and threat of nuclear weapons under the any circumstances. India tabled a working paper (CD/1816) in the CD containing several proposals on nuclear disarmament.

We welcome the renewed and "active debate amongst scholars and statesmen on nuclear disarmament. A number of countries have also launched initiatives to add new life to the global disarmament agenda. Even amongst those nuclear weapon states that were reluctant supporters of nuclear reductions there appears to be a new willingness to ponder over the relevance and future of nuclear weapons. These trends must be further strengthened with the effort to achieve complete elimination of nuclear weapons, rather than ad-hoc steps on non-proliferation, an approach whose limitations we have seen in the past.

We feel that there is a responsibility on the Conference of Disarmament to meaningfully respond to growing international opinion in favour of nuclear disarmament. At the same time, we recognize that these are complex issues and achieving the goal of global nuclear disarmament in a verifiable and irreversible manner will be a long and arduous process. But in order to commence consideration of these complex issues, India would like to reiterate its proposal made last year that the CD consider the appointment of a special coordinator to assist in carrying out consultations on specific measures or a set of measures that have the potential of commanding consensus which can form the basis of a mandate for a possible Ad hoc Committee on nuclear disarmament.

Mr. President,

India supports the establishment of an Ad hoc Committee on FMCT as part of CD's Programme of Work. India was one of the original co-sponsors of UNGA Resolution 48/75L, adopted in 1993 which envisaged FMCT as a significant contribution to nuclear non-proliferation in all its aspects. India was able to join the 1993 international consensus on FMCT as it reflected with clarity the common understanding of the basic objective of the treaty. Clarity on the mandate enabled India to join consensus and on that basis support the negotiations in the Conference on Disarmament on a nondiscriminatory, multilateral and internationally and effectively verifiable treaty banning the production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices in 1995 and 1998.

India has had a consistent position on FMCT. We believe that the CD is the appropriate forum for negotiating the FMCT. These negotiations should be conducted through an Ad hoc Committee or a subsidiary body of the CD in accordance with its Rules of Procedure and as part of a formal decision by the Conference on its Programme of Work. We believe that common understanding and clarity on the mandate would ensure smooth conduct and successful conclusion of negotiations. India will participate actively to build the necessary international consensus so as to enable CD to move forward on this important issue to negotiate and conclude a universal, nondiscriminatory and verifiable treaty banning the future production of fissile material for nuclear weapons and other explosive devices. It is obvious that the treaty would have to meet India's national security interests.

India supports negotiations with a view to reaching agreement on effective arrangements to assure non-nuclear weapons States against the use and threat of use of nuclear weapons. On this important issue, the CD can make a meaningful contribution by undertaking negotiations of an appropriate agreement in an Ad hoc Committee on Negative security assurances. India has espoused a policy of no first use and non use against non-nuclear States and is prepared to convert these undertakings into multilateral legal arrangements.

There is growing concern that current technological developments, in particular related to ASAT, may impact negatively on the present international legal framework on outer space. We, therefore, support international efforts to reinforce safety and security of space based assets and to prevent the placement of weapons in outer space. There are number proposals on the table, including a draft treaty tabled by Russia and China, which deserve further consideration.

There is no legal regime of universal applicability governing the possession and use of Missiles. Any proposal to address the issues of missiles should be based on the principle of equal and legitimate security and should be universal and non-discriminatory in its application.

Mr. President,

I would like to conclude by placing on record our deep appreciation for the efforts that have been undertaken by you and your predecessors to build on the momentum of previous years, with the aim of finding common ground to enable the CD to commence substantive work. India will work with other delegations to make progress towards our common goal which is reaching consensus on Programme of Work to enable the CD to move forward. We are hopeful that our common efforts will bear substantive fruit in the coming months.

Thank you.

707. Statement by Minister (Disarmament) at the Permanent Mission to the Conference on Disarmament D.B. Venkatesh Varma at the GGE on Cluster Munitions.

April 4, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

We would like to join other delegations in conveying to you our deep appreciation for your efforts as Chair of GGE on Cluster Munitions. We would like to thank you for the consultations that you conducted during the GGE meeting in February this year and for making available a consolidated text on Cluster Munitions as contained in Annex II of the Procedural Report adopted by the GGE on 20 February, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

India shares the international community's concerns about the humanitarian impact of the irresponsible use of the Cluster Munitions. The use of Cluster Munitions is lawful and legitimate if such use takes into account existing international humanitarian law. India supported the negotiation of an instrument in the CCW consistent with the mandate of the GGE that strikes a balance between military and humanitarian concerns. This mandate reflected the consensus view amongst State Parties of the CCW that efforts must be undertaken to establish common international standards regarding Cluster Munitions. Implicit in the adoption of the mandate was that a common international standard did not exist and it is for the GGE to arrive at agreement on common terms of reference and common applicable standards through negotiation in the framework provided by the CCW. India gave its enthusiastic support, for an international instrument on Cluster Munitions emanating from the CCW given the potential of universal participation, resulting in substantial humanitarian benefits.

Mr. Chairman,

During 2008, the GGE held five sessions spread over 7 weeks. In 2009, the GGE met for one week in February. We believe that substantial progress has been made during the 8 weeks of work. Your efforts in attempting to synthesis the proposals and to take forward the work of the GGE as reflected in the consolidated text is indeed commendable. We believe it is a realistic basis for exploring the possibilities of consensus. Like other delegations, India looks forward to making specific suggestions and proposals so that an amended text would have a greater chance of success of gaining consensus.

While exploring the possibility of common agreement, we should also be aware of the limits of consensus as provided by the mandate. It is clear for various reasons that a comprehensive universal ban on Cluster Munitions is not within the reach of the international community, either in the CCW or outside. Merely prohibiting a certain category of Cluster Munitions may in fact create space in the international market for more advanced varieties, thus forcing countries down an expensive route of technological upgradation of their Cluster Munitions stocks. Here we wish to emphasize that no empirical evidence has been provided in the GGE to date on the real humanitarian benefits of pursuing technological features relating to accuracy or reliability. Similarly, it may not entirely be productive to insist on the efficacy of technical standards agreed in other international instruments negotiated outside the frame work of the CCW. Naturally, it would be difficult for the GGE to accept technical standards established elsewhere like it would be unreasonable for states to assert the protection in the CCW of rights that they have carved out for themselves in other international instruments.

However, India is prepared to look at a phased approach with transition periods aimed at effective regulation of CMs in terms of their use, establish a common technical standard for their reliability and affirm agreed obligations arising from the use of Cluster Munitions in post-conflict situations. If exclusions are to be provided for munitions exclusively designed for anti-runway use or exclusive designed as anti-ship munitions at sea, it would be appropriate to prohibit that such munitions are not used for any other purpose. We also believe that considerable useful work was done last year under the Friend of the Chair on International Humanitarian Law, with regard to protection of civilians, the civilian population and civilian objects, which should be adequately reflected in any future Protocol on Cluster Munitions.

Mr. Chairman,

Despite the complexity of issues involved, some of which have been referred to above, we feel that the successful negotiation of a Protocol on Cluster Munitions through the participation of a large cross section of states would make a significant impact on the ground. This is indicative of the potential inherent in the CCW process. Therefore, we should redouble our efforts. Current gaps in positions could also mean that we may need to invest more efforts in seeking common ground either during this session of the GGE or in meetings that state parties may agree to hold in the future. For its part, India remains committed to the CCW process and would spare no effort in contributing to its success. Let me conclude by conveying our deep appreciation for all your efforts this year, a task that you have discharged with a high degree of dedication and professionalism.

Thank you.

708. Statement by Permanent Representative at the Conference on Disarmament Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao at the plenary meeting of the Disarmament Conference.

Geneva, May 28, 2009.

Mr. President,

We have requested the floor to convey India's position with regard to the draft decision regarding Programme of Work for the 2009 Session contained in CD 1863. We have noted that the draft decision provides the basis for commencement of substantive work of the Conference, an objective that India has consistently supported.

India supports the establishment of a Working Group to negotiate an FMCT. This is in keeping with our position since 1993, when India joined as a co-sponsor UNGA resolution 48/75 L. As a country possessing nuclear weapons we are willing to conclude a universal, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable treaty banning the future production of fissile material for nuclear weapons and other nuclear explosives devices.

India attaches the highest priority to nuclear disarmament and the elimination of nuclear weapons on a universal and non-discriminatory basis. While disappointed that the CD has not been able to launch negotiations on Nuclear Disarmament, we believe that the CD should continue to explore all possible avenues to make progress so as to respond meaningfully to growing international opinion in favour of a vision of a world free of nuclear weapons.

India will not stand in the way of the adoption of the draft decision contained in CD 1863 in the hope that this will now allow the Conference to commence substantive work. We reserve the right to make remarks on substantive elements of the Programme of work after its formal adoption by the Conference.

While conveying our appreciation for your dedicated efforts, we remain hopeful that our common efforts will bear substantive fruit in the near future.

Thank you.

709. Statement by Permanent Representative at the Conference on Disarmament Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao in the Plenary after the adoption of Decision on Programme of Work contained in CD 71863

May 29, 2009

Mr. President, we have requested the floor after joining consensus on the Draft Decision for the establishment of a Programme of Work for the 2009 Session contained in CD/1863 where we had, inter-alia, conveyed our willingness to conclude a universal, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable treaty banning the future production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices. We wish to place on record India's perspective on the Programme of Work just adopted and spell out the essential basis of India's concurrence for commencement of negotiations on an FMCT.-

2. India supports the establishment of a Working Group to negotiate an FMCT as part of the CD's programme of Work. India was one of the original cosponsors of the UNGA resolution 48/75/L adopted in 1993 on FMCT as it envisaged the treaty as a significant contribution to nuclear non-proliferation in all its aspects. The mandate for the proposed treaty was explicitly reflected in the 1993 UNGA Resolution and reconfirmed by the Shannon Report contained in CD/1299 i.e. to 'negotiate a nondiscriminatory, multilateral and internationally and effectively verifiable treaty banning the production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices'. The scope of such a treaty would focus on the future production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices.

3. We are committed to participating constructively in the FMCT negotiations in the CD. Our Prime Minister stated in Parliament on 13th August 2006 that India is willing to join only a non-discriminatory, multilateral^ negotiated and internationally verifiable FMCT, as and when it is concluded in the Conference on Disarmament, provided our security interests are fully addressed. India is a nuclear weapon state and a responsible member of the world community, and would approach these negotiations as such. We will not accept obligations not in keeping with or prejudicial to our national security interests or which hinder our strategic programme, our R&D as well as three-stage nuclear programme. The treaty should not place an undue burden on military non-proscribed activities.

4. India attaches the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament. Speaking at the UNGA on 26 September, 2008, our Prime Minister reiterated

India's proposal for a Nuclear Weapons Convention for banning the production, development, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and to provide for their complete elimination within a specified time frame. This is consistent with India's longstanding commitment put forward in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan in 1988. Nuclear weapons are an integral part of our national security and will remain so pending the global elimination of all nuclear weapons on a universal, non-discriminatory basis. An FMCT would be a step towards this goal.

5. While joining the consensus on this Programme of Work, we wish to place on record our disappointment that the Conference could not decide on launching negotiations on nuclear disarmament. We feel that there is a heavy responsibility on the Conference on Disarmament, as the single multilateral disarmament negotiating forum, to respond meaningfully to growing international opinion in favour of Nuclear Disarmament. While India has gone along with the establishment of Working Group to exchange views and information on practical steps for progressive and systematic efforts to reduce nuclear weapons with the ultimate goal of their elimination, we believe that the CD should continue to actively explore all possible avenues to advance the Conference's work for actual commencement on negotiations on nuclear disarmament. CD/1863 does in fact include the possibility of future negotiations and we believe that the CD should take concrete steps in that direction.

6. The work of the CD should be conducted in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and on the basis of strict adherence to the Rule that CD shall conduct its work and adopt its decisions by Consensus, to provide the necessary assurance that the security interests of member states shall be fully protected.

7. We would like to conclude by placing on record our deep appreciation for your efforts and those undertaken by your predecessors with the aim of finding common ground to enable the CD to commence substantive work this year. We are hopeful that our common efforts will bear substantive fruit in the years ahead.

710. Statement by Minister Disarmament at the Permanent Mission to the Conference on Disarmament D.B. Venkatesh Varma at the meeting of the experts of the State Parties to the Biological Weapons Convention.

Geneva, August 24, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

The Indian delegation would like to convey its congratulations to you on your assumption of the Chairmanship of this meeting. We would like to convey our deep appreciation for all your efforts and that of the Implementation Support Unit for the excellent ground work undertaken for the Meeting of Experts.

India associates itself with the statement made by the delegation of Cuba on behalf of the Non Aligned Movement.

Mr. Chairman,

India attaches the highest priority to the further strengthening of the BWC as it was the first disarmament treaty that eliminated an entire category of weapons of mass destruction. We believe that only a multilaterally agreed mechanism for verification of compliance can provide the assurance of observance of compliance obligations by States Parties and act as a deterrence against non compliance. We also believe that the decision regarding strengthening of the BWC and to ensure its effective implementation should be taken by the Review Conference based on the principle of consensus.

India has consistently underlined the importance of international cooperation with regard to issues related to BWC. While disease surveillance and mitigation remain primarily a national responsibility, it is recognized that disease and epidemics do not respect national borders and biological agents need to be tracked so that they do not enter new regions. This aspect has made international collaboration crucial for epidemic control.

India believes that the promotional aspects of Article X are a crucial element in strengthening the BWC and in achieving universal adherence. While there are several examples of international cooperation, it is also a fact that denial of materials, equipment and technology related to peaceful uses of biotechnology including disease surveillance and control continue to exist and hamper legitimate uses of biological materials for peaceful purposes.

The BWC State Parties should facilitate the fullest possible exchange of equipment, materials and scientific and technical information for the uses of bacteriological (biological) agents and toxins for peaceful purposes consistent with their obligation under the Convention. This would benefit developing countries to meet their development needs, including improving public health and in building a robust biotechnology industry. It would also promote universality of the Convention and would be instrumental in establishing linkages amongst States Parties leading to a higher level of confidence in the Convention. The strengthened implementation of the provisions of Article III would ensure that the cooperation envisaged under Article X is not abused.

Effective export controls are an essential component of international cooperation to ensure that disease causing organisms and pathogens do not fall into the hands of terrorists and are used only for peaceful purposes. India's export control system effectively regulates the export of almost 150 micro-organisms and toxins in the category of bacteria, fungi, parasites, viruses, rickettsials, toxins and plant pathogens. Genetically modified micro-organisms or genetic elements that contain nucleic acid sequences associated with pathogenicity and are derived from the listed organisms are also controlled. India has submitted information on the outbreak of communicable diseases in the country in its 2007 national submission on BWC CBMs.

India attaches importance to the two agenda items for this meeting of experts. -We approach this meeting with an open mind; we will put forward our approach and perspectives and hope to benefit from the presentations made by other delegations. We believe that effective and efficient disease surveillance system is necessary to detect cases of alleged use of biological weapons and suspicious outbreaks of diseases. The threat posed by bioterrorism should be addressed effectively. Natural pandemics such as the recent Avian and H1N1 outbreaks underline that these threats are real and international cooperation to tackle them is imperative.

India has put into place comprehensive systems for disease surveillance to deal with human, animal and plant diseases. The system has been developed in consultation with WHO, OIE and FAO. Our delegation will be making presentations on Disease Surveillance and International Cooperation in terms of capacity building assistance during the course of this week.

We pledge our support for a successful outcome of this meeting of experts.

711. Statement by Permanent Representative to the Conference on Disarmament Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao at the General Debate of the First Committee of the 64th Session of the United Nations General Assembly.

New York, October 8, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

It is a pleasure to convey to you our congratulations on your election to the Chairmanship of this Committee and we assure you the full cooperation of the Indian delegation. We would like to associate ourselves with the statement made by Indonesia on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

We commence this year's First Committee deliberations against the background of not only multiple challenges to global peace and security but an accompanying mood of optimism as well that we can find viable and enduring solutions through collective efforts underlined by a genuine spirit of multilateralism. In achieving this objective, as provided by the UN Charter, the General Assembly and the First Committee, dealing with international security and disarmament issues, can play a vital and substantive role.

Mr. Chairman,

India attaches the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament. During the 63rd Session of the UNGA, India's Prime Minister reiterated our proposal for a Nuclear Weapons Convention prohibiting the development, production, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and providing for their complete elimination within a specified timeframe. Our policy is consistent with the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament enshrined in the Final Document of SSOD-I and in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan of 1988. The Non-Aligned Movement reaffirmed the same objectives during its recent summit at Sharm-el Sheikh.

We believe that just as it was possible to prohibit chemical and biological weapons, through non-discriminatory and global international conventions, achievement of non-discriminatory, global nuclear disarmament is not only possible but that global security would be enhanced by a nuclear weapon free world. Such a vision brings together principle and pragmatism. India welcomes the active debate amongst scholars and statesmen on nuclear disarmament and a number of initiatives launched to add new life to the global disarmament agenda, including by the UNSG in October last year.

There are some encouraging signs, including the declared intention of the United States and Russia to negotiate further cuts in their nuclear arsenals as well as the willingness of the United States, as indicated in President Obama's statement in Prague in April this year, to reduce the role of nuclear weapons in its national security strategy.

The goal of nuclear disarmament can be achieved through a step-by-step process underwritten by a universal commitment to achieve the complete elimination of nuclear weapons. Nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation are mutually reinforcing processes but the overall goal of nuclear disarmament should not be held hostage to nuclear non-proliferation. At the same, we must ensure that non - proliferation objectives are achieved through concerted and cooperative international efforts. Expansion of nuclear energy, which is vital to ensure global energy security and to combat climate change, must be ensured in a manner that does not enhance proliferation risks.

To take forward the global debate on nuclear disarmament, India has suggested the following measures:

Reaffirmation of the unequivocal commitment of all nuclear weapon States to the goal of complete elimination of nuclear weapons;

Reduction of the salience of nuclear weapons in the security doctrines;

Taking into account the global reach and menace of nuclear weapons, adoption of measures by nuclear-weapon States to reduce nuclear danger, including the risks of accidental nuclear war, de-alerting of nuclear-weapons to prevent unintentional and accidental use of nuclear weapons.

Negotiation of a global agreement among nuclear weapon States on 'no-First-use' of nuclear-weapons;

Negotiation of a universal and legally-binding agreement on non-use of nuclear weapons against non-nuclear weapon States.

Negotiation of a Convention on the complete prohibition of the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons;

Negotiation of a Nuclear Weapons Convention prohibiting the development, production, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and on their destruction, leading to the global, non-discriminatory and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons with a specified timeframe.

Mr. Chairman,

During its 2009 Annual Session, the Conference on Disarmament reached consensus on a Programme of Work, an important milestone, after more than a decade of impasse. We share the disappointment that the Conference was, thereafter, unable to get down to substantive work. As the single multilateral negotiating forum on disarmament, the CD bears a responsibility to meaningfully respond to the international community's expectations in the disarmament field, particularly on the priority issue of nuclear disarmament.

India is committed to participating constructively in the FMCT negotiations in the CD as part of its Programme of Work. Our Prime Minister stated on 13th August, 2006 that India is willing to join only a non-discriminatory, multilaterally negotiated and internationally verifiable FMCT as and when it is concluded in the Conference on Disarmament, provided our security interests are fully addressed. India is a nuclear weapon state and a responsible member of the world community, and would approach these negotiations as such.

India continues to attach importance to addressing wide-spread international demands for conclusion of an agreement on effective international arrangements to assure non-nuclear weapon states against the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. As part of its credible minimum nuclear deterrent, India has espoused the policy of 'No First Use' and non-use against non-nuclear weapon states and is prepared to convert these undertakings into multilateral legal arrangements. India is committed to maintaining its voluntary, unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing.

India would support continuing international efforts to strengthen the international legal framework to ensure the safety and security of space assets and to prevent the weaponization of outer space. Issues relating to the possession and use of missiles should be addressed in a sustainable and comprehensive manner through a global process based on the principle of equal and legitimate security.

India attaches importance to the continuing role of the UN in addressing conventional arms control, including regulation of small arms and light weapons in view of the nexus between small arms proliferation and terrorism. We remain strongly committed to the CCW process as being vitally important in strengthening regulation of armed conflict and international humanitarian law. India has ratified all the five protocols.

It will be India's honour to Chair the Annual meeting of States Parties to Protocol V in November this year.

Last year, India welcomed the opening of the new UN Regional Centre for peace and Disarmament in Asia and Pacific in Kathmandu. India will extend all possible support for the Kathmandu Centre to fulfill its mandate.

Mr. Chairman,

As in the previous year, India seeks the support of the First Committee for the following three resolutions:

- a) Convention on the Prohibition of Use of Nuclear Weapons
- b) Reducing Nuclear Danger
- c) Measures to prevent terrorists from acquiring Weapons of Mass Destruction:

We will be making more detailed statements to introduce these resolutions during the time allocated for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman,

We would like to assure you of our full support in ensuring the success of this year's deliberations.

712. Statement by Permanent Representative to the Conference on Disarmament Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao, at the Thematic Debate on Nuclear Weapons at the First Committee of the 64th UN General Assembly.

New York, October 15, 2009

Mr. Chairman,

It gives me pleasure to convey how pleased we are to see you chairing the thematic debate on Nuclear Weapons. India associates itself with the statement on this Cluster by Indonesia on behalf of the NAM.

India has consistently maintained its principled position- it attaches the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament, both as a national position which has enjoyed strong and consistent domestic support as well as a member of the Non-Aligned Movement, which has stood steadfast in its support for global nuclear disarmament. In this context, we recall that the only document on Nuclear Disarmament adopted by consensus by the international community - the Final Document of SSOD I accorded the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament. The Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan of 1988 provided a holistic framework for the complete elimination of nuclear weapons to usher in a world free of nuclear weapons and rooted in nonviolence. We remain committed to that objective.

Speaking at the 63rd session of the General Assembly, Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh reiterated India's proposal for a Nuclear Weapons Convention prohibiting the development, production, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and providing for their complete elimination within a specified time frame. India's External Affairs Minister again underlined India's support for a Nuclear Weapons Convention during his address to the UNGA last month.

India has consistently maintained that nuclear disarmament can be achieved through a step by step process underwritten by a universal commitment for global elimination of nuclear weapons. In a working paper submitted to the UNGA in 2006, India suggested a number of measures in this regard, including reaffirmation of the unequivocal commitment by all nuclear weapon states to the goal of complete elimination of nuclear weapons. Consideration could also be given to specific legal measures, including a Global No First Use Agreement and negotiation of a Convention on the Prohibition of the use of Nuclear weapons. Measures to reduce nuclear dangers arising from accidental or unauthorized use of nuclear weapons are also pertinent in this regard.

Addressing the threat posed by all nuclear weapons to international peace and security, requires the global elimination of nuclear weapons on a non-discriminatory basis. It is clear that while preventing proliferation is important we must not lose sight of the essential principle of the mutually reinforcing linkage between disarmament and non-proliferation, As such, nuclear disarmament cannot be held hostage to absolute success in the non-proliferation field. International efforts in this regard should build the necessary confidence among states so that international treaties and agreements are multilaterally negotiated and freely accepted which remains the true test of their legitimacy and credibility. At the same time, states should fully and effectively implement the obligations arising from the agreements or treaties to which they are parties.

India has acceded to and is in full implementation of the two nondiscriminatory International Conventions banning Biological and Chemical Weapons. India's position on the NPT is well-known. There is no question of India joining the NPT as a non-nuclear weapon state. Nuclear weapons are an integral part of India's national security and will remain so, pending non-discriminatory and global nuclear disarmament.

As part of its credible minimum nuclear deterrent, India has espoused the policy of 'No First Use' against nuclear weapon states and non-use against non-nuclear weapon states and is prepared to convert these undertakings into multilateral legal arrangements.

As the single multilateral negotiating forum on disarmament, the CD bears a responsibility to meaningfully respond to the international community's expectations in the disarmament field, particularly on the priority issue of nuclear disarmament. As a nuclear weapon state and a responsible member of the world community, India is committed to participating constructively in the FMCT negotiations in the CD as part of its Programme of Work.

India welcomes the renewed attention of the international community on achieving a nuclear weapon free world. World leaders, Parliamentarians, distinguished statesman, international groups and NGOs have lent their voice in favor of nuclear disarmament. The shifting currents of informed opinion are now moving in favor of Nuclear Disarmament. As the embodiment of multilateralism, the UN should carry forward this momentum, in recognition of which the UN Secretary General put forward his 5 Point Plan, which inter-alia also includes consideration of a Nuclear Weapons Convention. To sustain the current mood of optimism, follow up action on the ground will be needed, based on a genuine desire to take concrete steps to reduce the role of nuclear weapons in security doctrines, measures to reduce nuclear dangers and universal commitments for global and non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament.

The threat of nuclear terrorism is a formidable challenge facing the international community. We support the strengthening international efforts to address this threat, including improving nuclear security. In this context, we welcome the US initiative to convene a Global Summit on Nuclear Security in 2010.

As in previous years, India will be sponsoring the following resolutions.

First, on behalf of the co-sponsors, I would like to introduce the draft resolution entitled "Convention on the Prohibition of the Use of Nuclear Weapons." This resolution reflects the belief that a multilateral, universal and legally binding instrument prohibiting the use or threat of use of nuclear - weapons will contribute to the process of de-legitimization of nuclear weapons and create a climate for negotiations for an agreement on the prohibition of nuclear weapons. The operative part of the resolution reiterates the call on the Conference on Disarmament to commence negotiations to reach agreement on an international convention on prohibiting the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons under any circumstances.

I also have the honor to introduce on behalf of the co-sponsors the draft resolution on "Reducing Nuclear Danger." This resolution highlights that the hair-trigger posture of nuclear forces carries the unacceptable risk of unintentional or accidental use of nuclear weapons, which could have catastrophic consequences. The operative part of the resolution calls for a review of nuclear doctrines, as also immediate steps to reduce the risk of unintentional or accidental use of nuclear weapons, including through the de-alerting and de-targeting of nuclear weapons. It is a matter of satisfaction that the issues addressed by this resolution have gained greater recognition and acceptance in the international community and we hope that those delegations which had difficulties in the past will reconsider their position in light of these new trends.

On the behalf of co-sponsors, India is tabling, as in previous years, a draft resolution on "Measures to prevent terrorists from acquiring weapons of mass destruction," This resolution highlights the concerns of the international community and calls upon all Member states to take measures aimed at preventing terrorists from acquiring weapons of mass destruction. It underlines that the international response to this threat needs to be at national, multilateral and global level. We hope, as in the past, this resolution will be adopted by consensus and receive the co-sponsorship of an increasing group of countries.

Thank you.

713. Statement by Permanent Representative to the Conference on Disarmament Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao, at the Thematic Debate on Conventional Weapons at the First Committee of the 64th UN General Assembly.

New York, October 20, 2009

Mr. Chairman,

India attaches importance to addressing the challenges posed by conventional weapons in the field of international security. While weapons of mass destruction are rightly accorded priority in the area of disarmament and arms control, conventional weapons and small arms and light weapons constitute an important concern. We associate ourselves with the statement made by Indonesia on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

India is deeply concerned that conventional weapons, including small arms and light weapons, continue to pose a grave danger to the security of States. Their indiscriminate and irresponsible use, including by non-State actors, has caused enormous humanitarian concern. Such weapons disrupt political stability and social harmony, derail pluralism and democracy and hamper growth and development. They fuel international terrorism and internal conflicts thus posing a major threat to the security of states.

The United Nations has had a measure of success in dealing with the threat posed by illicit trade in small arms and light weapons. The Programme of Action adopted in July 2001 outlines a realistic, achievable and comprehensive approach to address the problem, at national, regional and global levels. The integrity of the POA consensus nature must be preserved and strengthened. India will contribute constructively to the Fourth Biennial Meeting of States and the Review Conference on the POA to be held no later than 2012. We believe that national Governments bear the primary responsibility for preventing, combating, and eradicating the illicit trade in small arms and light weapons in all its aspects. There should be a ban on transfers to non-state actors and terrorists groups.

India will also continue to pursue the objective of a non-discriminatory, universal and global ban on anti-personnel mines in a manner that addresses the legitimate defence requirements of States. Landmines continue to play an important role in the defence of States that have long land borders with difficult and inhospitable terrains. The process of complete elimination of antipersonnel mines will be facilitated by the availability of military effective, non-lethal and cost-effective alternative technologies.

The CCW Convention remains the only forum of a universal character that brings together all the main users and producers of major conventional weapons, thus ensuring that the instruments that emerge have greater prospects of making a meaningful impact on the ground. India is privileged to be part of the small group of countries that has ratified all the instruments of the CCW package and will have the honour of chairing the Third Annual Meeting of States parties to Protocol V. India has also proposed a broad based dialogue to consider a new and strengthened format of the CCW Convention that would by common agreement, reaffirm and strengthen the application of international law in regulating and protecting the victims of warfare.

We share the international community's concerns about the humanitarian impact of the irresponsible use of cluster munitions. India has contributed actively to ongoing discussions to negotiate an instrument in the CCW consistent with the mandate of the GCE adopted in November 2007 that strikes a balance between military and humanitarian concerns. We look forward to further discussions in the CCW Meeting in Geneva in next month.

India has provided regularly its national submissions to the UN Register of Conventional Weapons, which is an important instrument of confidence building. India participated actively in the GGE on continuing operation of the UN Register on Conventional Arms. Careful consideration should be given in future work of the GGE to new class of equipment that are now being used in combat operations before they are included in the Register. India also attaches importance to further consideration of providing transparency in military expenditures, which is the hall mark of democratic states.

India participated actively in the Open ended working group on the ATT. We note that that the Group acknowledged that respective responsibilities exist for both exporters and importers to address the current situation, based on the principles established in the United Nations Charter, in a non-discriminatory manner. The Open-ended Working Group also recognized the need to address the problems relating to unregulated trade in conventional weapons and their diversion to the illicit market. Considering that such risks can fuel instability, international terrorism, and transnational organized crime, the Group supported that international action should be taken to address the problem.

We hope that future consideration of the ATT in the UN should be undertaken based on a step by step process, in an open and transparent manner with no artificial deadlines while recognizing that prospects of an instrument of universal acceptance would be enhanced through a consensus driven decision making process and outcome. It is vitally important that any such instrument should be consistent with the right of self-defence of states and their right to protect their legitimate foreign policy and national security interests.

714. Statement by Permanent Representative to the Conference on Disarmament Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao at the First Committee on thematic discussion on the UN Disarmament Machinery.

23 October 2009

Mr. Chairman,

The UN, in accordance with its Charter, has a central role and primary responsibility in the sphere of disarmament. This Committee is the embodiment of our faith in the benefits of collective action and of multilateral approaches in resolving global issues concerning international security and disarmament.

As the single multilateral negotiating forum on disarmament, there is a heavy responsibility on the Conference on Disarmament to make progress on the international disarmament agenda. We remain committed to efforts, consistent with the rules of procedure, aimed at the CD reaching consensus on its Programme of Work to commence early substantive work. Since its decisions impact on national security of its member states, it is logical that the CD conduct its work and adopt its decision by consensus.

India attaches high importance to the UNDC, which is the deliberative leg of the triad of the disarmament machinery put in place by consensus by SSOD I. As the universal deliberative forum, it provides for in-depth consideration of specific disarmament issues for submission of recommendations to the General Assembly and can help bring back coherence and consensus to the currently fragmented international disarmament agenda.

The UNSG has given his personal priority to nuclear disarmament and has put forward his 5 point plan, which inter alia, makes reference to a Nuclear Weapons Convention. The Secretary General's Advisory Board on Disarmament matters should be more representative so that it can reflect on the broadest range of views and opinions. Its focus should remain the broader vision of global disarmament issues, rather than as a preparatory committee of one or another treaty.

The current optimism in the field of disarmament should be backed by concrete steps to strengthen the ODA. In particular, we would like the Geneva branch of the ODA to be strengthened to facilitate the implementation of permanent treaty bodies under the UN such as the BWC and the CCW.

In a similar vein, UNIDIR the designated UN Institute to undertake independent, in depth and long term research on disarmament issues deserves greater support from the regular budget of the UN, in terms of facilitating its research work with enhanced staff on a sustainable basis. We would like UNIDIR to retool itself to be in the forefront of research on nuclear disarmament, a task that cannot be accomplished when it is dependent overwhelmingly on voluntary contributions. UNIDIR publications are a valuable resource base and must be disseminated widely.

We believe that UN efforts to promote and encourage disarmament and non-proliferation education based on the recommendations of the 2002 UN study will foster-greater awareness and strengthen global collective will in favor of global disarmament objectives.

India has welcomed the opening of the new UN Regional Centre for peace and Disarmament in Asia and Pacific in Kathmandu last year. India will extend all possible support for the Kathmandu Centre to fulfill its mandate and in this regard will make a financial contribution.

715. Statement of Minister Disarmament at the Permanent Mission to the Conference on Disarmament D.B.Venkatesh Verma at the Third Annual Conference of States parties to Protocol V of the CCW.

November 9, 2009

Mr. President,

India is privileged to hold the presidency of Third Conference of High Contracting Parties of Protocol V. We would like to convey our appreciation to Ambassador Borisovas of Lithuania for his diligent efforts for ensuring the successful conduct of the Second Conference.

India is fully committed to the CCW Convention and the humanitarian principles that it embodies India had held the Presidency of CCW in 2002-3 when the Protocol was negotiated. We were among the group of first 20 countries Which ratified the protocol that led to its entry into force. We firmly believe that implementation of commitments undertaken in Protocol V should make a real difference on the ground.

We are pleased to note that the number of High Contracting Parties to this Protocol has increased from 48, at the time of the Second Conference to 61 this year. Universalization should continue to be a priority in the coming year as well.

Timely implementation of obligations contained in Protocol V is of high significance. This includes submission of national reports. Following the adoption the revised Generic Electronic Template for effective implementation of Article 4 (Recording, Retaining and Transmission of Information). India is in the process of taking follow up action in terms of its national adoption and dissemination in its arm-forces.

India pays particular attention to the use of generic preventive measures for purposes of ensuring safety and security of munitions for the entire life cycle design development, production, storage, transportation, periodic checks for reliability etc. The GICHD handbook 'A Guide to Ammunition Storage' and the UN Classification System of Regard Divisions and Compatibility Groups have been used extensively by our armed forces.

We would like to convey our appreciation to all the coordinators for their efforts in preparing for this annual Conference. The working papers and proposals prepared by them are a very good basis of discussions. As this protocol is still in its early stage, we should be mindful of the importance of early universal adherence and full implementation of existing obligations of the Protocol. We will also like to take this opportunity to thank the CCW Secretariat for the work they have put in for success of this meeting.

716. Statement of Permanent Representative to the Conference on Disarmament Hamid Ali Rao at the Eleventh Annual Conference of the States Parties to Amended Protocol II to the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons which may be deemed to be excessively injurious or to have indiscriminate effects.

November 11, 2009

Mr President,

It is a pleasure to convey our congratulations to you on assuming the Presidency of the 11th Annual Conference of Amended Protocol II. We would also like to convey our appreciation to the two Friends of the President, Mr. Abderrazzak Laassel of Morocco and Mr. Reto Wollenmann of Switzerland for their efforts for laying the ground work for this meeting.

India has fulfilled all its obligations with regard to Amended Protocol II. Since 1st January 1997, India has not produced any non-detectable mines. All anti-personnel mines in stock have been fitted with metallic rings in order to make them detectable. India also observes a formal moratorium on export of landmines. India supports the approach, enshrined in Amended Protocol II, which addresses the legitimate defence requirements of States, especially those with long borders. We attach importance to regular submission of National Reports under Amended protocol II.

We have undertaken a number of measures to address humanitarian concerns, arising from indiscriminate use of landmines, in accordance with the international humanitarian law. Information regarding our obligations under Amended Protocol II has been disseminated to the Armed Forces by its inclusion in the syllabi of military courses, through seminars and distribution of handbooks, etc. Information on mines is disseminated among the civilian population of the area and the media in order to increase public awareness and avoid civilian casualties. Whenever and wherever the army has used mines for defensive military operations, the mines have been laid within fenced perimeter and well-marked. GPS and GIS based systems are used for assistance in recording of the position of mines. Post-operations, these mines have been cleared by trained troops.

Mr President,

India's armed forces have not used mines for maintenance of law and order or in internal security situations, or even in counter-insurgency or for combating terrorists and terrorist organisations, including those that have indiscriminately used improvised explosive devices and mines, The Corps of Army Engineers in India continue to aid civil authorities in defusing and clearing such devices. Conceited efforts have been made to rehabilitate casualties from such cases by providing monetary compensation, employment and assistance, including prosthetics for mine victims. India ratified the Convention on Rights of Persons with Disabilities in October 2007.

Mr President

Some reports have commented on increase in casualties in India perceived to be related to landmines. Such reports are misplaced as they do not distinguish between casualties caused by landmines and improvised explosive devices, I would also like to reiterate India has not used landmines for counter insurgency or counter terrorist operations or for maintenance of law and order or internal security situations. However, mines are used by terrorists groups and Indian security forces have recovered mines of foreign origin from these groups.

India supports technical cooperation and exchanges in mine clearance technology, equipment and training and urges States Parties, in a position to do so, to contribute to such measures. India remains committed to international de-mining and rehabilitation efforts and is ready to provide its technical assistance and expertise in this area.

India is one of the largest contributors to the UN peacekeeping operations the world over. Besides participating in national, regional and international workshops and seminars, we have carried out de-mining operations in Cambodia, Angola and Afghanistan. In Cambodia, we deployed de-mining supervising teams in 1991-93. This year, the training for the Royal Cambodian Armed Forces (RCAF) was carried out from 15 January 2009 to 04 February 2009 in Cambodia, After training several de-mining platoons, de-mining of specific areas was entrusted to these teams, resulting in hundreds of square kilometers of land being cleared of mines, Responding to their request we are training the Cambodian army de-mining team on an annual basis. The trained Cambodian army detachments have undertaken de-mining operations in Sudan under the aegis of UNMIS, starting from mid-2007. We have also gifted de-mining equipment to Cambodia in September last year, In Angola., we had undertaken large scale de-mining operations under the UN umbrella In 1995. The Indian, Government has successfully completed the construction of road Zaranj to Delaram in Afghanistan which involved extensive demining operations as the road had been heavily mined.

Mr. President,

India attaches high importance to consideration of TEDs in the CCW process, TEDs are the cause of a large number of casualties and have a deep socio-economic impact. TEDs are being frequently used by terrorists and non-state actors. While we recognize that in some instances the problem of ICDs is related to abandoned or unexploded ordnance and is, therefore, linked to Explosive Remnants of War covered by Protocol V, in our experience terrorists and non-state actors establish an elaborate supply chain that goes beyond the region in which IEDs are used. In fact, in our experience these supply chains have trans-border dimensions.

The discussion under AP-II should aim at identifying key elements in the supply chain that can be prohibited or regulated in a more focused manner by states parties. These measures can include marking and tracing of key components; increase security of stockpile and their transportation and measures to prevent unauthorized manufacture and trafficking are also relevant. Stricter export controls may be necessary. It is also important for violators to be prosecuted and punished according to law as it would act as a deterrent against use of IEDs by terrorists and NSAs. While there is scope for cooperation among states in terms of exchange of detection equipment and counter measures, it is also important to maintain confidentiality so that terrorists and non-state actors are not able to create new versions of IEDs. While efforts are undertaken within the CCW process to address IEDs, these should be consistent with other International efforts on counter terrorism. India has an open mind with regards to eventual outcome of these discussions in terms of in-depth consideration of issues and exchange of experiences or drawing up of best practices, or other agreed measures.

717. Statement by the Permanent Representative to the Conference on Disarmament Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao at the Meeting of the States Parties to the BWC.

December 7, 2009

Mr. Chairman,

Allow me first of all to convey congratulations on your assumption of the Chairmanship of this meeting. We would like to convey our deep appreciation for your efforts and those of the Implementation Support Unit for ground work undertaken during the past year and especially during the Meeting of Experts in August. We assure you of our full cooperation in the discharge of your responsibilities.

India associates itself with the statement made by the delegation of Cuba on behalf of the Non Aligned Movement.

Mr. Chairman,

The BWC is the first disarmament instrument that bans the development, production, stockpiling and use of an entire category of weapons of mass destruction. India believes that norms against biological weapons enshrined in the Convention must be upheld, particularly in view of the threat of bio-terrorism. India fully supports initiatives to strengthen the Convention, ensure its full implementation by all States Parties and to make it universal. We believe that only a multilaterally agreed mechanism for verification of compliance can provide the assurance of observance of compliance obligations by States Parties and act as deterrence against non-compliance. We believe that the decision regarding strengthening of the BWC and its effective implementation should be taken by the Review Conference on the basis of consensus. States Parties should also give consideration to preparations for the next Review Conference.

The topic of this year's meetings viz. international cooperation in disease surveillance, detection, diagnosis and containment is of special relevance considering the global spread of H1N1 and other pandemics in the past few years. India has consistently underlined the importance of international cooperation in issues related to BWC. While disease surveillance and mitigation remains primarily a national responsibility, it is recognized that disease and epidemics do not respect national borders and harmful biological agents need to be tracked so that they do not enter new regions. This aspect has made international collaboration crucial for epidemic control.

Mr. Chairman,

India believes that the promotional aspects of Article X are a crucial element in strengthening the BWC and in achieving universal adherence. While there are several examples of international cooperation in disease surveillance and control, it is also a fact that denial of materials, equipment and technology related to peaceful uses of bio-technology continue to exist and hamper legitimate uses of biological materials and should be addressed in the framework of the Convention.

The BWC State Parties should facilitate the fullest possible exchange of equipment, materials and scientific and technical information for the uses of bacteriological (biological) agents and toxins for peaceful purposes. This would benefit the developing countries to meet their development needs, including improving public health and build a robust biotechnology industry. It would also promote universality of the Convention and would be instrumental in establishing linkages amongst States Parties leading to a higher level of confidence in the Convention. The strengthened implementation of the provisions of Article III would ensure that the cooperation envisaged under Article X is not abused.

- The previous Review Conferences of BWC have recognized that international cooperation must be long-term and systematic. However, after more than two decades of the coming into force of BWC this goal remains only partially realized. Our view is that while all bilateral and multilateral avenues for cooperation must be explored in the context of disease surveillance and control, the framework provided by the Convention must be fully implemented, especially through the implementation of Article X. In this context, India supports the NAM Working Paper presented to the Meeting of Experts in August 2009 for the establishment of a mechanism for full implementation of Article X.

Mr. Chairman,

India has put into place a comprehensive system for disease surveillance to deal with human, animal and plant diseases. The system has been developed by taking into account the guidelines issued by WHO, OIE and FAO. India participates actively in disease reporting mechanisms set up by these organizations. India is implementing the International Health Regulations (IHR 2005) of WHO which came into force in June 2007. India will be forwarding shortly its 2009 national submission on BWC CBMs.

As a developing country with significant capabilities in the biotechnology sector, India is both a provider and a receiver of assistance in various areas related to biotechnology. India has provided assistance to African, SAARC, ASEAN and other countries in the form of training facilities, exchange of materials, medical aid etc. One such project is the "Pan-African e-Network Project" under which India has utilized its expertise in the pharmaceutical and biotechnology industries and Information Technology to provide ingenious technology-led solutions in public health to African countries.

Export controls are an essential component of international cooperation to ensure that disease causing organisms and pathogens do not fall into the hands of terrorists and are used only for peaceful purposes. India's export control system effectively regulates the export of almost 150 micro-organisms and toxins. Genetically modified micro-organisms or genetic elements that contain nucleic acid sequences associated with pathogenicity and are derived from the listed organisms are also controlled.

Mr. Chairman,

We have taken note of your Synthesis Paper reflecting a broad range of issues covered during the Meeting of Experts. We would like to acknowledge that the Meeting of Experts held in August this year was useful and productive. The Meeting provided us an opportunity to understand the disease surveillance systems of various countries, and importantly, it highlighted several examples of international cooperation, as well as difficulties faced by many developing countries in obtaining equipment, material and technology for peaceful uses under BWC. The Working Papers and presentations made by national delegations and international organizations contained many useful ideas and suggestions. Our experts from capital actively participated in the Meeting of Experts and shared information on India's capabilities and perspectives.

India will be submitting a working paper elaborating India's experience in international cooperation in the context of Article of the BWC, including on disease surveillance and control. During this meeting we will also share our experiences in dealing with HINI Pandemic.

Mr. Chairman,

In conclusion, I would once again like to stress the importance of international cooperation in BWC related issues and the full and effective implementation of Article X of the Convention. I assure you of my delegation's support for the success of this Meeting.

Thank you.

INDIA AT THE UNITED NATIONS

BLANK

718. Statement by Deputy Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Ajai Malhotra at the resumed 10th Special Session of the UN General Assembly.

New York, January 15, 2009.

Mr. President,

We are meeting today on the margins of a serious crisis in West Asia. It is a crisis that impacts upon the stability of the region and beyond, to the world at large. We deeply regret the loss of all civilian lives - every innocent life lost is one too many. It is important that there is an end to the vicious circle of violence and counter-violence.

Speaking on the situation in Gaza, the Prime Minister of India, Dr Manmohan Singh, expressed concern at the rise in tensions in the region as a result of the attack on Gaza that has led to the needless loss of lives of so many innocent men, women and children. He said "India has strongly condemned these incidents and it is our hope that the international community would get together and help restore peace in the region as soon as possible. I wish to reiterate our unstinted and unwavering support for the just Palestinian cause". We support ongoing initiatives, including that of the UN Secretary-General, for an immediate, durable and fully respected ceasefire as called for by UNSCR 1860 (2009), with which all parties should comply.

Mr. President,

In your circular letter of January 7, 2009, you have specifically asked this Assembly to "consider the ongoing humanitarian situation". The deteriorating situation in Gaza has drawn the attention of the Government of India and the plight of the population has become heart rending. The daily time table of a three-hour cease fire does not appear to be producing any favourable changes in the situation. The situation on the energy front appears extremely grim as nearly three-fourths of the Gaza population is now without any electricity and the prospects, with no fuel oil available, appear even more serious. The situation on the food front in Gaza is no better. Some 750,000 people are without access to food. We express serious concern at the plight of the million and half Gaza civilians living in a permanent state of fright. There is therefore an urgent need for assured humanitarian access for provision of essential commodities in Gaza.

Given the scale of the humanitarian disaster unfolding in Gaza, and the escalating number of civilian victims, in response to the Flash Appeal made recently by United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), India is extending assistance of US$ 1 million for use by the Agency to provide shelters, cash assistance and essential household items to the affected families in Gaza. India has also announced a grant of $10 million as budgetary support for Palestinian National Authority, besides an additional sum of US $10 million in project assistance.

Mr. President,

In parallel to all this, we must urgently reinforce our collective message that all actions that run counter to the commitments of the parties under the Roadmap must cease. India remains steadfastly in support of a political solution, based on the Road Map and the Arab Peace Initiative. It is important to move forward towards the early creation of an independent, sovereign and viable State of Palestine, living side by side with Israel, within secure and internationally-recognized borders.

Mr. President,

India wants to see the creation of an environment for the earliest possible resumption of dialogue under the peace process and it seeks an immediate end to the suffering of the people of Gaza.

Thank you, Mr. President.

719. Statement by the Counsellor at the Permanent Mission at the UN Dr. Anupam Ray on Agenda Item 3-First regular session 2009 of the Executive Board of UNDP/ UNFPA: Resumption of UNDP Country Programme in Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

New York, January 21, 2009.

Mr. President,

The Government of India supports the early resumption of UNDP operations in DPR Korea in accordance with the proposals submitted by UNDP for consideration by the Executive Board. The Government of India is of the view that UNDP activities and the developmental agenda should be guided entirely by development objectives.

Thank you,

720. Statement by Minister at the Permanent Mission at the UN Tranjit Sandhu on United Nations Peacekeeping Operations at the Security Council.

New York, January 23, 2009.

Mr. President,

Before I begin, I should inform you that Ambassador Sen is indisposed, and he has asked me to represent him at this debate today.

Thank you for arranging this debate on a critical and very visible aspect of the work of the United Nations. Peacekeeping is a subject that involves the larger membership of this world body, and it is entirely appropriate to consider how this crucial activity can be improved, especially at the current juncture. Today, over 140,000 personnel have been authorized to serve as peacekeepers in 18 operations that are deployed across five continents, at a total budgeted cost of $7.2 billion. These statistics illustrate the size and scale of the task that peacekeeping involves. The thoughtful briefings provided separately by the Under Secretaries-Generals for Peacekeeping and Field Support illustrate several of the challenges in this regard. Suggestion made by them merit greater consideration by all stakeholders, within and outside this Council. We also align ourselves with the statement to be made by the distinguished representative of Morocco on behalf of the NAM.

While the number of peacekeeping operations may not have increased greatly in the last decade, there has been an unprecedented surge in the number of peacekeepers deployed. This surge has generated enormous challenges, not merely because of the numbers involved but also because of the manner in which some missions have been established, the mandate provided to them, and not the least, the tools they have been provided. From this standpoint, it is a very welcome step that this Council has scheduled today's discussion on peacekeeping at this juncture, and India felicitates France for doing so under its Presidency of the Council this month. Mr. President, Article 24 of the Charter defines the functions and powers of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security. That Article begins by underscoring that these powers were being conferred on it "in order to ensure prompt and effective actions by the United Nations".

However, when the Council is neither prompt nor effective in its consideration of such challenges, it ceases to discharge its primary responsibility. There are a number of examples which are perhaps best not elaborated at this junction, although some of these have been mentioned by previous speakers. It is in this context that the powers of the Council in the context of its operational efforts in the maintenance of peace and security need to be read in consonance with Article 44 of the Charter. In the current international context, that Article should be read to imply that the Council should invite non-Council Members to participate in the decisions of the Security Council concerning the employment of contingents of that Member's armed forces. Clearly, therefore, the Charter visualized peacekeeping as a tool jointly invented and honed by the Council and the General Assembly. It was not intended to be an attribute of the power accorded to the Council by the Charter. Regrettably, in reality, the Security Council has completely monopolized its hold on UN Peacekeeping operations.

The corollary of this is of course the fact that the Council bears major responsibility for the situation as it exists. It is therefore timely for the Security Council to seriously make an in-depth review of the situation as it obtains today, including the question of whether it should continue to have exclusive monopoly of establishing and running peacekeeping operations. Mr. President, India has been a leading proponent of the view that the mechanism of triangular consultation between Troop Contributing Countries, Security Council and the United Nations Secretariat must be energized. In this context, we do note the holding of Private Meetings under the format established by Resolution 1353, and the increase in the frequency of briefings by the Secretariat for TCCs.

However, such briefings continue to be held on quite literally on the eve of renewal of Mission mandates, making them proforma exercises, as there is little real scope for serious or meaningful discussion. We reiterate the imperative of involving TCCs both early and fully in all aspects and stages of mission planning. This should include the stage of preparation and planning of the operation, in the monitoring and conduct of an operation, and finally, in the evaluation of an operation, including the identification of lessons learnt. Their views, if found reasonable, must be reflected in mission mandates. It must be borne in mind that today, many of those who have the final say in Security Council resolutions often do not participate in their implementation, and are therefore not called upon to bear the brunt of criticism when Missions face difficulties if their mandate is unrealistic or the means authorized inadequate.

In this context, Mr. President, the draft Concept Paper circulated in the context of today's debate-the start of a "collaborative process"-does not appear to envision substantive collaboration in the context of the involvement of Troop Contributing Countries. I must reiterate that the experience of functioning in an operation gives Troop Contributing Countries a unique ability to contribute to the planning process. TCCs can assist the Council making appropriate, effective and timely decisions on operations. The 2008 Report of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations acknowledged this and called for substantive consultations with Troop Contributing Countries during all stages of PKOs. It is time that these recommendations are implemented in letter and spirit, in order to achieve meaningful outcomes. These should include moving towards an integrated approach, and to establish effective strategic oversight by those members-inside and outside the Council--with stakes in a particular peacekeeping operation.

Mr. President,

There are a few more specific points that I should like to underscore. Firstly, it must be reiterated that there can be no peacekeeping operation when there is no peace to keep. That is to say, peacekeeping must be built upon a peace agreement that is credible, not the other way around. Secondly, troops are contributed by contributing countries to a larger cause: that of peace in far off lands. The safety and security of UN peacekeepers must be of paramount concern to this organization, in whose name they serve. The tally of sacrifice by peacekeepers in the years past underscores these concerns. Furthermore, India fully supports implementation of a policy of zero tolerance with regard to conduct and discipline of troops, including sexual exploitation and abuse. There is a need for raising awareness of those entrusted with managerial and command responsibilities as well as establishment of standards of conduct, training and investigation. Careful preparatory training, in terms of a multi-cultural, pluralistic and tolerant outlook, is as important as swift punitive action once culpability is established.

It is also desirable to evolve professional training programmes for peacekeepers in consultation with Member-States. Here too, the experience of troop contributors with a long history of assisting in peace operations should be fully drawn upon by integrated training service. We are in support of greater cooperation by the United Nations in peacekeeping efforts. However such programmes must be in accordance with Chapter VIII of the UN Charter. The United Nations cannot absolve itself of its responsibility under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security. The real challenge before the UN is to strengthen peacekeeping without regionalizing it. Mr President, India stands committed to continue to assist the United Nations in maintenance of international peace and security. India has a proud history of contributing to UN peacekeeping, which dates back to the inception of this activity in the 1950s.

Over the decades, India has contributed nearly 100,000 troops and participated in over 40 missions, including in some of the most challenging operations. We salute the 118 personnel of Indian forces, as well as peacekeepers from other countries, who have made the supreme sacrifice in the interests of world peace, while serving in various UN missions. Mr. President, we look forward to constructive and meaningful engagement with the Security Council to carry the debate forward and ensure fruition of our joint efforts, in this very visible activity of the United Nations. We hope that through our collective efforts, we can evolve greater coherence and integration in the process of identifying solutions to the challenges before international peacekeeping.

Thank you, Mr. President.

721. Statement by the Deputy Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Ajai Malhotra at the NAM Ministerial Conference on the Advancement of Women towards the Millennium Development Goals.

Guatemala City, January 23, 2009.

Madam Chairperson and the First Lady of Guatemala, Her Excellency Mrs Sandra Torres de Colom,

Excellencies,

Distinguished delegates,

It is an honour to participate in this second NAM Ministerial Conference on the Advancement of Women. We are particularly grateful to the Government of Guatemala for the excellent arrangements made and for the warm welcome and traditional hospitality extended to us in this beautiful capital city.

Madam Chairperson,

The set of Millennium Development Goals [MDGs] that are to be achieved by 2015 form a minimum core of development objectives that must be met in order to provide a better quality of life to humankind. They envisage gender as a cross cutting and overarching theme. Unfortunately, the mid-term MDG review, carried out in 2008, reveals that progress so far has been mixed and considerable gender gaps remain. The resource crunch at the international level and inadequate forward movement at the domestic level are standing in the way of our achieving the MDG goals. It is particularly disconcerting that most donors are not on track to meet their stated commitments under MDG 8, which envisages a global partnership as a key element to the universal attainment of the MDGs. We need to more determinedly confront the challenges before us.

Madam Chairperson,

Women's education and empowerment has a positive and enlightening impact on the lives of men and children. Women are agents of social justice and social change and without their full emancipation there can be no real social progress or sustained socio-economic growth. Besides an effective policy framework and a comprehensive approach to women's empowerment, we also need progressive legal provisions, the active involvement of women in planning and decision making, and the creation of a database of gender disaggregated information as a monitoring tool. Furthermore, we need to secure new and additional financial resources, and the transfer of appropriate technologies, and buttress it all by sharing experiences, expertise and data amongst ourselves.

Madam Chairperson,

Given the diversity within NAM, no single approach can address women's empowerment and gender equality issues. Nevertheless, for any approach to succeed it would inevitably have to include speedy implementation of legislative and policy measures for the greater empowerment of women, besides gender mainstreaming at all levels. Additionally, the gap between de jure and de facto equality needs to be sharply reduced, with policies implemented to secure a changed reality on the ground.

Madam Chairperson,

New avenues for South-South cooperation in the field of advancement of women need to be identified by crystallising practical suggestions and methodology for enhanced cooperation among NAM member states. Economic empowerment of women can be realised through the creation of viable income generation activities, while cross learning can play an important role in enhancing skill development. For example, exchange programmes covering Self Help Groups from NAM countries can enhance their exposure and open avenues for learning new skills and promoting market development, benefiting all concerned.

Madam Chairperson,

We must also collectively think of progressing our agenda beyond the Beijing Platform for Action and the achievement of the MDGs. While pursuing gender equality goals there is a need to move ahead and also consider issues such as the growing female migration that is being largely driven by a desire for increased income, as well as the impact on women of the global crises affecting food and finance. We could also consider exploring enhanced legal protection for women migrants, as well as engendering trade related protocols. Future NAM meetings may also like to look at the impact on women of natural calamities, besides man-made ones.

Madam Chairperson,

Over one million Indian women at the grassroots level were brought into political decision making following the reservation thirteen years ago of one-third of all urban and local self-government posts in India for women. A similar reservation of seats for women in the Indian Parliament remains under consideration by the Government. India's Joint Parliamentary Committee on Empowerment of Women independently monitors equality and empowerment of women and ensures that Indian legislation is gender responsive. India's planning process is fully committed to enabling women to be equal partners in development, while gender equity and equality are key guiding principles that we pursue. We are undertaking gender budgeting and creation of a database of gender disaggregated information to enable us to better appreciate whether our women are properly benefiting from the policies and programmes instituted for them. Moreover, India's planning focus has shifted beyond mere empowerment of women to recognising them as fundamental agents of sustained socio-economic change and development.

Madam Chairperson,

NAM has consistently played a crucial role on important global issues, such as decolonization, apartheid, Palestine and a non-discriminatory approach to disarmament and development. Socio-economic and developmental issues are also major themes for substantive South-South cooperation and solidarity. We look forward to NAM's continued leadership of efforts to secure the advancement of the status of women.

In conclusion, I would like to reaffirm India's unstinted support for NAM activities in advancing the status of women through promoting gender equality and securing women's empowerment -- legal, political, educational and socio-economic empowerment -- on a sustained basis.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.

722. Statement by Counsellor at the Permanent Mission at the UN Arindam Bagchi at the handover ceremony of the Chairmanship of the Group of 77.

New York, January 23, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

I would like to join others before me in felicitating your Excellency on your election as Chairman of the Group of 77 for 2009. We wish Sudan the very best for its tenure as Chair of our Group, a task that we are confident will be discharged efficiently. I would also like to convey India's deep appreciation to Antigua and Barbuda for the leadership it provided to the Group during the past year. My felicitations go to Ambassador John Ashe and his team for their able and dedicated efforts in promoting the Group's interests at various UN fora during the past year. We are particularly satisfied that a Small Island Developing State has successfully led the G-77.

Indeed, the continuing success of our Group has been in its ability to project the needs and concerns of all its members, including the Least Developed Countries, the Landlocked Developing Countries, the Small Island Developing States, the African countries and others who are vulnerable and need our special support. This spirit of unity and solidarity among developing countries must be maintained and strengthened.

As has been noted by others, the year 2008 presented a set of complex and special challenges for developing countries. The ongoing financial crises, which was caused by developed country markets and whose end appears nowhere in sight, has made our development challenges even more acute. The financial crisis must not be an excuse for the developed countries to renege on the fulfilment of their commitments.

The crisis has also demolished the myth that the need for reform is limited to developing countries. Clearly, a global and comprehensive effort is required, both to address the short-term effects and the need for long term reform, with effective participation by developing countries. A global governance regime, that does not reflect the realities of today and give adequate voice and participation to developing countries, cannot succeed.

The Monterrey Review Conference was yet another challenging event. It is a tribute to our collective efforts that despite the grave economic circumstances in which the meeting was held, we were able to protect our interests. We must ensure effective follow-up of its decisions.

The ongoing climate change negotiations in the UNFCCC demonstrate clearly that the support and willingness that we expect from the developed countries is lacking. The Group of 77 must continue to maintain its unified approach, based on the principle of "common but differentiated responsibilities", which recognizes the differences in the contribution of developed and developing countries to global environmental problems as well as the differences in their respective financial and technical capabilities to tackle such problems.

It is a matter of satisfaction that the South Fund was operationalised during 2008, as also the successful holding of the Twelfth Inter-governmental Follow-up and Coordination Committee on Economic Cooperation among Developing Countries in Cote d'Ivoire. South-South technical and economic cooperation is the bedrock of our solidarity. In this regard, I would like to reiterate India's readiness to further expand and intensify our South-South cooperation initiatives with our developing country partners.

The solidarity of Group was clearly demonstrated yet again during various negotiations in New York, including the strengthening of the Development Pillar, Human Resources management reforms, ICT reforms, Administration of Justice, Law of the Sea issues, etc. The approval by the GA of UN Secretary-General's proposals regarding the strengthening of the Development Pillar of the UN Secretariat is a welcome first step in addressing the critical gaps that exist between the organization's capacity to deliver on the development related mandates. We look forward to the continued solidarity of the Group in furthering issues of common interest.

Before concluding, permit me to reiterate our best wishes to Sudan in its efforts during 2009 to articulate the concerns of developing countries.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

723. Remarks adapted from the extempore remarks of the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Nirupam Sen at the meeting of the Open Ended Working Group.

New York, January 26, 2009.

At the outset, I wish to thank you, Mr. Chairman, for organizing this meeting. At our last meeting on 19 January 2006, one UFC member termed GA Decision 62/557 as "contentious". This is indeed shocking - it only demonstrates that while the UFC uses the mantra of consensus, it does not respect decisions actually taken by consensus. "Good faith" appears to be limited to a slogan. Similarly, there seems to be no respect for the GA Rules of Procedure which enjoy consensus: the attempt is to impose rules that suit a minority. It is, therefore, strange to suggest that the only proposal is the Canadian proposal, as was done by some members of the UFC. There is a proposal that was adopted, that exists and that enjoys consensus - the established GA Rules of Procedure. It is clear that this lack of respect for consensus decisions has been guiding UFC's efforts in presenting documents whose contents have been categorically rejected by the membership. Using terms like principles, procedures, modalities, objectives, etc. cannot hide the real attempt to resuscitate old and rejected ideas. I had commented on the paper circulated by Canada and Malta at the last meeting. Our views have only been strengthened by a more detailed reading of the document. Let me reiterate - this document can only be seen as an attempt to reopen unanimous Decision 62/557. The document itself is based on an earlier paper presented by Argentina and Spain. In fact, it is interesting how the UFC attempts to show that various ideas have emerged during these OEWG meetings. However, the reality is that it is the UFC that is periodically re-circulating its rejected ideas, while the overwhelming majority wants intergovernmental negotiations to commence urgently.

I commented last time on the Canada/Malta Paper immediately after it was presented. It is astonishing that those who propose the principle of democracy, oppose voting. Do they not vote in their democracies? Again we have such gems like ensuring full ownership and ensuring the full accommodation of the interests of all regions. All GA Decisions have the ownership of the General Assembly members. The African Union is the only region that has articulated its interests as a region on Security Council reform. No other region has been able to do this. In this sense, one cannot accommodate what does not exist. The principle is therefore part tautology, part absurdity. "Negotiated solution" was rejected on 15 September 2008 not because anybody is against negotiations but because after prolonged negotiations that would widen to the maximum extent the area of agreement, a vote may become necessary. The final step may not be possible without this because of the wide gulf between two opposing viewpoints. One of the Permanent Members said that the objective of the reform is better representation, specially of developing countries. We agree with the sentiment but disagree with expressing only a part of the objective. We cannot be selective.

It is also not necessary to discuss the objective of the reform. It was adopted at the highest level by consensus in the World Summit Outcome Document of 2005 which says that the Council should be reformed "in order to make it more broadly represented, efficient and transparent and thus to further enhance its effectiveness and the legitimacy and implementation of decisions." One cannot also selectively use historical memory or forget the past. In December 1992, the General Assembly invited member states to present their views on reform. One hundred responded. The overwhelming majority wanted to make the Council more representative; increase the influence of the South and break the monopoly of Permanent Members. In the OEWG at that time, a majority was clearly in favour of increasing Permanent Members. One is therefore forced to conclude, is that the only reason for discussing the objective of the reform is to go on discussing the objective till, through sheer exhaustion, you make it concise with your objective. Our view is shared by most other delegations - let me stress that the forty countries of the L.69 group have formally conveyed in writing to the PGA that they cannot accept the introduction of concepts in the papers submitted by the UFC as these amount to reopening Decision 62/557 under the guise of discussing framework and modalities. Thus, we do not agree with any of the proposals presented by the UFC. We hope that this would be clearly reflected in your presentation to the informal GA plenary.

Let me also clarify our position on how the work of the OEWG is to be concluded. The last part of para (c) of Decision 62/557 clearly mandates the Chair of the OEWG to present the results of the consultations to an informal GA plenary before 1 February 2009. It does not talk about an OEWG report, as some of our UFC colleagues have emphasized. In any case, given the lack of consensus, there can be no report of the OEWG. Rather, you are mandated to convey to the informal GA plenary the results of the consultations. Presumably, this would be through an oral statement by you. We agree with one of the Permanent Members and other members that the presentation should be oral. The logical basis of this is that there is no agreement and therefore no justification for a written presentation. The result can be summed up easily. Some members of the UFC periodically re-circulated ideas rejected on 15 September and, not surprisingly these were again rejected. That is the sole net result of so many weeks of consultations. Most delegations feel that GA rules of procedure are sufficient to cover framework and modalities of the intergovernmental negotiations. With the above action by you, Mr. Chairman, no further action of the OEWG is required.

In any case, as we have been stressing for some time, commencement of intergovernmental negotiations is not dependent in any way to the work of the OEWG. Let me recall the term "so far" in para (d) of Decision 62/557, which makes it abundantly clear that the GA plenary would only take note of what the OEWG has done till September 15, 2008; it is not bound to take note of what the OEWG does subsequently. One of the members of the UFC asked why para (c) at all figures in Decision 62/557 if the OEWG is not supposed to agree on framework and modalities. The reason is clear: in terms of this Decision, the OEWG is free to come up with ideas; if these are useful, they would be taken on board; if not, not. Some delegations have highlighted that negotiations will be held in "informal" plenary of the GA, rather than in "formal" plenary - as if to impute that the negotiations are not really formal or serious. This is yet another futile attempt to delay and complicate the process of UNSC reform. As we are all aware, all negotiations are held in the informal GA Plenary, and in fact on most occasions in "informal informals". This does not detract from the seriousness and importance of such negotiations. There are clear rules and procedures that guide these processes, and, most importantly, these negotiations continue to the UNGA negotiations. It is abundantly clear that negotiations on UNSC reform in informal plenary of the GA are under the authority of the UN General Assembly.

The UFC is therefore simply trying to obstruct and delay negotiations through these artificial distinctions between informal and formal plenary. One of the UFC members also said that in informal plenary there are no records and no voting, he should look up the repertory of practice the Conference on the Law of the Sea did maintain records for informal plenaries but carried a different number. The informal plenary also conducted a secret ballot regarding the seat of ITLOS and International Seabed Authority which was then included in the final text of the convention. During the discussion, I was often reminded of what the political philosopher Thomas Hobbes once said: "If the theorem of Pythagoras is against your interest, you would strenuously deny its truth". This is exactly what the UFC has been doing. It was amusing to hear one member of the UFC speak of others not understanding the question and therefore not knowing the answer in an examination. It is quite clear that if there is one examination that the UFC would fail, it would be an examination in geometry. There is little point in deluding oneself, trying to delude others, and by trying to delude others further delude oneself. The time has now come to commence intergovernmental negotiations. Let us not shy away from this unanimous decision, or attempt to shackle the negotiations before they even start. As we have seen for the last so many years in the OEWG, further procedural discussions cannot move the process forward. The meetings of the OEWG during the 63rd session have clearly demonstrated the futility of further efforts in this body. We therefore urge you, Mr. Chairman, to fully implement Decision 62/557 and convene an informal GA plenary to commence intergovernmental negotiations.

724. Ex-tempore remarks by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Nirupam Sen at the Informal Plenary of the General Assembly.

New York, January 29, 2009.

We thank the President of the General Assembly (PGA) for his presentation of the results of the consultations of the Open Ended Working Group (OEWG) since the start of the 63rd UN General Assembly Session and express our appreciation of the hard work done by Ambassador Zahir Tanin, Permanent Representative of Afghanistan who has chaired these meetings.

We are grateful to the PGA for announcing that the inter-governmental negotiations will commence on February 19th. We look forward to receiving his Work Plan and the short term Schedule of Meetings on the five key issues. In addition, we join the couple of speakers who have just spoken in stating that the best way to organize these negotiations would be for the PGA to prepare a composite paper that would aggregate, under each of the five key issues, the positions and proposals of the member states which is the basis for negotiations in terms of the unanimously adopted Decision 62/557. This would make possible systematic negotiations on these proposals and help to simplify the range of options for Security Council reforms as well as reveal the range of support.

One of the Permanent Representatives from the Uniting for Consensus spoke of listening to the small states. We have now listened to the voice of the small states - to Singapore, to Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, to Barbados. We endorse entirely what they have said. As the PGA has said, our lodestar will be Decision 62/557, the UN Charter, the World Summit Outcome Document, the relevant UN GA Rules and Procedures and the repertory of practice. As Saint Vincent and the Grenadines said, and I would like to reiterate this, the views of the member states can be taken into account only to the extent that they are consistent with these documents. The Rules of Procedure already exist: there is no need to re-invent the wheel.

The PGA now, and once before, spoke of the OEWG's great achievement of September 15, 2008. It is useful to examine in some detail the basis of this achievement. It was only made possible when legal advice showed that a vote could be taken in the OEWG and physical preparations were made for voting and there was a readiness to vote. In short, the achievement was not of the OEWG but in spite of the OEWG, not of following the OEWG's traditions and conventions but of breaking with these, of basing ourselves on the GA Rules of Procedure. In short, it was an achievement of the GA Rules of Procedure and shows that they have to be the lodestar.

In conclusion, let me recall the Latin saying: "Hic Rhodus, hic salta" (the rose is here, dance here). This is what the Uniting for Consensus were trying to tell us in the OEWG but we found that what they offered were not roses but artificial and painted flowers. In spite of this, by blocking or trying to eliminate real flowers they were not able to hold back the spring. We look forward to the spring.

I thank you sir.

725. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Nirupam Sen on Agenda Item 3 [A] - Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development and the 24th Special Session of the General Assembly -Priority Theme: Social Integration at the 27th session of Commission for Social Development.

New York, February 5, 2009.

Madam Chair,

On behalf of the delegation of India, I would like to convey our warmest felicitations to you on your election. I assure you of my delegation's full cooperation and support in guiding the deliberations of this Commission. I also congratulate other members of the Bureau. We associate ourselves with the statement made by Sudan as Chairman of the Group of 77.

Madam Chair,

The Copenhagen World Summit for Social Development of 1995 and the 24th Special Session of the General Assembly recognised that economic development, social development and environment protection were interdependent and mutually reinforcing components of sustainable development and a better quality of life. It also acknowledged that social development should be accorded high priority for the well being of humankind and for the creation of a "society for all". It identified that addressing socio-economic problems of poverty, employment, social integration and an inclusive decision making process was the main pillar of social development.

Madam Chair,

Social integration was considered an important commitment as it was necessary to foster a stable, safe and just society in order to not only promote and protect human rights and fundamental freedoms but also to develop non-discrimination, tolerance, respect for diversity, equality of opportunity, solidarity and participation of all in society. In the 13 years since the World Summit, modest progress has been achieved in social integration, with setting up of a Treaty Body to address the issue of the disabled, adoption of a UN Declaration on Indigenous People's, as well as adoption of several commendable Programmes of Action for various social groups. However, international action needs to be commensurate with appropriate national action at governmental level.

Madam Chair,

There is no "one size fits all" solution for social integration at the national level. As most countries have evolved their own policies and programmes for social integration, this multidimensional concept still needs to be well understood and addressed. This is particularly important now, as the world is passing through difficult financial and food crises, which has a direct impact on various national programmes. More so, these exacerbate social imbalance, and makes vulnerable groups more susceptible. This also leads to social tensions, further threatening social cohesion. The Commission for Social Development has rightly identified social integration as the priority area for 2009-2010. This will encourage a closer evaluation by all, of the concept of social integration and help countries to learn from each others experience.

Madam Chair,

In India, we have been using a social integration approach since our independence by ensuring that despite different backgrounds, age, sex, ethnicity, religion or region, social development is accessible to all and there is no barrier to anyone in his or her overall development. To illustrate this, in our Constitution, we have introduced the concept of universal adult suffrage for all citizens of India, above 21 years, regardless of sex, ethnicity, religion, physical status. Also, all regions have been given proportionate representation, based on the total population, in the national Parliament. The concept of grassroots governance also matured as we enacted the Panchayati Raj System in the 1990s, enabling each village to elect its own decision making body at the village level, to decide on developmental activities. This concept is a unique example of social integration, as reservations have been provided to various communities as well as to women to get elected so that they can actively decide on social development programmes affecting their community in a targeted manner. The framers of our Constitution were right. As the authority on constitutional law, Granville Austin, said: "The leaders" leap of faith that constitutional democracy and a constitutionally pursued social revolution would succeed" has "been justified". The social Jacobinism of the formerly marginalised has been expressed entirely through democratic electoral politics and has led to equality of groups and not just individuals, leading to social integration.

In order to address an affirmative government role in improving the economic conditions of the society, a series of five year developmental programmes have been introduced. Currently, we are implementing the 11th Five Year Plan for the period 2007-12. These programmes use the concept of social integration to mainstream policies and programmes in all sectors by evolving a comprehensive strategy with an inclusive development philosophy. Thus, the current Five Year Plan, with the objective of empowering women politically, educationally, economically and legally, has made gender a cross-cutting theme in all its programmes. Apart from planning from above, there is grass root mobilisation from below. The National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme not only gives 100 days employment to every rural household and greatly improves wage levels but, because it is demand-driven, has been revolutionary instrument of empowerment, of breaking down social inequalities and ensuring social dignity.

Madam Chair,

In addition to making the process of social integration inclusive and participatory by including all in governance, a significant process of transparency has also been introduced in India in 2005, with the enactment of "Right to Information? Act. By it, each citizen is given a right to seek information regarding government action or inaction, thereby, lending a voice to the citizens to review Government policies. This has also encouraged a more participatory approach by people and has made government functionaries more responsive and accessible to society in general and people in particular.

Mainstreaming of social policies into macroeconomic policies is necessary, not just at the national level, but also at the international level. Poverty, ignorance and disease still afflict millions of people and the commitment to achieve the ambitious targets set by the Millennium Development Goals, which is essential not just for global prosperity and welfare, but also for social development, still remains a challenge. With the current financial crisis exacerbating this challenge, there is a greater need for developed countries to fulfil their commitment of transferring financial resources to the developing countries and reaching the target of 0.7% of Gross National Income as ODA as a matter of priority.

Madam Chair,

In conclusion, we reiterate our resolve to promote social development and achieve greater social integration of youth, senior citizens, the disabled, women and other groups in national and international economic activities. Towards this end, we welcome the priority theme of social integration of the Commission and hope that the outcome of its deliberations will help states to develop more socially inclusive and cohesive development policies and programmes in future.

I thank you, Madam Chair.

726. Remarks adapted from the extempore remarks by Permanent Representative Ambassador Nirupam Sen at the Informal meeting of the General Assembly plenary on Security Council reform.

New York, February 19, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me begin by expressing my appreciation of the leadership of the President of the General Assembly and of the manner in which you have conducted the process since your appointment. Today marks only the formal and not the substantive commencement of intergovernmental negotiations on the comprehensive reform of the UN Security Council. Substantively, today cannot be seen as the beginning of negotiations. In this sense, my colleague and friend, the distinguished Permanent Representative of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines was right. We have not in this sense, implemented Decision 62/557 which was supposed to be our lodestar. If we continue in this way, we would simply be continuing the OEWG under another name and thereby contravening Decision 62/557 in substance just as we have not implemented it in terms of dates since actual negotiations will begin on March 4 instead of by February 28.

Today has finally come after 15 years of consultations in the OEWG with no concrete outcome, and it has come despite Herculean efforts by a minority to block any possibility of real negotiations. Today, in a formal sense, is a historic turning point but this minority is still trying to ensure that history does not turn. I will not dwell on the rather sad fate of those who have tried to hold back the wheels of history.

Mr. Chairman,

At the beginning of your statement, you had referred to the misspelling in one of the San Francisco documents - "The untied nations". While I agree with the point you made, there are cases like the present one where some untying is useful and necessary - untying ourselves from the OEWG, from its style and methods, from its numbing, paralyzing touch. You also spoke of moving from the antechamber to the negotiating hall. As we have seen today, there are some countries who would like to keep us in the antechamber for ever. One of them spoke of the ambition of a few but even if this were to be so, it is as nothing compared to the ambition to those who are attempting to keep us in this antechamber for ever. It was astonishing to hear proposals that were defeated on 15 September 2008 that totally failed to get support in the OEWG being resuscitated. I am glad you reiterated what the President of the General Assembly stated on January 29, namely that our guiding principles would be the UN Charter, UN Rules and Procedures (naturally including the GA Rules of Procedure), the World Summit Outcome Document and past practice. As stated by a majority of speakers on January 29, inputs from member states can only be taken on board if they are in consonance with these documents and sources.

Mr. Chairman,

The frequency of meetings must be increased - the work plan currently envisages a meeting every two weeks which is inadequate. As it stands, the work plan is more plan than work. As you know in the fairy tales, all work and no play is supposed to lead to dullness. But the reverse - in this case all plan and little work - would lead to even greater dullness. I agree with the remark by the Permanent Representative of Malta that we should listen to the small states. We can make a good beginning by listening to Solomon Islands and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines who have called for at least two meetings a week, a call endorsed by South Africa, Nigeria and many other states. Solomon Islands has one of the smallest missions in the UN and if they are comfortable with two meetings a week ( an index of their commitment to reform and their understanding of its urgency) then we would suggest meeting twice a week to keep the momentum - exact dates of the meetings should be informed in advance. The minority that opposes this, again does not want progress or even actual negotiations.

The most important issue is that there be a document or text on which to negotiate and focus on. Only then can negotiations be fruitful. The PGA has referred to a summary of proposals included in A/62/47 - this is a welcome recognition in principle of the need for a composite text. However, the document referred to does not automatically translate into a document on which negotiations can be held. Instead, we need to arrange all the proposals under various key issues. We would request you again to prepare such a document. Delegations could then be asked to focus their response on the various options available under each key issue. The previous speaker said that this would circumscribe and make less inclusive the negotiations. We do not see how: all proposals of member states till the eve of March 4 can be included in the composite paper and on March 4 during negotiations any member state is free to include a proposal that has not been included or make an additional proposal for inclusion. If such a composite paper is not made available, we will end up with a repeat of the OEWG format - statements by various delegations on each of the key issues. We don't need to repeat this process - this has been going on for 15 years. The minority that does not want real negotiations looks forward to wasting March, April by simply making statements on proposals and thereby converting the Informal GA Plenary into an OEWG. We cannot accept this. One of our friends quoted an English statesman. Let me refer to another political figure who said that certain types of negotiations become like picking up mercury with a fork. Another political figure said that we should then use a spoon. The minority I have referred to should examine its own recent history and it will see that this is entirely Mephistophelean: they have achieved the opposite of what they wanted; they achieved the opposite of what they wanted on 15 September 2008; they achieved the opposite of what they wanted in the OEWG; and they will achieve the opposite of what they want now: they will compel us to use fairly quickly the spoon of the formal GA Plenary.

Mr. Chairman,

In conclusion, let me make an important practical point. We would recommend for the negotiations an interactive format rather than the format of prepared statements so that member states can react immediately to specific proposals and ideas. From your own experience today, it is clear that there should be no pre-determined sign up sheet for the list of speakers. Member states wishing to react to specific proposals or aspects of proposals specifically and concretely should simply raise the flag and react. We have to have actual negotiations and not waste time with yet another round of set statements. I shall not dwell on the substance of reform which I shall do when we negotiate on each theme but I would like to, before closing, endorse what our African colleagues have said, a point that was emphasized by many of them, specially the current Chair of the African group - it is not just a question of under representation of Africa but of its non representation in the permanent membership.

I thank you, Sir.

727. Intervention by Deputy Secretary Ministry of Environment and Forests Ms. Saheli Ghosh Roy during the Thematic Discussion on "Small Island Developing States" during IPM to CSD-17.

New York, February 23, 2009.

- SIDS, like many developing countries, have been particularly affected by the current financial crisis. This needs need to be given particular attention.
- SIDS must also be supported in their efforts to prepare National Adaptation Plans of Action, and implement projects identified by such Plans.
- In the spirit of solidarity that governs South-South cooperation, India has been honoured to contribute to the development efforts of SIDS by sharing its experience and expertise, as well as intellectual and technological resources.
- In its cooperation efforts with SIDS, India has shared the experience gained from addressing similar concerns in the large number of small islands within its territory.
- Overall, India has committed project aid of US$ 70 million to SIDS, in addition to US$ 350 million in concessional loans and credit lines.
- However, efforts by fellow developing countries like India can only supplement the efforts required from the international community. Developed countries must, with a sense of urgency, fulfil their obligations of adequate financial resources, technology transfer and capacity building.
- International support must be in line with national priorities identified by the SIDS themselves.
- The most important element is implementation, rather than new commitments.

728. Statement by Counsellor at the Permanent Mission at the UN Dr. Anupam Roy on United Nations Peacekeeping at the Substantive Session of the Special Committee.

New York, February 24, 2009.

Madam Chair,

Let me begin by congratulating you and other members of the bureau on your election. My delegation attaches the greatest importance to the issue of Peacekeeping and to the work of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations. We will cooperate with you fully in conducting the business of this session. My delegation would like to take this opportunity to align itself broadly with the statement made by the Delegation of Morocco on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement. We thank Under Secretaries-General Alain Le Roy and Susan Malcorra for their remarks. We take note of the report of the Secretary General on the recommendations of this Committee.

Madam Chair,

There has been an enormous expansion in the activities of the United Nations Peacekeeping Operations. According to the figures in Under Secretary General Le Roy's statement yesterday, the number of UN peacekeepers has increased almost ten-fold in less than a decade. This expansion shows no signs of abating. 18 UN missions are already in the ground and 2 more have been mandated by the UN Security Council. To this expansion has been added an increasing complexity in the mandates of the missions, the evolving operating environments in which peacekeepers function, the ever-changing nature of conflict, and burgeoning logistical and support requirements of these missions.

Any organization that faces such demands would be hard pressed to manage such changes. It would, therefore, be safe to assume that much action, and deliberation, is required to ensure the ability of the United Nations and of the Departments of Peacekeeping Operations and Field Support to bear this heavy and growing burden.

Madam Chair,

As Member States, it is our responsibility to give clear instructions to the DPKO, DFS and the peacekeepers and provide them the resources and the authority to successfully conclude their mission. The mandates of the missions, the resources made available and the command and management structures of the operations should not by themselves become burdens.

The first step in this process is to ensure that Troop Contributing Countries, who bear the overwhelming majority of the human, and increasingly, the material costs of peacekeeping operations, have a clearly defined role of shaping mandates. The process of consultations between the Security Council, Troop Contributing Countries, and the Secretariat to achieve clear and achievable mandates must become a meaningful process. Triangular consultations between them are vital and must take place at an early stage and in a structured manner. Triangular consultations must also be held whenever mandate changes are being contemplated. In a time of increasingly robust mandates, this would ensure clarity on the part of the Member States about the objective of the mission and how it is to be achieved. For this clarity, the experience of the TCCs is a necessary input when defining a mandate.

Troop Contributing Countries also have the intellectual capital, derived from recent experience in nation-building, to deal with the situations that many of the current peacekeeping missions seek to manage and improve. Many TCC military, paramilitary and police officers also have a range of operational and staff experience that are of an order and nature that would be difficult to match. This ability, experience and knowledge do not, unfortunately, seem to find reflection in the policy formulation and planning processes in the DPKO and DFS. In view of the considerable experience that TCC candidates have, it is odd to be told that suitable candidates are not available for appointments from TCCs at senior management levels. This deficit in levels of representation from TCCs, in the planning process, in all stages and aspects of UNPKOs, requires urgent rectification in order to ensure greater effectiveness in functioning of DPKO and DFS.

Madam Chair,

We have taken note of the observations of the Secretary General in his report to this committee (A/63/615) about the restructuring of the DPKO - in particular that the institutional capacity and operational capability of UN peacekeeping has increased markedly. We have also taken note of the comments of Under Secretary General Le Roy that the restructuring processes are nearing completion. We would like to know more about the efficiencies, economies and capabilities that have been augmented by this process. We have taken note of the sections of the report that deal with coordination between the DPKO and DFS. We would be particularly interested to know about the functioning of the Integrated Operational Teams and whether they have been able to improve delivery of services in a resource-efficient manner.

Madam Chair,

We endorse the observation of the Secretary General that the role of the police in bridging the security gap has become a key feature in UN Peacekeeping Operations. It has been our experience that civilian police and para-military capacities are often more appropriate for dealing with the types of situations that the United Nations is increasingly likely to face in respect of peacekeeping in the years to come. We accordingly follow, with interest, the functioning of the Office of the Rule of Law and Security Institutions in general and the office of the Police Advisor in particular. In this context we have noted that the Standing Police Capacity has commenced operations. We have also taken note of the proposal to create another Standing Capacity to deal with justice and correctional systems in the Office of the Rule of Law and Security Institutions.

While on the subject of civilian peacekeeping, my delegation would like to convey its belief that the brunt of adverse security environments is borne by the weak and the deprived, and by women and children. In this context India strongly favours the induction of more female peacekeepers and encourages the DPKO to be more proactive in this process. The recognition accorded to the work of the female Indian Formed Police Unit in Liberia is an indication of the usefulness and impact of female peacekeepers in such situations.

I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate our position that we are in favour of a policy of zero tolerance in respect of disciplinary and conduct issues. We strongly favour efforts to raise awareness of those with managerial and command responsibilities and the establishing of standards of conduct, training and investigation. Careful preparatory training in terms of a multi-cultural, pluralistic and tolerant outlook is as important as subsequent swift punitive action, once culpability is established.

Madam Chair,

It is important for my delegation to stress the fundamental nature of the Guiding Principles of Peacekeeping. Of particular importance are impartiality and the principle of consent of parties. Peacekeepers should go only where there is a peace to keep, i.e. where there is a credible peace agreement. The reversal of this sequence can lead to and has led to disastrous consequences.

My delegation would also like to point out that troops are contributed by contributing countries to a larger cause: that of peace in far off lands. The safety and security of UN peacekeepers must be of paramount concern to this organization, in whose name they serve.

Madam Chair,

A number of initiatives are underway to look at ways and means to strengthen the instrument of UN Peacekeeping in the context of the challenges that it will face. The Security Council and this Committee are seized of the matter. The Secretariat, Under Secretary General Le Roy has briefed us, is preparing its own internal review, the "New Horizons" report. A number of other efforts are also underway. My delegation would like to stress two points in respect of these efforts. Firstly, my delegation would like to stress that duplication must be avoided and the need for all these initiatives to complement each other. Secondly, and equally importantly, there is a need to consult and harvest the experience and insight of those who have actually participated in Peacekeeping in the field and in the Secretariat.

India stands solidly committed to assist the UN in the maintenance of international peace and security. We have a proud history of UN peacekeeping dating back to its inception in the 1950s. We have contributed nearly 100,000 troops, and participated in more than 40 missions. India has also provided and continues to provide eminent Force Commanders for UN Missions. We salute the 118 Indian peacekeepers, as well as those from other countries, who have made the supreme sacrifice and laid down their lives while serving in UN Missions.

Madam Chair,

In concluding my delegation would like to point out that peacekeeping is a prime example of how innovation can be applied to the principle of the Charter. The fact that that this word is not mentioned in the UN charter has not prevented the construction, over the last six decades, of an edifice that has become a cornerstone of international diplomacy. We are at a time when the demands on the institution and on the Member States are unprecedented in their scale and intensity. My delegation believes that unless Member States apply this sense of innovation to the structures of the UN and principles of the Charter, the United Nations will face a crisis that will handicap its ability to bear the responsibilities of keeping peace in the world in the years and decades to come.

Thank You.

729. Intervention by Deputy Secretary, Ministry of Environment & Forests Ms. Saheli Ghosh Roy during the Thematic Discussion on "Africa" during IPM to CSD-17.

New York, February 26, 2009.

- We associate ourselves with the statement made by the Chair of G-77.
- The themes of this implementation cycle are particularly to Africa - it is therefore fitting that Africa is also being considered as a thematic issue.
- Despite the severe constraints faced, African countries have been making special efforts to achieve their development goals. It is critical that the international community provide concrete assistance to these efforts through provision of greater financial resources, technology transfer and capacity building, particularly in the current global financial scenario.
- We would like to emphasize the importance institution building and capacity development, which lays the true foundation of sustained growth. There must be easier access of African countries to developed country markets. There must also be a focus on actions that add value to African exports.
- India has been privileged to have been able to contribute to African development efforts through South-South cooperation. While these have been highlighted during previous statements at the CSD, the establishment of the India-Africa Forum Summit last year deserves to be highlighted. Let me reiterate our Prime Minister's commitment that "it is our intention to become a close partner in Africa's resurgence".
- As part of this commitment, India will offer credit lines worth US$ 5.4 billion dollars over the next five years to African countries, apart from grants worth US$ 500 million. The number of scholarships to African students is also being doubled. Focus areas of cooperation include creating regional and pan-African institutions of higher education, particularly in science, IT and vocational education, infrastructure and industrial development, well as investing in R&D in renewable energy and agricultural development. In addition, India announced a Duty Free Tariff Preference Scheme for LDCs, which would also be applicable to the 34 African LDCs.
- However, efforts by fellow developing countries cannot replace the need for actions by the developed countries. We hope CSD 17 would spur greater efforts towards implementation of their commitments.

730. Statement partly adapted from extempore remarks by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Nirupam Sen, during negotiations on UN Security Council Reform at the Informal Plenary of the General Assembly.

New York, March 4, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

I thank you for convening this meeting and for your efforts towards changing the format of our meeting.

As regards the various options presented, we remain convinced that genuine reform of the UNSC can come only from an expansion in both its permanent and non-permanent membership. This is the option that the overwhelming majority support. There is no question of second preferences regarding this - any reform that does not expand the permanent membership will be incomplete and futile.

Some have argued that since first preferences of all cannot be fulfilled, the interim option is the best way forward. This is fallacious - the number of countries that oppose the interim model far exceed those that oppose the proposal to expand both permanent and non-permanent membership. Hence, the intermediate model cannot be defended as having the largest, or even a large, support. The interim model has been rejected by many African states, by the overwhelming majority of small states, by the L-69 group and its supporters. A representative of the UFC spoke of the under representation of Africa. The problem is far more serious: Africa's non-representation in the Permanent category. Any proposal that does not address this does grave injustice to Africa's aspirations to equality. The terms "intermediary", "intermediate" and "interim" have been described by some speakers as the same. They are very different. It is important to note precisely what we mean. "Intermediary" means go between or facilitator. Therefore the only intermediary model is you yourself Mr. Chairman. "Intermediate" is simply something in between without balancing either the weight of numbers or political weight. "Interim" is implicitly predicated on a common understanding of "interim to what" since it is transitional. As currently put forward, the "intermediate" model is simply reform for the sake of reform like art for arts sake, purely mechanical reform that would not address any of the real problems, provide no check or balance to permanent members, no institutional memory to ensure optimal decision making and its wide acceptance. In short, it would give the illusion of reform and thereby set back real reform. It would merely add to numbers and would make the Security Council unwieldy without making it effective. It would not empower African or other developing countries. It will simply postpone a decision that there is no reason to suppose would be any easier after 10 years than it is now. In short, the "intermediate" model represents the kind of compromise described by Lord David Cecil: "an agreement between parties to do what most of them agree to be wrong". It is worth recalling that the main feature of this model, immediate re-election, was introduced in the League of Nations. It neither worked well nor helped the League of Nations work well. In fact, shortly thereafter, the League of Nations collapsed (I am not suggesting that this was the only reason but it certainly did not help to prevent the collapse). When I listen to the supporters of the "intermediate? model, I am therefore reminded of what the great American novelist Thomas Pynchon asks in his "Against the Day" (I have had occasion to refer to him in the course of an earlier debate): "What are they doing here, so late in history" with "the dismal metonymies of the dead behind them?"

A leading light of the UFC has proposed regional seats that will permit longer / more frequent presence on the Council. We believe that the current non-permanent seats are actually regional seats, that permit each region to be represented at all times. If the reference is to the "intermediate approach" of new longer-term seats, but with incumbents from particular regions, or to new non-permanent seats / longer-term seats with immediate reelection, this is truly disingenuous! Both alternatives actually seek to benefit individual countries, under the guise of correcting regional under-representation! What is more, with the possible exception of Africa, no region has reached the stage. As the response to the current economic crisis, particularly as it manifests itself in Eastern Europe, shows this is true of even the European Union. If this UFC member is so sure of his position, why did this position not carry in the June 22, 2007 EU Summit which took decisions on an EU high representative backed by an EU external service but had nothing to say about regional EU seat in the UNSC.

The other suggestion of reserved seats reserved for Small States, and for Medium-sized States, and the OIC (as another UFC member proposed) actually deals with allocation of seats, and is not a proposal for a new category of membership. However, I would like to emphasize that current allocation of non-permanent seats is on regional basis, and the UFC proposal seeks to them on non-regional basis, contradicting its other proposal of regional seats! It should make up its mind what it wants. The logic has to be consistent: if it wants to discuss non-regional seats then let us discuss seats for the NAM, G-77, etc. Moreover, the categories mentioned are not recognized UN groups, rather than SIDS, LLDCs or LDCs (which could be considered). However, we should discuss the details of this under the issue of representation. The leading light of the UFC who referred to OIC opposed permanent membership. He is obviously not acquainted with para 73 of the OIC Communiqué of April 2008 even if there was the slightest reason to suppose that he has read it: the OIC Communiqué speaks of representation in both categories, which logically includes the permanent category. He has to make up his mind whether he belongs to UFC or OIC. Or is he following the example of Mr. Facing Bothways in Pilgrim's Progress, or in this case the Pilgrim's Regress?

There is an overwhelming demand for improvement in the UNSC's working methods, of greater transparency and access, of making it more inclusive. There have been numerous efforts to improve UNSC working methods, particularly by non-permanent members. However, these efforts have not succeeded, and this is a reflection of the reality that reform of working methods requires a change in the composition of the permanent members of the UNSC, who would be held accountable for introducing these working methods. The S-5 proposal could not even be put for adoption. The General Assembly actually adopted a very radical proposal on working methods in its Resolution 267 (III) of 14th April 1949. Not one of these has been implemented for more than half a century. This proves the point. This assertion is also borne out by the fact that an expansion of only non-permanent members was carried out in 1965. This did not result in the improvement in the working methods - it is unrealistic to expect the situation to change now. Non-permanent members remain excluded from the core decision making of the UNSC, and increasing their numbers will not change this fact.

Access and participation of non-Members, particularly small island states and landlocked countries and other vulnerable countries, in the work of the UNSC is crucial to any reform effort, apart from a dedicated seat for them. Given that non-permanent seats, including those occupied by some of these countries, have not resolved the problem, the only effective response is to elect new permanent members, who can be held accountable for implementing this, through a review.

Another representative of the UFC confused elections with accountability. Are all non-permanent members accountable? Even in the case of a clean slate? It is incorrect that accountability of the UNSC would increase with more non-permanent members. There are already 10 non-permanent members against only 5 permanent members, and each non-permanent seat is filled by election. Yet, greater accountability has not been achieved. Clearly, the solution will not be found only by adding more non-permanent members, who will face the same structural problems of today in ensuring that the UNSC is more accountable. Accountability also is not only of individual members but of the Council to the General Assembly. Have non-permanent members have brought this about? We need new permanent members, who will be able to ensure a real change, and be held accountable for doing this through the initial election and mandatory review / reviews. The most fruitful way therefore is the one suggested by a small state, Singapore, namely that we should negotiate how to ensure the accountability of new permanent members.

New York, March 5, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

I am taking the floor again to respond to some points made by a leading light of the UFC. The UFC dilemma between trying to promote regional seats (which exist) and non-regional seats is evident, and cannot be resolved. They keep on stating that permanent members cannot promote regional interests - perhaps this is why the UNSC is composed of permanent national seats and permanent regional seats. However, if regional interests are paramount, then what is the need for non-regional representation?

On the other hand, if countries define themselves more by non-regional groupings, why should we insist on promoting regional interests, particularly when most regions do not have common political positions? On the one hand they are proposing regional seats which already exist. All non-permanent members are elected from permanent regional seats. If the issue is that they should be chosen by the region then this is clearly the case when there are clean slates. On the other hand they are proposing dedicated seats for cross regional groupings, such as OIC or Small States (there is no such recognized grouping in the UN and we should really speak of SIDS, LDCs etc. whose aspirations we support). To propose two opposite things at the same time is against logic, common sense and practicality. We cannot proceed with negotiations at all if we move simultaneously in two opposite directions. If the UFC really wants such dedicated seats (and SIDS representatives have just now told us that they object to being used as pawns) then let them propose dedicated seats for SIDS, LDCs, LLDCs, NAM, G-77 and several other groupings and we could then also discuss new permanent members all elected globally. We can then abandon the regional basis for a further expansion. But let us be serious and consistent.

While paying lip service to Africa (like to SIDS) the UFC has been dismissive of African aspirations to equality. UFC has repeatedly been trying to interpret the African demand for permanent representation as rotation/regional seats, despite clear statements by Africa that they do not merely want this. There is always an African country on the Council - thus, there is "permanent representation". They correctly are not satisfied with this injustice. They want new permanent members from Africa (to be chosen by Africa), and all of UFC efforts cannot square this circle. Similar problems exist with the UFC interpretation of the OIC position, on which I elaborated yesterday. Another leading UFC member's argument on the legitimacy of the UNSC is divorced from reality. He argued that UNSC's legitimacy is derived from the Charter, which is technically correct. By this logic, how is legitimacy related in any way to the Council being more transparent, democratic and accountable?

This assertion clearly demonstrates that there is more to legitimacy than just being approved by the Charter, and this can only be achieved if there is genuine restructuring of its permanent membership. The leading light of the UFC defined legitimacy in terms of accountability which, according to him, means that all members except the P5 must be subject to regular scrutiny through GA elections. This is patently false and misleading - only with new elected permanent members, subject to review, can there be accountability. One cannot confuse elections with accountability: even when there is a clean slate are non-permanent members accountable. To whom? Moreover, the key is accountability of the Council to the GA, and not just accountability of individual countries.

If accountability ended at elections, we should have had the most accountable UNSC since we have elections by 2/3rd of the UNSC membership every two years. Especially after the 1965 reform non-permanent members should have ensured this. Have they managed to do so? Is UNSC accountable to the GA? Regarding criteria for membership, we have always supported any objective criteria. UN Charter defines some criteria. To say that there can be no objective criteria is untenable. We ourselves have said that among criteria by which the performance of new permanent members could be judged is their commitment and success in introducing new working methods (in spite of Resolution 267(III) of 14th April 1949 adopted by the then GA with its radical working methods there has been no improvement in more than half a century). Clearly, without new permanent members there would not be fundamentally new working methods. The leading light of the UFC, however, mentioned criteria such as not having border problems, conflict with neighbours and other countries etc. Firstly, it is the sovereign right of every country to decide what is necessary for its security. Secondly, if these criteria are to be used, several current permanent members would be disqualified. Therefore, let us be serious and practical instead of trying to score debating points. The distinguished representative of the UFC claimed that there is widespread support for the interim model.

Out of 112 countries that took the floor, only 34 could accept such a model and that too if we count both first and second preferences. On the other hand, more than 55 countries expressed a first preference for expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories; the African representatives who spoke said categorically that they were speaking on behalf of the African Union countries; if one therefore includes the African Union countries who did not take the floor more than 100 countries support expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories. It seems that the UFC representative's arithmetic is as shaky as his ability to address the real problems.

He said that the G-4 proposal was crafted by Razali and is 15 years old. Incidentally, the G-4 proposal is a substantial development on the original Razali formula. I would like to mention that the interim model of re-electable members was introduced in the League of Nations (shortly before it collapsed) in 1926. It seems to us better to discuss a proposal that is 15 years old than one that is 73 years old. Mr. Chairman, I would therefore suggest that we move to negotiations on what really enjoys majority support - expansion of permanent and non-permanent categories of membership, together, of course, with the issue of review. We are also prepared to discuss how we can have a dedicated seat for SIDS and LDCs within this framework of reform. We would urge you to prepare a composite text accordingly which can serve as the basis for negotiations.

I thank you, Sir.

732. Statement partly adapted from the extempore remarks of the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Nirupam Sen during negotiations on the Question of the Veto at the informal General Assembly Plenary.

New York, March 16, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me join my colleagues in thanking you for your circular letter, for holding this meeting and for conducting this negotiating process. The veto was not god-given. It is part of what the ancient Greek historian Herodotus called ta genomena ex anthropon or "things that result from human action" and therefore can be modified by human action. As the distinguished Permanent Representative of Algeria pointed out, the veto was exercised on behalf of political formations that no longer exist. States and empires have broken up and decolonization has brought into the General Assembly the majority of its membership. World War-II and the Cold War are both over and the Permanent Members can no longer either manage the world economy or world peace. The veto effectively keeps significant areas of interest outside the ambit of the UN which is inadmissible.

After the massive failure of governance, represented by the collapse of the financial system, any absolute claim to governance is mere hubris. The Charter is a kind of treaty. The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties sees a change of circumstances as "autonomous ground of non-application" of the treaty (supported by the International Court of Justice). There is a school of thought that says that no restrictions can be placed on the use of veto. There is another that says that restrictions should be placed. Let me point out that there already are at least two restrictions on the veto in the Charter - one explicit and one implicit. The first significantly is in the very article that enunciates the veto namely 27.3. This very article states that Permanent Members who are party to a dispute cannot vote (and therefore cannot veto) decisions under Chapter 6 (specific settlement to disputes) and under article 52.3.

In actual fact, Permanent Members have mostly violated this article and this restriction. Unless there is the peer pressure of new Permanent Members held accountable through reviews, how do we ensure implementation of this Charter restriction? Incidentally, US Senator Tom Connally, US delegate to the GA of November 15, 1946 had said that the purpose of this restriction was to "prevent a party to a dispute being judge of its own cause, to establish in the Charter a principle of justice which is elementary in every legal system. We would not permit a party to a lawsuit to sit as a member of the jury." This is the old principle of Roman jurisprudence: nemo debet esse iudex in propria sua causa. What we have just heard would leave this principle and the restrictions to continue to be breached. Similarly the spirit of articles 31 & 32 is that once the Security Council has the view that a member state's interests are affected, that member state has to be heard; a Permanent Member should not veto such a majority view; in actual fact the veto or the threat of veto has been often used in such cases.

Without new Permanent Members, how is this restriction to be implemented? Apart from the veto, there are articles like Article 39 (threat to peace and security) which have been amended de-facto by Permanent Members to redefine threats to peace and security or articles like Article 44, under which TCCs should take part in debate and decision making on peace keeping mandates, which have never been used. There is a school of thought that says that the veto cannot be amended and a school of thought that says that it should be amended. The short point is that the veto has been amended but the amendment has been informal and therefore legally infirm. Article 27.3 of the Charter clearly speaks of "the concurring votes" of permanent members.

Therefore, Charter commentaries of 1946 make it amply clear that abstention was the equivalent of a veto. It is not treated as such any longer. The Charter can only be amended by procedures set out in Articles 108 and 109. Therefore, this informal amendment is really law making by law breaking. What is more it is to the detriment of the General Assembly. The legal principle of estoppel prevents the GA from challenging a UNSC decision with an abstention by a permanent member as illegal or invalid because of acceptance over a fairly long period of time. But it cannot even demand further continuation of the practice. The permanent members can give it up any time and go back to the earlier interpretation, without legal problem. Thus it is they who are amending the Charter, not the General Assembly. There were to permanent members who were represented at Deputy Minister level at the meeting in Rome on February 5, 2009. His Excellency Foreign Minister Frattini, summing up the discussion, stated "we should also realistically review the question of the veto". Since they hold the principle of consensus, it would be useful to know if these Permanent Members agreed to have their veto realistically reviewed. Practical restrictions that could be considered is a qualified veto i.e. confined to Chapter VII; non-use in a range of issues that have nothing to do with peace and security such as a change in how a peacekeeping operation is financed, the Council seeking the advisory opinion of the ICJ, bringing a question to the GA, electing the Secretary General, reverse veto.

There is a widespread demand of civil society for non-use in cases of ethnic cleansing, war crimes, crimes against humanity. On the model of the US Constitution overriding the veto by 2/3rds votes of the General Assembly could also be considered. The demand that whenever a veto is used it should be explained is reasonable in purely legal terms: Gustav Radbruch, an authority on international law, has formulated the famous Radbruch formula. In terms of Article 25, even if a Member State disagrees, it has to implement but law requires a reason for obedience. Most important of all, even if restrictions are accepted and enacted, how would they, like the restrictions already in the Charter, be implemented without new permanent members elected and then held accountable for implementing them through reviews.

Article 27(3) requires concurrence of the permanent members - thus, once we have new permanent members, the requirement of their concurrence, or their right to veto as is commonly stated, is automatic. The concept of extension of veto to new permanent members is, therefore, misleading as Article 27(3) would have to be specifically amended if we have to deny the veto to new permanent members. In this sense, the proposal of the African Union is logical and in the spirit of the Charter. A few delegations have argued that new permanent members without veto rights will not make any difference to the functioning of the Council, and hence there should be no new permanent members.

The automatic corollary of the argument is that new permanent members must be given the veto right, apart from the fact that addition of new permanent members, with their institutional memory and long-term engagement horizon, is the only way to ensure any real reform of the Council. A leading light of the UFC stated that without the veto, new permanent members cannot wield influence, and there will be no change in the working methods. On the other hand, they are happy to sell us the idea that non-permanent members, who certainly will not have the veto, and will be there for shorter terms, will be able to deliver reform. Another, at an earlier meeting, said that they had been against the veto in 1945 and continue to be. This tragically demonstrates the power non-permanent members have over the reality of UNSC decision making. Thus behind all the tall talk of equality, the UFC is deeply status quoist. We have been told by a leading light of the UFC that "extending the veto would not redress inequality.

It would aggravate it, further gum up the decision-making mechanism and that we should have "gradual limitation of the veto". There are three issues here: equality, efficiency and restrictions. The UFC proposal would leave the monopoly of the P-5 untouched, there would be no equality with the P-5. Without the pressure of initial election and subsequent accountability of new permanent members and their peer pressure, there would be no movement towards greater equality. As for restrictions, without new permanent members held accountable for them, how do we achieve these? As we have seen even if they were enacted in the Charter, how do we ensure their implementation? The question is legitimate - how do we ensure efficiency through extending the veto and expanding numbers? Actually we would then have real efficiency unlike the fake one that exists now. Firstly, decisions would be more optimal, widely accepted, reducing the need for force. Most important of all with more numbers and more veto the only way to ensure efficiency is through majority voting and non-use or at least greatly restricted use of the veto.

This incidentally is the only way also to empower non-permanent members and shift the balance of power. The Uniting For Consensus does not want any of this and hence its proposals. Since both efficiency and optimality favour this, the only reason for denying veto and permanence (through the interim model and the UFC proposal) could only be that this is an attempt to recreate apartheid in the UNSC on the premise that developing countries cannot handle either the veto or permanence - a continuation of the historical imperial project. Our national position has been and remains that veto should be extended to new permanent members. As a measure of our flexibility and willingness for compromise, we had agreed to deferring only the use of the veto till the Review Conference. The African Union (and this is understandable) did not wish to defer use. Now they are being absurdly offered the compromise of giving up permanence also. This is truly an attempt to impose an imperial compromise. The UFC's leading light offers them "the possibility" that African members "unanimous negate vote" could stop a decision which would mean that the possible veto of all the African members would be equal to a single European veto. On the other hand, he speaks of "an appeal first and foremost to the permanent members to accept significant limitations on the veto". What if they do not respond to his appeal? Thus while pretending to transcend Orwell's world, the UFC is only perpetuating it.

733. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Nirupam Sen on the situation in Afghanistan and UNAMA at the Security Council.

New York, March 19, 2009.

Mr. President,

Thank you for scheduling today's debate on Afghanistan and the UN Assistance Mission in that country. This is of immediate and abiding interest for India. We also welcome the latest report of the Secretary-General, while thanking SRSG Kai Eide for his comprehensive briefing.

Mr. President,

The latest report paints a bleak picture of the situation in Afghanistan. We accept these facts; we cannot but recognize that the Afghan people continue to be confronted by the twin challenges of deteriorating security and by a sense that the peace dividend is reducing. At the same time, the international community is simultaneously challenged by a renewed security challenge from the Taliban and the Al Qaeda, and by increasingly-vocal questions over the utility of our collective effort.

And yet the report also holds out elements of hope. We see steady progress in the UN's effort to efforts to reform the Interior Ministry and the police, the work of the various Economic Ministries, and the steady gains in reducing poppy production. It also notes as a sign of progress the fact that the Independent Election Commission of Afghanistan will organize the forthcoming elections. Further, the fact that elections are being contested hotly is a good augury. We are hopeful that the elections will be free, fair and transparent, and that the Afghan people will exercise their rights in such a manner. At the same time, we in the international community must ensure that during the run-up to the elections, the gains secured collectively in Afghanistan are built up, not eroded in any manner. We also strongly condemn the terrorist attack today on representatives of the Afghan people.

While the report, in our view, correctly identifies these positive developments as a window of opportunity to consolidate progress, there is a need to address misgivings over our collective purpose. Let us be clear: the world cannot afford to abandon Afghanistan again. Despite the strains, this Mission remains vital, not only to the aspirations of the long-suffering Afghan people, but for the security and stability of the region and beyond. Doubts, hesitation and divergences in our approach to the Taliban and Al Qaeda weaken our collective will. They also invigorate our foe. Therefore, apart from continued application of force wherever terrorist groups are active, we must work together to deny them safe havens, financing and political and material sustenance, whether within Afghanistan or across its borders. The application of force wherever terrorists gather must harmonize with the larger political objective, and UNAMA must play an important role in this essentially political task. Since messaging is important, it is also essential to have greater clarity regarding the ideas being discussed in the public domain. Reconciliation is one of these. The UNSG's latest report subjects this discussion to important caveats. Not the least of these is the idea that reconciliation must be an Afghan-led process, within the parameters of the Constitution of the land. Further, it must be pursued from a position of political and military strength. To this, I would add that the process needs to be undertaken with strategic clarity and with unity of purpose. In the absence of consensus amongst concerned international parties over the key questions of reconciliation: with whom and how such a process runs the risk of opening up divisions amongst us, rather than amongst the elements with whom we seek to reconcile. Furthermore, we must get beyond attempts to distinguish between "good" and "bad" Taliban: such efforts are unworkable.

Mr. President,

From this standpoint, it is helpful that the international effort is moving towards a more cohesive and integrated approach. We fully endorse the notion that coordination must be based on genuine Afghan leadership, and on recognition of the fact that there is no purely military solution. It is precisely for this reason that India strongly supports efforts to build Afghan capacity. It is not only appropriate but essential to invest in such capacity. Without this, we run the risk of placing responsibility without ensuring that our partners have the means to shoulder it. In this context, India welcomes the continuation of the useful role provided to UNAMA vide UN Security Council Resolution 1806 last year. We see this as a logical corollary of the Afghan National Development Strategy, adopted formally last year, which is a guide map for the international assistance effort in Afghanistan. UNAMA and the Government of Afghanistan have made commendable progress together since UNAMA received this new mandate, and it is essential to build upon these first promising signs resolutely. This effort needs to be supported with greater resources for the UN mission, and greater commitment to alleviating the humanitarian challenge in Afghanistan, especially, given the impact of rising food prices and adverse climatic events. India is working to mitigate the humanitarian impact, including through our recent decision to send a quarter of a million tonnes of wheat to Afghanistan, although most regrettably, we continue to face political difficulties in overland transport and transit to Afghanistan.

Mr. President,

Taking these points as reference, I should like to underscore India's firm and unshakeable commitment to the international effort in Afghanistan. For India, the stabilization of Afghanistan is integrally connected with our security. It is for this reason that while we are outraged by attacks upon our people and symbols of our friendship with Afghanistan, we cannot be deterred by these criminal acts. Not only has our commitment to Afghanistan crossed US $ 1.2 billion, we have attempted to the best of our ability to expand the range and variety of our projects. Thus Indian assistance spans the gamut of operations from infrastructure projects such as the Zaranj-Delaram highway, to institutions such as the Parliament Building in Kabul. We have also simultaneously targeted local projects that will provide a peace dividend in the shortest possible period of time, ranging from cold storage plants to equipment for schools and hospitals. Through these efforts, we maintain capacity-building as a core element of our work in Afghanistan. It is in support of this core task that India has agreed to increase the current allocation of 500 seats each in capacity building and scholarship programmes.

Turning to the regional aspect, Mr President, we need greater efforts to embed the stabilization of Afghanistan within regional processes, for this country to regain its key role as the crossroads of South, West and Central Asia. This includes regional economic processes, such as the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation. Such efforts are in the collective interest of the entire the region: hindering this not only affects Afghanistan, but equally each of us in the region. We therefore need efforts to expand, rather than hinder, trade, transit and transport ties. That is, in our view, the best way of bringing the regional dimension into the discourse on Afghanistan.

Mr. President,

In conclusion, India believes that challenges in Afghanistan need to be seen in their totality. We must analyze where we are today from the perspective of the past eight years. Every step forward has been hard-won, but each step is a measure of distance away from the destruction of the past. It is for this reason that we must continue to emphasize the progress achieved, rather than bemoan the challenges remaining. It is also for this reason that we should set our sights on realistic and achievable goals, not expectations that are unrealistic in the local context. If we are truly committed to an Afghan-led process of prioritization of tasks, we should concentrate on where Afghanistan has come from, rather than where we would individually like it to be. I thank you Mr. President.

734. Remarks adapted from the extempore remarks by Permanent Representative at the UN, Ambassador Nirupam Sen at the Inter-governmental negotiations on UN Security Council Reform in the Informal Plenary of the General Assembly.

New York, March 24, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me begin by appreciating your leadership and thanking you for your letter of March 20, 2009. This afternoon, you asked us to be sharp and short. I can do something about the sharpness; shortness is more difficult but I shall try my best. Permit me to read out a slightly detailed extract from your letter which is essentially from document A/61/47: However, a wide number of delegations felt that, at this stage, the non-permanent members of the Security Council, although proposed on a regional basis, could not represent their respective regions. Rather, as members of the Council, they should have a global accountability and an obligation to the international community as a whole. In addition, many delegations were of the view that the concept of regional seats, given the different character of each regional group as well as the existing differences in their internal working procedures, was not feasible at this stage. Although the composition of the existing regional groups was challenged as not accurately reflecting geopolitical realities, there seems to be a wide understanding that the restructuring of the current system is not realistic. The majority is thus still of the view that the principle of the equitable geographic distribution should be exercised through the existing structures." I have listened carefully to all statements and remarks with only a very short break when I had to go and speak on the Modalities Resolution on the June Economic Conference. It is amply clear that the situation remains exactly what it was in A/61/47. This is where the majority remains. And the situation will not change however often we discuss this. We cannot move beyond this. This only reinforces the need for a composite text on which we can actually negotiate.

The Charter speaks of member states being elected on the basis of their contribution to peace and security and keeping in mind equitable geographical distribution. This distribution is between different regional groups. In the case of clean slates, the regional groups concerned occasionally show a greater measure of agreement. It is not possible to go beyond this. The leading light of the UFC used the term "Masters of the Universe. This is usually applied to investment bankers, brokers and hedge fund managers: they certainly follow only their self interest as the financial and economic crisis demonstrates. But representatives of the UFC claim that member states speak only for their national interest. Of course they do, but not only or exclusively.

They often consult the interest of their regions, of the international community and especially of the functional groups to which they may belong. That is why there is a NAM caucus even in the Security Council. The other difficulty with the UFC proposal is that most of the time there is no regional interest. How do you represent something that does not exist? What is the regional interest of Asia (the regional group does not discuss any political or economic issue), GRULAC, WEOG? There is not even a regional interest or support for regional seats. Therefore if the UFC really believes in the regional interest, it should give up the proposal on regional seats. With the possible exception of Africa, regions do not have the kind of unity that would justify regional seats. Even in the case of the EU (which is not a regional group in the UN) the present economic crisis shows the distance from this kind of unity. In some EU states fiscal policy is difficult because the benefit will go to others in other EU countries.

As for monetary policy, the European Central Bank cannot go further because there is no political backing. Even the European Parliament has the power to oppose rather than to propose. It has not gone very much beyond Bismarck's Reichstag. In purely geographical terms Europe is simply the western peninsula of Asia. In actual fact, EU coordination in the UN is that of a functional group like NAM. The UFC therefore should not talk of regional seats. If it wishes to discuss the creation of new functional seats, then it should talk of seats for representatives of NAM, G-77, SIDS; UFC speaks of regional seats for OIC and Arab League, neither of which is a regional organization: they are also functional organizations.

A UFC representative spoke of sauce; let us consider donuts. This inconsistency and welter of contradictions in the UFC proposals is like sub-optimal and even irrational choice taught in college philosophy courses: a person goes to Dunkin' Donuts and is told that they have chocolate, raisin and plain donuts; he chooses the raisin donut. After a few minutes, he is told that they also have sugar glazed or glaze donuts. In that case he says he would choose a chocolate donut. A couple of UFC representatives spoke of regional accountability. Even in the case of clean slate, is the member state accountable to his region? In any case, since he is elected by the General Assembly, he is accountable to the GA. The only way of ensuring complete regional accountability is for the region to propose a candidate and for him to be accepted without any election process. That a proposal whose logical consequence is abolishing election should emanate from the UFC is not surprising. Ultimately, how do you ensure accountability except through review and challenge? It is therefore logical to elect new permanent members who would be held accountable in this manner, to the General Assembly, and who can bring about a real change.

My distinguished friend, the Permanent Representative of Canada, mentioned the need to have working methods where TCCs are fully consulted. Many of us may not know that it is Canada that got Article 44 included in the Charter for which we are grateful. The Article states that if a non-member of the Security Council provides armed forces then, if it desires, it can "participate in the decisions of the Security Council concerning the employment of contingents of that Member's armed forces." Please note - "decisions" (meaning voting), not just consultations. This Article has remained a dead letter. Canada has been several times a non-permanent member of the UNSC. Was it able to operationalise this Article? That is the case for expansion of permanent membership.

We need new permanent members who would be held accountable not only for implementing new provisions of the Charter (after amendment) but even existing provisions. As many countries from Africa group have pointed out, their demand is not for regional seats but for two permanent members: having stated that they want the same privileges and prerogatives as existing permanent members, the Ezulwini Consensus can have no other meaning. For a long time, the leading lights of the UFC have repeated the charge of national selfishness against those who, in their view, aspire to permanent membership. Let us therefore closely examine the proposal of the selfless UFC, these paragons of regional virtue and altruism. As the Charter makes clear, non-permanent members are elected from regional groups. In this sense, the regional seat is permanent though the individual member's tenure is for two years. The leading light of the UFC has proposed regional seats. Presumably these are longer term seats than the existing regional seats. But whether a seat is two years or longer, it really does not matter to a region since it is always represented. So, the proposal will only benefit some countries (the leading lights of the UFC hope it would be the larger members of the UFC) while pretending that the region is benefiting.

Furthermore, this logically means that the proposal implicitly acknowledges what the leading light of the UFC is trying to avoid accepting - that the duration of membership is important for real reform: any genuine reform, involving a change in the co-relation of forces in the UNSC will only come through new permanent members, elected and held accountable. A close examination will show a similar disguised national interest behind the UFC's proposal on the veto, namely that rotational regional seats should be given the veto, which supposedly will make these seats the same as permanent national seats. Surprisingly, this argument is made by the same group that vehemently argues against any extension of the veto to new permanent members. Ironically, given the lack of a common regional position in most cases, such a veto will effectively become a national veto.

The leading light of the UFC also misinterpreted the proposal made by the distinguished Permanent Representative of Jamaica on behalf of the Caricom. He was perfectly clear that he was neither arguing for a regional seat nor a functional non-geographic seat, outside existing categories. His proposal was squarely within existing categories based on equitable geographic distribution. The proposal could also include LDCs and LLDCs. When we discuss the details, it would be perfectly simple to also take care of the fact that the numbers of SIDS may be different in different regional groups. For instance, specific dedicated seat/seats distributed to regional groups could at any time be filled by a SIDS/LDC/LLDC (which are recognized groupings) and these seat/seats could rotate among Asia, Africa and GRULAC in the ratio 2:2:1. As for the phrase "master of the universe", used by the leading light of the UFC, let me say that we do not think that he is less eloquent. We think that he is equally eloquent, in fact more eloquent. The point however is that a false argument is like a false coin - it is found out and rejected not because it has less lustre but because it has inferior weight.

I thank you, sir.

735. Statement by Acting Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri on Agenda Item 4 - general debate on National Experience in Population Matters, Contribution of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development to the Internationally Agreed Development Goals including the Millennium Development Goals at the 42nd session of the UN Commission on Population Development.

New York, April 1, 2009.

Madam Chairperson,

We congratulate you and other members of the Bureau of the 42nd Session of the Commission on Population and Development and assure you of India's support in your conduct of the proceedings of this Commission. My delegation would like to express its appreciation to the Secretary General for the reports that have been prepared for the Commission and also to the distinguished keynote speakers who have made excellent presentations in the course of the Conference. My delegation associates itself with the statement made by the Group of 77.

Madam Chairperson,

The Government of India accords the highest importance to promote development with social justice i.e. inclusive growth. Indeed, this is the objective of the 11th Five Year Plan, which commenced from 2007-08. We are also making major efforts to attain the Millennium Development Goals and other Internationally Agreed Developed Goals, which are encompassed by several of the objectives and targets laid down in our national Five Year Plans.

Madam Chairperson,

A key weapon against poverty is employment. This is particularly so for a country like India, with its large population. In this context the Government of India is implementing a unique programme, the National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme, to ensure minimum levels of employment in rural India. This would also lead to creating productive infrastructure throughout the country. This scheme has an annual allocation of USD 2.5 billion and guarantees 100 days of work to every household.

Madam Chairperson,

The National Rural Health Mission (NRHM), launched in 2005, is one of the biggest interventions of its kind in the health sector in the world. The NRHM seeks to significantly upgrade effective healthcare throughout India covering over 600 million people. It aims to improve access of rural people, especially poor women and children, to equitable, affordable, accountable and effective primary healthcare. Reproductive and Child Health Programme is one of the main components of the NRHM, and includes the ambitious programme of Janani Surakhksa Yojana (JSY), a safe motherhood intervention to promote institutional delivery with specific focus on poor pregnant women. So far, this programme has benefited more than 10 million women and has emerged as a major successful intervention in reducing maternal and infant mortality.

Madam Chairperson,

India's Family Planning Programme is one of the oldest in the world. It is based on voluntary and informed choice and consent of citizens while availing of reproductive health care services. The programme aims at achieving population stabilization by addressing unmet needs through decentralized planning and programme implementation. At primary health care institutions, there has been an integration of HIV/AIDS programme with the reproductive health care.

Madam Chairperson,

India has also embarked on ambitious programmes for human resource development. The Sarva Siksha Abhiyan (Education for All Campaign) launched in the year 2000, is a major national intervention towards achieving universal primary education and allowing us to reap the benefits of a demographic dividend from a young population. The Government aims to raise public spending on education, collectively at Centre and State levels, to at least 6% of GDP in a phased manner, with half of these amounts to be spent on primary and secondary education.

Madam Chairperson,

Gender equity and empowerment have also been guiding principle in the development policies of the Government of India. India's planning process is fully committed to enabling women to be equal partners in development. Gender budgeting has been introduced across all the sectors. The 73rd and 74th constitutional amendments introduced the provision for one-third reservation of seats for women in local self government institutions. India has the distinction of having the largest number of women representatives in local government in the world. Madam Chairperson, The Annual Report of the Secretary General on the flow of financial resources for assisting in the implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development for this Conference (E/CN.9/2009/5) makes for worrying reading. The demand for resources has grown dramatically since the targets were agreed upon in 1994 at the International Conference on Population and Development. The Conference targets are simply not sufficient to meet the current needs of developing countries in the critical areas of family planning, reproductive health, and STD/HIV/AIDS. It is a matter of great concern that the donor assistance for family planning as a percentage of all population assistance has steadily declined from 55% in 1995 to a mere 5% in 2007. We fear that in the absence of adequate flow of funds, the progress made so far will be negated.

Madam Chairperson,

This meeting is being held in exceptional times when we are faced with a global financial and economic crisis that is seriously affecting developing countries even though they have not been the cause of it. This adverse impact should not be further exacerbated through the remedies that have inherent protectionist tendencies, limit foreign workers and goods, apart from creating non-tariff barriers that work against developing countries.

Thank You Madam Chairperson.

736. Statement by the Acting Permanent Representative to the UN Ambassador Manjiv Singh Puri during the Interactive Thematic Dialogue on the Global Food Crisis and the Right to Food at the 63rd session of the UNGA.

New York, April 6, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for giving me the floor.

We associate ourselves with the intervention on behalf of the G-77. Food security is critical for developing countries. It is also the key to achieving the right to food. Increasing world population and the fact that in large parts of the globe even basic nutrition needs remain unmet, require a focus on both increase in food production and its access.

The current global financial and economic crisis poses additional challenges in achieving food security in developing countries. However, the global crisis should not be an excuse to dilute ODA and other commitments. Measures to address the crisis must not worsen the situation either.

Agricultural production and productive capacity must be enhanced, particularly in developing countries. This is especially important to ensure their food security. And, food aid must not discourage local food production. Nor should there be attempts to encourage major reliance on imports in the case of such a basic need as food.

High agricultural subsidies in developed countries have steadily undermined the agricultural productive capacity of developing countries, and distorted global agricultural trade. These must be significantly reduced if not eliminated.

Food security has also been affected by increasing use of food crops such as corn and soybean for producing bio-fuels in some developed countries with agricultural surpluses. It is important to ensure that this trend is effectively checked and better alternatives to produce bio fuels are developed for retaining the primacy of the food crops for food purpose. Volatility in food prices, as witnessed in the spike of last year, does not help either the farmer or the consumer. Therefore, the structural problems at the root of such volatility need to be addressed. We must not also ignore the fact that agriculture is a livelihood issue for millions of poor farmers and their dependents in developing countries. In many countries, these constitute the vast majority of the populations. Rural and agricultural investments must be enhanced. Climate change is exacerbating agricultural situation in developing countries.

To cope with its adverse impact on food production, developing countries will be required to invest ever more on introduction of climate-resistant varieties and drought management of crops at the very least. These vastly increased investments add ever more to their already existing development challenges. An appropriate policy framework to conserve genetic biodiversity particularly in the developing countries is essential for ensuring food security on sustainable basis. As far as India is concerned, a National Mission on Sustainable Agriculture is a key component of our National Action Plan on Climate Change. Technology can be a key transformation agent in food production and we should be willing to look at what science can make available. The CGIAR and other international research organizations have played an important role in the past in promoting food security. There is no reason why they or other similar institutions in the public domain should not be harnessed again for securing food for all. Regional initiatives, like food banks, have potential for immediate impact. In our region, at the New Delhi Summit of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation [SAARC] in 2007, a SAARC Food Bank was set up to manage emergencies caused by natural and manmade calamities and food shortages, and to supplement national efforts to provide food security. Mr. Chairman, In our efforts to achieve the MDGs, the incidence of poverty in India declined from 36% in 1993-94 to 27.5% in 2004-05. We are also making determined efforts on the question of reducing the proportion of people who suffer from hunger.

We are also cognizant of significant challenges that we face in the area of nutrition, especially child nutrition. Even today, 46% of children below three years of age are severely underweight, while a large proportion women and children are anemic. India has been feeding 17% of the world's population on less than 5% of the world's water and 3% of its arable land. Over a period of time, major efforts have been made to increase agricultural output, and ensure food security and self-sufficiency. As a result of such efforts, in the year 2008-09, food-grain production in India reached a record level of 231 million tonnes. This year too, we are expecting the same level of production. As you know, India is the world's second largest producer of both wheat and rice. India has taken a strategic initiative for augmenting production of food crops.

The National Food Security Mission aims at achieving 20 million tonnes of additional food-grain production by targeting high potential, but low productivity, regions in the country. Being well aware of the need for growth in both agriculture and the rural sector, especially inclusive growth, increased public investment, along with policy reforms for leveraging private sector participation, in the agriculture sector are being undertaken by the Government of India. Other major measures include large-scale action to build rural infrastructure, waive bank loans to small and marginal farmers, provide minimum guaranteed rural employment in a big way and enhance access to rural credit.

Moreover, to ensure remunerative returns to farmers, the minimum support price for various food-grains, which is set by the Government, has been increased for incentivising farmers to produce more food grains and for improving the terms of trade for farm sector. While agriculture supports about 58 % of our population, it contributes only about 17% of our GDP- thus, an average farmer earns much less as compared to the National per capita income. This fact is well recognized by us and the National Policy for Farmers formulated in 2007 lays a special emphasis on improving income of the farmers not only through improvement in crop yield levels but providing them a reasonable opportunity for employment in the non-farm sector. Already an Action Plan has been drawn up by us in this regard.

Moreover, to combat undernourishment, India operates the world's largest targeted Public Distribution System, as well as world's largest nutritional intervention programmes, 'Mid-day meal' programme for the school children and Integrated Child Development Scheme for pre school children, lactating and expectant mothers. Mr. Chairman, Clearly, food security is a global challenge. We must promote global cooperation, and a full implementation of the global partnership for development, so that the objectives of food security and food for all can be achieved.

Thank you.

737. Intervention by Acting Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjiv Singh Puri during negotiations on "Size of an Enlarged Council and Working Method of the Security Council".

New York, April 7, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for giving me the floor, and for recognizing that this is my first intervention during these negotiations. Also, permit me to congratulate you on your role as Chair of this process and to commend your skillful handling of this process.

We must be cognizant that the principal objectives in enlarging the council are to make it reflect contemporary geopolitical realities, improve its representativity, especially representation of developing countries which comprise the vast majority of UN membership, and reform its working methods, and thereby enhance its legitimacy and effectiveness.

The G-4 framework resolution proposes an enlarged council of 25 seats, with 11 permanent members and 14 non-permanent members. We believe this is the most optimal size of an enlarged council. The proposal for 25 seats would add 6 permanent members (Africa-2, Asia-2, LAC-1, West Europe and Other Group-1) and 4 new non-permanent members (Africa-1, Asia-1, EE-1, LAC-1). In terms of regional representation, size of population and consideration of representation, the proposed expansion would ensure that the realities of today's world are incorporated into the Security Council. Even with 25 members, the ratio of UNSC members to that of the UNGA will be lower than what the ratio was in 1945.

Naturally any reform process should make any institution more effective and efficient. We should not see a casual link between size and efficiency in an institution's working methods and its established rules of procedure. Therefore, whatever may be the size of an organization, unless the working methods are efficient, it is clear that the Council will not function in a better manner. In every sense, therefore, the question of size is relative to the Charter responsibilities and appropriate representativeness in that optimal size which, as we mentioned, the G-4 Framework Resolution contains. We are conscious that an enlarged Council must be effective and efficient. However, arbitrary or artificial limits to size will not assist us in finding a solution that will achieve our principal objectives.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me now turn to the issue of working methods.

Some delegations feel that issue of working methods should be left to the UNSC itself. Certainly, the UNSC should work towards improving its working methods, and we are happy that some steps have been taken - like the issue of UNSC Note No. S/2006/507 of July 19, 2006.

However, Article 24.1 stipulates that UNSC acts on behalf of the larger membership in discharging its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. Hence, the UNGA has a legitimate role in deliberating upon the working methods of the Council.

There must be greater transparency in the UNSC's work. Access to documentation and information is an issue of particular concern. The tendency of the UNSC holding closed meetings should also be curbed.

Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter must be fully implemented, by consulting with non-Security Council members on a regular basis, especially members with a special interest in the substantive matter under consideration by the Council. Non-members must be given systematic access to subordinate organs of the UNSC, including the right to participate.

Participation of Troop Contributing Countries in decision making of peacekeeping operations must be ensured, instead of mere proforma consultation. This should cover the establishment, conduct, review and termination of peacekeeping operations, including the extension and change of mandates, as well as for specific operational issues. Charter mandates in this regard remain unfulfilled.

Mr. Chairman,

Genuine reform in the working methods cannot be achieved without a comprehensive reform in the membership of the Council, with expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories. In this context, I should like to recall that one delegation this morning advised us to "put aside" expansion in permanent membership. In doing so, it became clear that the objective of that intervention was to press for expansion of the Council's membership - not a genuine reform of the Security Council. And this afternoon, a couple of distinguished delegates have also suggested expansion only in the elected category, i.e. non-permanent membership, once again shying away from real reform of the Council, while finding strange satisfaction in the current state of affairs in the UNSC, including in its working methods, leaving major regions without any effective voice and participation in the UNSC.

Let us recall that an expansion in only the non-permanent category was tried in 1965. And, it is clear that this did not even achieve reform of working methods. This was not for want of serious effort by the many who have served as non-permanent members over the years, seeking to discharge their fundamental responsibilities, but because, as is public knowledge, non-permanent members are not in the core of decision making in the UNSC. They also face difficulty in adjusting to the Council's working methods.

Real change and reform in the Security Council, the call for which is heard in an overwhelming manner at the UN, cannot come from merely expanding the number of non-permanent members. Only new permanent members, held accountable to the wider membership through review, would be truly effective. They also provide the necessary institutional memory to follow through and implement far reaching changes. New permanent members would also provide the necessary peer pressure through example.

It is, therefore, imperative that for real reform, also of work methods, there be a change in the composition of the Security Council by expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories.

I thank you Mr. Chairman.

738. Statement by the Acting Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri at the meeting of the Ad hoc Working Group on the Revitalization of the General Assembly.

New York, April 15, 2009.

Distinguished Co-Chairs,

We congratulate the two Co-Chairs [Ambassadors of Norway and Ecuador] for their appointment and express our readiness to work constructively in this process. We would also like to express our appreciation for the two previous Co-Chairs, the Ambassadors of Paraguay and Poland, who undertook a thorough examination of all aspects of this issue. I hope that the relatively thin attendance today is neither reflective of the lack of interest in this critical issue of revitalisation of the General Assembly nor that all is in order and no action needs to be taken. My delegation aligns itself with the statement made by the distinguished Chair of the Non-Aligned Movement.

Distinguished Co-Chairs,

Since the very beginning, India's position on the entire issue of revitalization of the General Assembly has been guided by its desire to have a more effective United Nations. India wants an organization that is truly responsive to the priorities and aspirations of the Member States, particularly for the developing countries, who constitute the vast majority of the membership. Its working methods must also embody efficiency. India believes that the General Assembly will only be empowered if its position as the chief deliberative, policy-making and representative organ of the United Nations is respected in letter and in spirit.

Indeed, the strengthening of procedures, working methods, documentation etc and ensuring due follow up are important steps in that direction. But more important is the need to continue the focus on substantive measures to restore and enhance the role and authority of the General Assembly in exercising control over legislation, material and manpower, and its role as the chief oversight organ of the UN. Being the voice of the international community, the General Assembly must have a greater say in the process of selection of the Secretary General. Though, several mechanisms have been proposed to put in place a more inclusive and transparent procedure for the appointment of the Secretary-General, consistent with Article 97 of the Charter, there is hardly any progress in this regard. The revitalization process also implies that the General Assembly take a lead in setting the global agenda and restore the centrality of the UN in this regard. The convening power of the United Nations must be used more decisively in this regard.

The fundamental disparity of authority between the Security Council and the General Assembly must be addressed. And, it is important that a truly representative body such as the General Assembly have a much greater say in the international economic and financial matters. The General Assembly's competence in areas such as the process of standard-setting and codification of international law must be scrupulously respected. The issue of maintaining a balance between the various principal organs of the UN, preventing encroachments upon the mandate of the General Assembly and of making the Security Council more accountable to it must also be addressed. This, in-fact, demands that the composition of the Security Council, especially in its permanent membership, be reflective of contemporary realities. Distinguished Co-Chairs, Before I end, let me re-emphasise the need to discuss substantive measures that would strengthen the role of General Assembly as the chief deliberative, legislative and policy-making and representative body of the international community. You can expect our constructive support and participation in your efforts.

Thank You

739. Intervention by Deputy Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri during negotiations on "Relations between the Security Council and the General Assembly".

New York, April 20, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for giving me the floor. Let me express our appreciation for your efforts in chairing this negotiation process.

Mr. Chairman,

The United Nations was established to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, ensure respect for international law and promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom. A General Assembly was created, where all Member-States would have a place. And, a Security Council with permanent and non-permanent members was set-up along with the ECOSOC, The Trusteeship Council, the International Court of Justice and a Secretariat. Of these, the UNSC is unique. Five UN Member-States, its permanent members, exercise a key role in its decision making. It also acts on behalf of the larger membership and has been conferred the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.

This concept of acting on behalf of all Members and the key role of the permanent members in reaching a decision in the UNSC must be central to the relationship between the UNSC and the UNGA. These demand that the composition of the UNSC, especially in its permanent membership, embodies contemporary reality. This is critical to ensure that its decisions carry both actual legitimacy and reflect accountability. The Council also needs to be transparent in its functioning.

A fundamental reform of the composition of the UNSC is, therefore, key not only to improve the functioning of the Council and the UN as a whole but also to improve the relationship between the UNSC and UNGA.

This must include expansion in both permanent and non-permanent membership, and address the under-representation of developing countries, which comprise the vast majority of UN membership. The uniqueness of the relationship between the UNSC and the UNGA is also evident from the Charter provisions. While Article 15.2 mandates the UNGA to receive and consider reports from all other UN organs, there is a specific Article viz. Article 15.1, which mandates reports from the UNSC, both annual reports and special reports. This is reiterated in Article 24.3. There have been efforts to improve the annual reporting from the UNSC to the UNGA.

Nevertheless, the annual report largely remains a compilation of events, with a bland listing of meetings and outcome documents. An analytical content to the report for better informing the Member-States the underpinning of the Council's decisions is lacking.

This is perhaps reflective of the fact that the UNSC remains insufficiently representative, its working methods remain non-inclusive, and its activities remain extremely opaque. The mandate of special reports has almost been forgotten by the UNSC.

The issues of working methods reform, particularly access by non-members to documentation and the work of the UNSC; genuine consultations with TCCs; and the right of participation of non-members with a special interest, are also crucial to improving relationship between the UNSC and the UNGA. In addition, the issue of UNSC's Charter mandate is relevant to today's discussions.

The Council should remain focused on its mandate and not try to re-define 'threats to international peace and security'. Such efforts only serve to encroach upon and undermine other principal organs, especially the General Assembly. This should not be the case at all.

Mr. Chairman,

It is unrealistic that changes in the issues that I have highlighted can be made without a genuine reform of the membership of the Council. Such reform, with built-in review, cannot come from merely expanding the number of non-permanent members. Earlier in the day, some delegations attempted to artificially summarize areas of agreement. But, ironically, these same delegations refuse to acknowledge that the overwhelming majority are for expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories. I agree with the delegations that were clear that the key issue is expansion of the Council. And, in this let us hear the voice of the overwhelming majority.

Thank you

740. Statement by Member of the Indian Delegation Ms. Ranjana Gupta at the 8th session of the UN Forum on Forests on Forests in a Changing Environment: [A] Forests and Climate Change; [B] Reversing the loss of Forests Cover, Preventing Forests Degrading in all types of forests and combating desertification, including low forests cover countries; and [C] Forests and Biodiversity Conservation including protected areas.

New York, April 21, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Sustainable Forest Management (SFM) is a broader term used to refer to a management paradigm which focuses on ecological, sociological and economic principles in tandem. The National Forest Policy, 1988 and the forestry management practices in India are based on the principles of Sustainable Forest Management. The progress made by the country towards achieving the four Global Objectives on Forests and the implementation of the NLBI has already been elaborated. However, in the context of climate change and REDD India has been in favour of an umbrella approach comprising different policy options, approaches and activities including conservation, sustainable management of forests (SMF), and increase in forest cover. India favours a comprehensive REDD mechanism, and seeks financial incentives of compensation for enhancement of carbon stock as a consequence of following the policy options of conservation and sustainable management of forests (SMF). In COP 13, India used the term Sustainable Management of Forests (SMF) and the term got incorporated in the Bali Action Plan and COP decision on REDD (decision 2.CP/13). For the purpose of REDD, SMF can be understood as improvement in existing cover and increase in forest / tree cover (FTC), i.e.,  $(\text{harvest} < \text{increment}) = \text{net addition}$ . SMF includes maintenance as well as increment of forest carbon stocks by means of improvement in the quality of existing stocks and expression in forest area with activities like afforestation and reforestation (AR).

Government of India is promoting Afforestation & Reforestation (A&R) projects under Clean Development Mechanism (CDM) of the Kyoto Protocol. Upto February, 2009 the National CDM Authority has accorded Host Country Approval to 9 eligible projects under CDM A&R. It is understood that these projects are under validation and are likely to apply for registration with CDM Executive Board in due course, and thereby generate Carbon Credits. Climate Change Division of Ministry of Environment & Forests is presently also involved in Capacity building of CDM A&R in three States namely Jammu & Kashmir, Madhya Pradesh and Jharkhand in collaboration with GTZ. It is proposed to add 5-6 more States shortly under this programme for which GTZ has agreed in principle.

Regarding reversing the loss of forest cover, preventing forest degradation in all types of forests, combating desertification, Forests and biodiversity conservation including protected areas; adequate policy and legal provisions exist. Indian Forest Act, Forest Conservation Act, Wildlife (Protection) Act are for the effective conservation of Forests & wildlife resources in the country. India has a National Forestry Action Plan & National Wildlife Action Plan (2002-16), which gives policy direction for the management of the Forestry & wildlife sector. As stipulated in the legislation and Action Plans, establishment of Reserved Forests & Protected Areas (PAs) form the core of India's conservation strategy. India has national Schemes and Programmes for strengthening the effective management of Forests & wildlife resources. India's national Protected Area covers around 4.8 % of country's geographical area. India currently has 99 National Parks, 515 Wildlife Sanctuaries, 43 Conservation Reserves and 4 Community Reserves. Besides there are 37 Tiger Reserves and 26 Elephant Reserves. India has established a National Wildlife Crime Control Bureau in 2007 to combat illegal trade in wildlife and its derivatives.

The National Biodiversity Action Plan has been prepared within the broad framework of National Environment Policy & National Forest Policy. In pursuance to the CBD, India had enacted the Biological Diversity Act in 2002 following a widespread consultative process. The Act gives effect to the provisions of the CBD. It also addresses access to biological resources and associated traditional knowledge to ensure equitable sharing of benefits arising out of their use to the country and its people, thereby contributing to achieving the third objective of the CBD.

The UNFF can play a key role in creating complementarities among the forest-related conventions and relevant forest organizations, bodies and processes for the better use of resources, expertise, less likelihood of overlaps of duplication of efforts, better communication and dissemination of information.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

741. Statement by Acting Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri at the open consultations on Strengthening Government of Operational Activities for Development on the UN System for Enhanced System-Wide Coherence.

New York, April 24, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

We would like to thank you for organising informal consultations on the "Strengthening governance of operational activities for development of the UN system for enhanced system wide coherence paper. Our thanks also to the Deputy Secretary-General.

At this stage we do not propose going into the details but would like to assure you of the willingness of our delegation to constructively engage in this process.

My delegation associates itself with the statement of the Joint Coordination Committee of G-77 and NAM.

Mr. Chairman,

India's basic position is guided by the fact that the UN's operational activities for development must meet the needs and aspirations of developing countries. They, i.e. developing countries, must be the primary drivers and national ownership and leadership be a real fact in UN's development programmes.

And, the best way to ensure national ownership is to truly plug into national development plans steering clear of any conditionality based "from us to you" approach, which is common among major MFIs, and which has resulted in even the largest players on the money and finance side admitting to stigmas being attached to their actions. In this context it is extremely important to remember the high legitimacy of UN development representatives in their host countries. This should not be compromised in any manner, especially by involving them in activities that have intrusive connotations.

Mr. Chairman,

Elimination of duplication, overlapping and fragmentation, are laudable objectives in themselves, but we should be vary of confusing this with complimentarily. The UN, which is neither a Bank nor a Fund, has provided a home to several new ideas and acted as a crucible for several of these development thoughts. This richness in diversity must not be lost sight-off in our endeavours for strengthening coherence and coordination.

Developing countries are varied and have differing requirements. This demands that we eschew a "one size fits all" approach. We must also clearly recognise the criticality of funding, especially its adequacy, and, of course, predictability. And, here, sad to say, we are woefully inadequate as far as the response is concerned.

Mr. Chairman,

We welcome any move that would strengthen GA and ECOSOC's supervision over the entirety of UN Development Operations and find it difficult to accept that we as Member-States are not sufficiently coherent. The idea of a small Advisory Board that could provide an effective input may appear to be a sound one but in examining it we must remember that some years back the size of ECOSOC was increased as a larger body provides greater legitimacy and there are demands all around for universalization of governing bodies.

We must also be careful that creation of new bureaucratic structures should not simply add further layers in the search for further coherence. Coherence of UN agencies, in any case, must not undermine policy space and policy flexibilities of developing countries, which are required in accordance with their national priorities and circumstances. The key test is not how coherently or unified the UN entities are in carrying out their activities but how effectively they are able to deliver to developing countries in implementing their, i.e. the developing countries, nationally determined plans.

Thank you.

742. Extempore Remarks by Chief Economic Adviser of the Government of India Dr. Arvind Virmani at the Special high-level meeting of the Economic and Social Council with the Bretton Woods institutions, the World Trade Organization and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development.

New York, April 27, 2009.

Madam President,

Let me start briefly by noting some of the implications of the financial crisis which are by now well accepted facts, which have been pointed out today. The current global crisis is the worst since the Great Depression i.e. it is broad-based and affects all elements of the global system, including goods and services, trade financial flows of every dimension, FDI, equity, debt and issues of migration and flows of people. Now as a consequence, the relative importance of each of these differs across the countries, giving rise to different mix of impact. The needed response is, therefore, different for each country or region. This highlights the need for flexibility in important action that several earlier speakers have pointed out.

Secondly, again the world recognized, the crisis has originated in the developed countries and in particular the financial sector. What this means is that as a consequence there has been a negative effect on the critical but intangible drivers of growth what is variously referred to as confidence, sentiment or expectation. Therefore, financial sector stabilization and macro-economic rebalancing is critical to restoring and sustaining confidence and positive sentiment.

Thirdly, again as well recognized now, the crisis has been transmitted rapidly to the developing countries and is likely to increase poverty and deprivation in these countries. Consequently, better understanding of the links between these shocks and the impacts will help in devising region and country-specific solutions of the kind that many earlier speakers have talked about.

Fortunately, the need for urgent global coordinated action has been recognized as indicated by some of the decisions taken at the G-20 Summit. From all these, the agreement to expand the resources of the IMF and the ADB and to bring forward quota reviews in the IMF and the increase in agreement to increase FDIs. As noted earlier, this will increase flows by $ 1.1 trillion. However, besides the physical resource flows, it is very important to recognize that this will help developing countries that need assistance and restore confidence in emerging markets. That is linked to the issue of confidence that I have pointed out earlier, which will affect private flows and private investment, which played a very important role in the last six years.

Third point I would make is that, which has not been so widely mentioned, is that the move towards a stronger regulation, which was an improved supervision, is absolutely essential to avoid repetition of these crisis in future, as noted by the UN report. The leaders have discussed and agreed on broad direction for improvement in regulatory and supervisory structures for the world financial system. But implementing these will take a considerable amount of time. Further, they will be carried out by the Financial Stability Forum and the Basal Committee on Banking Supervision, the two key standard-setting bodies, broadening representation in these bodies has, therefore, been a very important improvement from earlier times with a very restricted and limited to the rich developed countries.

Finally, I note that the wide spectrums of initiatives taken by the World Bank is, as the speaker from World Bank also noted, I think is encouraging because of the flexibility and the open- mindedness with which the World Bank has approached these issues.

Thank you.

743. Intervention by Joint Secretary Ministry of Environment and Forests Rajneesh Dube, during "General comments on the Chair's draft negotiating text", at the plenary of the 17th Session of the Commission on Sustainable Development.

New York, May 4, 2009.

Madam Chairperson,

At the outset, please accept my delegation's congratulations on your election as Chairperson of the CSD 17. We are confident that under your able guidance, the Commission will successfully complete its work. We also wish to associate with the statement made by the Representative of Sudan on behalf of the G-77.

Madam Chairperson,

The text on Rural Development should recognize that there is a need to move towards a rights-based framework to secure entitlements of the rural poor to basic needs.

Climate change has emerged as a major issue in sustainable development. Negotiations on climate change must respect the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities to achieve an ambitious and equitable outcome. India has launched a National Action Plan on Climate Change, which is a major initiative involving eight national thematic missions.

Madam Chairperson,

Robust agricultural growth requires greater investment in the agriculture sector, consistent with the national agriculture and land use policies. Enhanced agricultural productivity coupled with scientific use of post harvest technologies needs to be linked to an equitable multilateral trading system which promotes greater market access for the agricultural exports of the developing countries. It will ensure that agriculturists, landless labourers and marginal sections of rural communities in the developing world do not fall below the poverty line.

Madam Chairperson,

Critical, innovative technologies in the areas of agriculture and combating drought and desertification have remained out of the reach of developing countries largely due to the existing IPR regime. We need to make tangible progress in the CSD 17 towards evolving a new paradigm shift that balances rewards for the innovator with the imperatives of sustainable development.

Capacity building is a key imperative for developing countries. India has been, and will continue to be, honoured to be associated with South-South cooperation initiatives for capacity building for participatory and community development approach, and with providing technical services for developing scientific programmes.

Madam Chairperson,

The declining trend of ODA is a serious cause for concern to the developing countries, particularly in view of the current economic downturn and needs to be immediately reversed. We urge the CSD to facilitate the transfer of new and additional resources to mitigate the adverse impact of food, fuel and financial crisis being faced by the developing world.

Our engagement with the draft outcome document will be guided by these perspectives. We look forward to a constructive and meaningful Session.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.

744. Statement by Minister of State for Environment and Forests Namo Narain Meena at the Round Table on Responding to Food Crisis through Sustainable Development during the high level segment of the 17th session of the Commission on Sustainable Development.

New York, May 13, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Ensuring food security for its citizens has been a focus of India's development efforts. We have, among other measures, improved both agricultural output as well as productivity. An example of our success is that India is the world's second largest producer of both wheat and rice. However, our land and water resources are under considerable strain. Despite accounting for only 2.4 per cent of the world's geographical area and 4 per cent of global water resources, India supports about 17 per cent of the world's human population.

This problem is expected to intensify, with increasing food grain demand and falling per capita water availability. India's policies and programmes are, therefore, oriented towards sustainable agricultural practices and sustainable development.

India's National Action Plan on Climate Change includes a National Mission on Sustainable Agriculture as a key component.

We have launched a National Food Security Mission, which aims at a substantial increase in production of rice, wheat and pulses. A national agriculture development scheme has a primary focus on incentivizing local governments to increase the share of agriculture in their development plans.

Other measures aim at integrated rural development, including improving the economic well being of farmers, avoiding diversion of agricultural land for other purposes, appropriate land-use planning, promotion of bio-fertilizer, crop diversification, micro irrigation systems, and judicious use of organic, soil nutrients and chemical fertilizers. In addition, we are actively promoting integrated management of land and water resources through watershed development programmes and holistic development of rainfed areas. Local government participation has been particularly successful in these efforts.

Mr. Chairman,

Sustainable development, however, cannot be addressed without addressing poverty, especially in developing countries, where millions depend for their livelihoods primarily on the natural resource base of their immediate environment. Poverty eradication measures must, therefore, be the centrepiece of national development efforts, as well as of the international agenda. Growth and development in developing countries is key. The ongoing financial and economic crisis must not be an excuse to dilute ODA and other commitments, or to institute protectionist measures in any form. Development cannot be halted or sacrificed in the search for solutions to the crisis.

Mr. Chairman,

A major challenge before all of us is that of climate change. Ongoing negotiations under the UNFCCC must ensure that the development imperatives of developing countries are fully taken into account, with the outcome being ambitious and equitable. The outcome must fully respect the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities in letter and spirit. High agricultural subsidies in developed countries must be significantly reduced if not eliminated. The international community must actively facilitate development and transfer of technology to developing countries in a cost-effective manner. Collaborative R & D between the developed and the developing countries needs to be promoted in particular. The existing IPR regime must also be revisited in a way that ensures a balance between reward for innovators with a common good of humankind.

Before concluding, Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize the importance of South-South cooperation. India is very happy to share its useful and wide-ranging experience in various fields with fellow developing countries.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

745. Statement by Minister of State for Environment and Forests Namo Narain Meena at the Round Table on realizing Green Revolution in Africa during the high level segment of the 17th session of the Commission on Sustainable Development.

New York, May 14, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

India is happy that a round table has been dedicated to a critical issue as far as Africa is concerned i.e. the issue of realizing a Green revolution in Africa. Despite the severe constraints faced, African countries have been making special efforts to achieve their development goals. It is critical that the international community provide concrete assistance to these efforts through provision of greater financial resources, technology transfer and capacity building, particularly in the context of the current global financial scenario. We would like to emphasize the importance of institution building and capacity development, which lays the true foundation of sustained growth. There should be easier access for African countries to developed country markets. There must also be a focus on actions that add value to African exports. We also recognize the indigenous and traditional knowledge available in Africa, and stress the need to use such knowledge in development efforts.

Mr. Chairman,

India has been privileged to have contributed African development efforts as a partner in South-South cooperation. In this context, the establishment of the India-Africa Forum Summit last year deserves a special mention. Let me reiterate our Prime Minister's commitment that "it is our intention to become a close partner in Africa's resurgence".

Our Prime Minister also announced a series of important and new initiatives at the summit that are aimed at strengthening our existing partnership with Africa. These include the Duty Free Tariff Preferential Scheme for the 50 least developed countries, 34 of whom are in Africa. This scheme will cover 94% of India's total tariff lines and, more importantly provide preferential market access on tariff lines for 92.5% of the global exports. Most of the products covered by these tariff lines will be agro-products. India will offer credit lines worth US$ 5.4 billion dollars over the next five years to African countries, apart from grants worth US$ 500 million. The number of scholarships to African students is also being doubled. Focus areas of cooperation include creating regional and pan-African institutions of higher education, particularly in science, IT and vocational education, infrastructure and industrial development, well as investing in R&D in renewable energy and agricultural development. India already has an active cooperation programme with our African partners in the agriculture sector. This includes capacity building programmes such as vocational training in agriculture and agro-processing sectors including cashew nut, coconut, coir, fisheries, and training of African agricultural scientists at various levels. A number of public/private partnership projects in the agricultural sector have been promoted and developed. Indian investors have also played an active role in Africa's agricultural sector. Mr. Chairman, Efforts by fellow developing countries cannot replace the need for actions by the developed countries. We hope that CSD 17 would spur greater efforts towards implementation of their commitments. On our part, India will continue working with countries in Africa in realizing their national development goals.

Thank you.

746. Statement by Secretary Ministry of Environment and Forests Vijai Sharma at the Round Table on Integrated Management of Land and Water Resources for sustainable agriculture and rural development during the high level segment of the 17th session of the Commission on Sustainable Development.

New York, May 14, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Land and water are closely interwoven into the matrix of rural livelihoods.

India accounts for about 2.4 per cent of the world's geographical area and 4 per cent of global water resources, but supports about 17 per cent of the world's human population and more than 15 per cent of the livestock. The need for providing food and water for the growing population while sustaining the natural resource base has emerged as one of the main challenges for India in the 21st century.

Growing water scarcity, frequent occurrence of drought as well as degraded soils that suffer from nutrient depletion, low organic carbon, salinity, water logging, toxicity build-up, development of hard pan and loss of fertile top soil through erosion, apart from poor rural infrastructure are significant challenges in meeting the Millennium Development Goals of sustainable development and reducing hunger. This situation is further compounded by climate change.

Against this background, India has been taking a variety of measures. India is developing an index-based weather insurance instrument to provide increased support to small and marginal farmers.

In order to provide early warning, a number of national agencies are working closely with each other to monitor agricultural drought once every two weeks on a real time basis during the main crop seasons in India.

Sixty percent of India's arable land is rain-fed, with variable rain patterns involving long dry spells. Thus, to augment groundwater supplies and to enhance rainwater use efficiency, India is implementing an Integrated Watershed Management Programme in mission mode.

The watershed programmes are used as an entry point activity for converging livelihood programs in the watersheds through a holistic systems approach. Our long experience with various watershed management programmes show that these are an effective strategy for addressing the problems of rain-fed areas in an integrated manner, as well as an engine for inclusive growth and poverty alleviation. It may be noted that the average cost-benefit ratio of the watershed programmes in the country is 1:2, with an internal rate of return of 27%.

Some of the approaches adopted in the programmes include rainwater harvesting and conservation, increasing crop productivity, integrated nutrient management, diversification of crops and cropping systems, micro-enterprises to benefit women and vulnerable groups, and diversification of livelihood options.

There is also a high-level inter-ministerial National Rainfed Area Authority to address all aspects of sustainable and holistic development of rainfed areas, by converging and synergizing numerous ongoing programmes.

Moving away from a stand-alone project approach to a programmatic approach to combating land degradation, India has formulated in collaboration with the Global Environment Facility and the World Bank a Sustainable Land and Ecosystem Management (SLEM) Country Partnership Programme.

India has recently launched under the National Action Plan on Climate Change, a National Mission for a "Green India" under which six million hectares of degraded forest land would be afforested by 2018. This would be one of the largest afforestation programmes in the world.

Mr. Chairman,

"Broad based and inclusive growth" is the main strategy of India's developmental planning. This involves targeted interventions aimed at assisting the poor and the vulnerable.

We are also adopting institutional and policy mechanisms, particularly by adopting participatory approaches for sustainable management of natural resources, such as joint forest management initiative, farmer participatory action research programs for water management, participatory integrated watershed development, and participatory irrigation management in irrigated areas. These aim to build the social and institutional capital, particularly in rural areas, for sustainable management of natural resources. These significant strides made by India notwithstanding, there still remains a long way to be traversed in view of the enormity of the task.

Thank you.

747. Statement by Deputy Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri at the open consultations on 'Strengthening the System-wide Funding Architecture of development activities of the UN for Development.'

New York, May 19, 2009.

Mr. Chairman, Thank you for organising these informal consultations on the "Strengthening the system wide funding architecture of development activities of the United Nations for Development." Let me also thank the Deputy Secretary General for her presence. At this stage, we do not propose going into the details but would like to assure you that we will be constructively engaged in this process. It is also of critical importance to look at the issue of financing along with governance. India, of course, associates itself with the statement of the Joint Coordination Committee of G-77 and NAM.

Mr. Chairman,

These consultations are taking place during exceptional times when we are faced with the gravest economic and financial crisis since the inception of the present international monetary and financial institutions. Developing countries, though hardly responsible, are its worst victims. While even before this crisis, the key issue also for MDG attainment was quantity of financing available, the requirement for enhanced

ODA is all the more critical now when developing countries are facing an increased curtailing of capital flows. Quantity, Mr. Chairman, therefore, remains the most important issue regarding financing for development, including the UN's development activities. Moreover, developing countries must be the drivers and national ownership and leadership must be a real fact in the UN's development programmes, which must be directed towards the needs and aspirations of developing countries. By their universal and voluntary nature, the UN operational activities for development are best suited to truly plug into national development plans steering clear of any conditionality based "from us to you" approach which is common among major MFIs. Therefore, exploring ways and means to enhance core, predictable, timely and without conditionalities funding for the UN is critical to achieving the objective of making the UN deliver coherently, relevantly and effectively. Unfortunately, during 2002-07, the annual growth in ODA contributions channeled via the UN slowed from the previous decadal annual rate of 9.9% to 5.6% while the growth in bilateral ODA grew 6.1%. Moreover, the share of core funding in some of the key UN funds and programmes has come down from around 80% to 30% in the fifteen years since 1991. This continuous decline in core resources as a proportion of total resources provided through the UN and the preference for other multilateral and bilateral routes, which invariably have more conditionalities, is a matter of much concern.

The increasing imbalance between core-and non-core resources while adversely affecting effectiveness and coherence of UN Development Cooperation, is also detrimental to the normative, analytic and research capabilities of the UN entities in the long-term. It also pressurises the funds, programmes and agencies to re-orient their activities towards those that attract funding, which invariably means following donor agendas. In this context, let me underscore the need for credibility among developing countries. We are discussing the credibility among donor countries, but more important is the credibility among the recipient countries. Mr. Chairman, The recommendations in this paper to increase resources flows, including providing minimum of 50% of system wide contributions as core/regular funding, channelizing at least 50% of system-wide non-core extra budgetary resources to thematic funds linked to strategic plans of UN entities and through innovative mechanisms to increase voluntary funding are timely and pertinent. Though not addressed in the present paper, the fact remains that the development pillar of the UN has been sidelined in terms of budgetary allocations in the last 10 years. Available statistics indicate that the total budgetary allocation for development pillar has gone down from 22.2% in 1997-98 to 17.8% in the 2008-09. The development pillar remains the top priority for an overwhelming majority of Member States and is a necessary condition for durable peace and security. Funding architecture with or without structural reforms needs to be strengthened to really strengthen the development pillar.

Mr. Chairman, before I conclude, let me reiterate that in pursuing the effectiveness of UN development efforts the diverse needs and different stages of development of Member States must not be overlooked. Indeed, no one-size-fits-all. Moreover, national ownership, priorities and leadership must remain the key drivers of the UN development programmes. Thank you.

748. Statement by Joint Secretary and Financial Advisor in the Department of Economic Affairs of the Ministry of Finance Deena Dayalan at the annual session of the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board.

New York, May 26, 2009.

Mr. President and distinguished delegates,

Let me congratulate Ms. Helen Clark on her appointment as UNDP Administrator. We hope the UNDP would further broaden its engagement in carrying out operational activities for development under her leadership. Let me also congratulate you and other board members for guiding the UNDP Board. We look forward to working constructively with you and other members of the board during the course of this meeting and for the rest of the year. My delegation associates itself with the G-77 Statement.

The Meeting of this Board is being held in exceptional times when we are faced with the gravest and deepest economic and financial crisis since the inception of the present international monetary and financial institutions. Developing countries, though hardly responsible, are its worst victims. While even before this crisis, the key issue also for MDG attainment was quantity of financing available, the requirement for enhanced ODA is all the more critical now when developing countries are facing an increased curtailing of capital flows. We hope that the UNDP operational activities on the ground will not be undermined due to reasons of non-availability of funds.

Mr. President,

UNDP, being the largest UN Programme for the operational activities of development, has the major responsibility to ensure that the operational activities are aligned firmly with the priorities of the National Government and on principles of national ownership and leadership. It must ensure effective cooperation and coordination with other UN agencies, which is critical for efficiency and effectiveness of UN operational activities for development.

UNDP must also continue to focus on its key priority areas, particularly on poverty reduction. The analysis of the Annual Report indicates that despite earlier recommendation for paying specific focus to poverty reduction efforts, the progress has not been as desired. The allocation of USD 1.26 bn out of total allocation of USD 4.7 bn needs to be increased further and this particular focus area must be given due priority and attention. UNDP's direct support to poverty reduction programmes, both at macro and micro levels, depending on the needs of host government are of particular interest to developing countries.

India supports and encourages UNDP to continue with its efforts towards capacity building, and achieving gender equality and empowerment of women. UNDP needs to systematically increase mainstreaming of South-South cooperation while carrying out its mandated tasks.

Mr. President,

India contributes annually USD 4.5 mn to regular resources (core) of UNDP besides providing support to the local office and is one of the largest contributors to its regular budget among the developing countries. Besides, India makes a substantive contribution to South-South cooperation efforts.

In India, though UNDP's contribution of around US $ 190-250 million for a period of 5 years (2008-12) is nominal, Government of India appreciates this particularly in areas of capacity building, programme implementation and pilot programmes in green-field activities.

Thank you.

749. Intervention by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri during the informal plenary meeting: Exchange 1 of the Second Round of Negotiations on the question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the membership of the Security Council and Related matters at the 63rd session of the UN General Assembly.

New York, May 26, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for giving me the floor.

As I am speaking for the first time in this forum, so ably presided over by you, I would like to begin by appreciating your skillful efforts in conducting these negotiations through a very comprehensive first round. I would also like to thank you for your overview of the first round of the negotiations.

Your efforts deserve both the appreciation and gratitude of the members of this forum. Anyone who is entrusted the task of guiding a process that seeks real change, that seeks to forge ahead despite a few who secretly desire just the opposite, is bound to elicit both bouquets and brickbats. This is not new, and only serves to confirm that at last, we are perhaps inching towards genuine negotiations, rather than the endless process of statements in the Open-Ended Working Group. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, let me reiterate our unflinching support for your tireless efforts

There are some amongst us who would like you to merely replicate the OEWG process, or generate activity with the repetition of the same arguments of the first round, so that they can then claim that we are making progress. Any attempt to seriously move the process forward, or to attempt new approaches, is seen as a threat to their real and unstated desire to perpetuate the status quo.

If the status quo were representative, effective, responsive or fair, we could have lived with it. But as is clear to all, this is not the case, and the UNSC is in urgent need for reform. Hence, my delegation would urge you not to be disheartened in your efforts. Real change comes only when people rise above the ordinary, and do not get tempted to take the path of least resistance. We have the fullest confidence that you, Mr. Chairman, will persevere towards real change.

And this real change must involve greater representation for Africa on the UNSC, including in the permanent membership. It is, therefore, important that you carefully note the difference between the response of the African Group, and that of the others.

During the first round, the African Group, like most other delegations, had highlighted their preference for an expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories. They had also reiterated other demands of the Ezulwini consensus, including the right of veto for new permanent members. Their primary concern with the overview, as eloquently stressed by many African countries, is the preeminence the overview gives to the intermediate approach. Naturally, they do not want the way forward to proceed in a direction that goes against the expressed desire of the overwhelming majority. Thus, their suggestions appear to suggest a constructive approach, with the objective of fully incorporating the African position in the overview.

On the other hand, a few countries have focused on criticizing your efforts from a completely negative perspective. All they can suggest instead is to repeat the practices and procedures of the past, knowing fully well that this will not take the process forward. We must reject such notions outright. We are also surprised at the vituperative attack on your efforts as a facilitator on the grounds that yours is a limited mandate, etc.

Clearly, such concerns did not deter those delegations that now adopt a critical attitude from warmly welcoming the facilitators' reports in the past, when such reports appeared to argue more explicitly for an intermediate approach despite the overwhelming support for an expansion in both categories. Even last Friday, one delegation of that group was trying to argue in support of such an approach. We must avoid such cherry-picking. My delegation appeals for consistency in our responses. Without this, mutual trust, so often quoted by some as indispensable, cannot exist. At this juncture, Mr. Chairman, let me clarify that we, too, are neither entirely comfortable nor entirely satisfied with the overview. Our preference would have been for an overview that conveyed clearly the 'sense of the house' during the first round of negotiations, particularly with regard to identifying the issues that enjoy support from the overwhelming majority of Member States.

As one African delegation correctly argued last Friday, a proposal that enjoys the support of 53 countries cannot be placed at the same level as that supported by one country. In the same vein, the proposal for expansion in permanent and non-permanent membership, which enjoys overwhelming support, should have been explicitly highlighted. Nevertheless, we stand ready and will engage constructively in this process and will work with the overview presented by you which constitutes a good starting point for the second round of negotiations. If necessary, this could be expanded to include proposals that might not have been included. It would also be useful to quantify the support each proposal enjoyed in the first round. Based on this, we would recommend that we now intensify our efforts, and move towards an outcome that inter alia includes proposals that enjoy wide support, including expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories, improvement in working methods of the Council and on the relationship between the Council and the General Assembly.

Let me now turn to the issue of the review.

At the outset, allow me to also emphasize that we do not believe that the review should be looked at only in the context of the intermediate approach. As the G-4 proposal indicates, we see a review process in the context of an expansion in both permanent and non-permanent membership, as well as other reforms that we may agree to.

India has steadfastly emphasized the importance of the UNSC reflecting contemporary world realities. This is crucial also to ensuring its legitimacy, credibility and effectiveness. In fact, the fundamental basis and motivation for our work is that the UNSC continues to reflect the world of 1945, rather than the world of today. It is, therefore, crucial that we institute a robust process of review of the UNSC as part of the reforms that we undertake. Moreover, such a review must be mandatory. Article 109 of the UN Charter visualized a General Conference to review the Charter within 10 years after its adoption. This never materialized. We believe that a strong review mechanism would also go a long way to allay the fears of some delegations against locking out further reform.

Against this background, we would propose a review after 15 years from the date of entry into force of the amendments. This should be comprehensive, looking at all aspects of the UNSC. In this context, we would also look favourably at the concept of periodic reviews, say every 15 years. This would ensure that the UNSC continues to reflect realities as prevalent. We would be willing to engage in discussions on the concept of challenge to permanent members provided the bar for such a challenge is commensurate with and not less than the bar for permanent membership of the UNSC. In the spirit of interactivity, allow me also to respond to some of the comments made during the debate.

One phrase used repeatedly by a small group is flexibility. They reiterate how they have been flexible whilst no one else has demonstrated such flexibility. Let me respond briefly. In reality, the flexibility they espouse is anchored on one real position i.e. there should be no new permanent members. It is important to understand this, and once we look at their proposals from this perspective, it is abundantly clear that far from showing any flexibility, they have not moved an iota. Let us, therefore, be wary and not get carried away by repeated assertions of flexibility.

Before concluding, permit me also to refer to a reference made by one delegation on the reasons for his country not joining the L.69 Group. Whilst I am not personally aware of any invitation having been extended, naturally each country is free to join, or not, any grouping. I am both reassured and delighted to note the importance the L.69 Group evokes.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

750. Statement by Joint Secretary and Financial Advisor in the Department of Economic Affairs of the Ministry of Finance M. Deena Dayalan at the annual session of the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board.

New York, May 27, 2009.

Mr. President,

We congratulate you and other members of the Bureau for successfully providing directions to the functioning of the UNFPA. We look forward to working constructively with you and the other members of the Board during the course of this meeting and for rest of the year. We also thank the Executive Director for her introductory remarks and the statement.

Let me also express our appreciation for the efforts of UNFPA towards accelerating progress and national ownership of the programme of action of the International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD). India welcomes the focus on population and development, reproductive health and rights and gender equality. India strongly supports UNFPA's consistent support to the national programmes, particularly those aimed at realization of the MDGs.

Mr. President,

This meeting is being held in exceptional times when we are faced with a global financial and economic crisis that is seriously affecting developing countries. We hope that the UNFPA would not be constrained by inadequate funding, which could seriously undermine its efforts in implementing the strategic plan 2008-11. We, therefore, strongly support the UNFPA's advocacy of the donors commitment to meet the target of 0.7% of gross national income for ODA and 0.15 to 0.2% to the LDCs.

We support the proposal to extend the strategic plan till 2013 as per the recommendation 62/208 of the last Triennial Comprehensive Policy Review (TCPR). We expect that with the latest reorganization, UNFPA will be better equipped to handle the challenges ahead and effectively manage its country operations.

While we are happy to note that the UNFPA has been able to augment its total resources during 2004-2008 from USD 494 mn to USD 795 mn, the overall decline of regular resources in % centage terms from around 65% to 54% is a cause for concern.

The analysis of the international population assistance efforts by major donors during the 2006-2009 period indicates that within the total funding of US $ 10.6 billion, the share of UN System of US $ 127 million is just around 1%. The UNFPA must therefore, redouble its efforts to attract voluntary funding, particularly for its regular resources.

We are concerned that though there has been an increase in flow of financial resources for the International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) programme of action, the investments in health systems of the developing countries has lagged behind. As highlighted in Executive Director's report, funding for family planning has decreased dramatically, which is critical element of reproductive health, particularly for reducing maternal mortality. We are afraid that in absence of adequate investments, the gains made so far will be reversed.

Mr. President,

The Government of India is appreciative of the work being undertaken by UNFPA in India. The contribution of UNFPA as reflected in its country programmes has grown from US $ 46.40 Million under the Country Plan-1(1974-79) to US $ 65 Million under Country Plan-7 (2008-2012). The Country Plan-7 as approved by Government of India, includes US $ 60 Million from regular resources and another US $ 5 Million from Other Resources. While this is but a small part of the total funds proposed to be invested by India in its Reproductive and Child Health Programme Phase-II, the strength of UNFPA lies in its partnership, technical support and the access to global best practices that it brings to our national efforts. We welcome UNFPA's role in addressing the skewed sex ratio in the country through a variety of advocacy and action oriented interventions.

Government of India appreciates the decision of UNFPA, to join the pool financing along with the World Bank and the DFID in support of the Reproductive And Child Health Programme by contributing US $ 65 Million from the CP-7 resources. The resultant sector-wide approach will, we hope, assist Government of India to expedite attainment of the MDGs and at the same time enhance the scope of participation of the UNFPA in the related programmes of the country.

In conclusion, GOI appreciates the UNFPA's contributions in India and around the world. We hope that the UNFPA's will redouble its efforts to have access to enhanced funding and effective implementation of the Strategic Plan, including timely annual reviews of country programmes, which would be helpful in realizing the MDG targets.

Thank you Mr. President.

751. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri at the Ad-hoc Working Group on the Revitalization of the UN General Assembly.

New York, June 5, 2009.

Distinguished Co-Chairs,

I am taking the floor for the first time in this Working Group. Permit me, therefore, to begin by expressing my sincere appreciation for your efforts for these comprehensive discussions in an open, inclusive and transparent manner. Your work plan, which we are now following, forms a useful basis to focus on specific issues for achieving tangible results. Let me also reiterate that we will be constructively engaged in this process.

Distinguished Co-Chairs,

The topics for today's meetings cover a large gamut of important issues relating to the role of the General Assembly. Our considered view is that role of the General Assembly as the chief deliberative, legislative, policy-making and representative body of the international community needs to be strengthened and that we need to take up substantive issues in this Working Group. Obviously, visibility and outreach of the General Assembly are important too. While concrete proposals in this regard should be considered, we believe that real visibility of the General Assembly can only be generated if the Assembly takes important decisions or contributes meaningfully to important decisions. A critical issue in this regard is the appointment of the Secretary-General.

As we are all aware, the mandate for the appointment of the UN Secretary-General flows from Article 97 of the UN Charter. This inter alia states that "The Secretary General shall be appointed by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council". Clearly, this Article envisages a role for both the General Assembly as well as the Security Council. The modalities of the appointment process have, however, come to be governed by para 4(d) of Resolution 11(1) of 24 January 1946. This states that "It would be desirable for the Security Council to proffer one candidate only for the consideration of the General Assembly, and for debate on the nomination in the General Assembly to be avoided. Both nomination and appointment should be discussed at private meetings, and a vote in either the Security Council or the General Assembly, if taken, should be by secret ballot." It is important to emphasize that these restrictions arise from a General Assembly resolution, rather than a Security Council resolution, and certainly not from Charter provisions.

Further, the tone of the para is recommendatory, rather than mandatory. It would appear strange that while we all promote the principles of transparency and an inclusive selection process, the General Assembly willingly agreed to impose such restrictions on its own Charter mandate. The reason for Resolution 11(1) was the context of the post-1945 world, where it was preferable that the cold-war adversaries agree on a common candidate before putting forward the name. And these concerns were not unfounded. Let us recall that in 1950, the Security Council informed the General Assembly about its inability to agree on a recommendation on the appointment of a Secretary-General, upon which the General Assembly decided to extend the tenure of the first Secretary-General Trygve Lie by three years. However, more than sixty years since the adoption of Resolution 11(1), we live in a different world. While the Security Council itself must change to reflect contemporary realities and expand its membership in both permanent and non-permanent categories, the General Assembly cannot remain bound by self-imposed restrictions reflecting an era gone by. We believe that the General Assembly, being the voice of the international community, must fully exercise its Charter role in the process of selection of the Secretary General. A more inclusive and interactive selection process would also enhance the authority and effectiveness of the Secretary-General, as well as increase the confidence of all Member States in the Secretary-General.

And the need for changes in the process of appointment of the Secretary-General has been recognized by all Member States for some time now. General Assembly resolution 51/241 of 22 August 1997 and 60/286 of 9 October 2006 outline in detail proposals on improving this process. These proposals include making full use of the Charter provisions on the GA's power of appointment; due regard to regional rotation and gender equality; the possibility of the President of the General Assembly consulting with Member States to identify potential candidates endorsed by a Member State; encouraging formal presentation of candidatures for the position of Secretary-General in a manner that allows sufficient time for interaction with Member States; and requesting candidates to present their views to all States members of the General Assembly. Clearly, what is required is the necessary political will to implement these changes.

Many additional suggestions have also been made, including amending Resolution 11(1) to permit a panel of names; formulating more detailed guidelines and criteria for selection of the Secretary-General; as well greater exchange of views and dialogue with all candidates during the selection process. These deserve to be given serious consideration. Only with real changes can we ensure that the General Assembly exercises its judgement in the matter of the appointment of the Secretary-General, rather than merely rubber stamping proposals by the Security Council while ensuring that the appointment process does not become a divisive issue between the General Assembly and the Security Council. Indeed, as envisaged in the Charter, this is a process that involves both these organs and needs to be carried out in a collaborative exercise respecting each others mandate. The issue of timing of these changes is also important. Some argue that since the appointment of a new Secretary-General is not on the horizon, this issue does not need to be addressed with urgency. On the contrary, such a situation provides the right opportunity to address this issue impartially and objectively.

Thank you.

752. Intervention by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri during the informal Plenary meeting: Exchange 2 of the Second Round of negotiations on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and Related Matters at the 63rd session of the UN General Assembly.

New York, June 12, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Permit me to reiterate my delegation's support to your efforts in guiding this process of intergovernmental negotiations.

At the outset, I would like to emphasize the need to ensure that the second round does not end up being a mirror image of the first round.

In this regard, we appreciate your efforts to impart focus to the discussions, while not ignoring the sanctity of the proposals made by Member States. We hope you will continue with the determination to go for real progress, rather than take the path of least resistance by only repeating the past. In your endeavours, we would urge you to be guided by the objective of achieving genuine reform, rather than being cowed down by a small minority intent on blocking any progress. It is with the same goal that my delegation, despite some concerns that your overview did not quantify support for each proposal, engaged constructively and accepted your overview as a good starting point for the second round of negotiations.

Mr. Chairman,

During the discussions today and yesterday, a large number of delegations referred to the inevitability of reform. As students of history, our view is that in the instant case, this so-called inevitability is based not on fatalistic determination but on reform that is long overdue.

This is illustrated by the fact that the UNSC was set up for the world of 1945, and its only reform took place 45 years ago! This contrasts with a world order which has been transformed beyond recognition since 1945. A reorganization is definitely long overdue, hence inevitable.

The increasing dissatisfaction at the non-representative composition of the UNSC cannot but adversely affect its credibility - a consequence that we believe is underway. No one, however vociferous, can arrest the movement of history. There are a few who oppose real change, either by filibustering or attempting to put roadblocks. While they may succeed in slightly deferring the change that is inevitable, they do so at the cost of making the UNSC lose more credibility and effectiveness. Such actions also do a disservice to multilateralism.

Mr. Chairman,

As part of the work plan presented in the overview, today's discussions focus on composition of the UNSC. This provides an important opportunity to examine many of the core issues on UNSC reform in an integrated manner, including discussion on their interlinkages.

During the first round of negotiations, it was clear that an overwhelming majority spoke in support of the need to expand the UNSC in both permanent and non-permanent category. If the negotiations are to make genuine progress, we need to move ahead with this option. Thus, our discussions from now on should focus on the option outlined in para 14(b)(i) of the overview viz. enlargement in both categories of membership - permanent and non-permanent two year seats. Let me reiterate that there can be no real reform without an expansion in both membership categories.

We have in the past tried the option of an expansion only in the non-permanent category - it has not worked. It is only with new permanent members that the UNSC can truly reflect contemporary world realities, and thereby enhance the credibility, legitimacy and representativity of the UNSC. Further, only new permanent members, with their institutional memory and permanent presence, can ensure a real change in the power structure of the UNSC, and ensure its accountability to the membership at large. Needless to add, genuine improvement in the working methods will also remain a mirage without these changes.

Mr. Chairman,

As regards the size of the UNSC expansion, we continue to believe that an expanded UNSC of 25 seats, with 11 permanent and 14 non-permanent members, remains the most optimal option. The geographic regional distribution of these would be the following - of the 6 new permanent members, 2 each would be from Asia and Africa, while 1 each would be from Latin America and WEOG. The 4 additional non-permanent seats would be distribute equally amongst Africa, Asia, Eastern Europe and Latin America.

Such an expansion would provide the appropriate balance between the need for greater representation, including addressing the under-representation of developing countries, and the need to ensure that the UNSC does not become unwieldy. Let me assure everyone, Mr. Chairman, that India is acutely conscious of the need for the UNSC to be efficient and effective. The UNSC has the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. It is in our collective interest that this body is able to discharge its functions effectively, in real-time. Our proposal would also permit the UNSC to reflect contemporary realities, a key requirement for enhancing legitimacy and credibility. We would, therefore, propose that negotiations focus on options 14(a)(ii) and 14(c)(i).

Of course, it is also possible to consider rotation of non-permanent seats across geographical regions in order to ensure that some member of a particular recognized cross-regional group like SIDS, LDCs or LLDCs is always serving as a UNSC Member. Such a system is already in place informally between the Asian and African Group. We also must not forget the requirement in Article 24(2) of the UN Charter that in the election of members to the UNSC, due regard should be specially paid, in the first instance to the contribution to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the UN.

Let me also highlight that once elected, each member of the UNSC is expected to represent the interests of the entire membership. It is this that provides legitimacy to the actions of the UNSC. Of course, each member is free to be sensitive to the interests of any regional group that it belongs to. However, we must keep in mind that the membership of the UNSC, as indeed of the UN itself, is composed of nation states.

Mr. Chairman,

You have attempted to identify negotiables under the various options. In the light of our discussions, we need to be more focussed. We would, therefore, recommend that following this round, we take up the proposals that enjoy the maximum support. Detailed discussions should then be conducted on the various possible negotiables under each option. This would permit moving towards an outcome that includes proposals enjoying wide support, inter alia expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories, and improvement in the working methods of the UNSC.

Before concluding, Mr. Chairman, let me comment that I was particularly struck by the growing inconsistencies in the statements of some of those who want to stand in the way of history. They loudly proclaim that they support Africa and other under-represented groups. Yet their actions oppose the core demand of Africa of an expansion in both permanent and non permanent categories.

They insist that they have shown flexibility, while in reality their core position to see no new permanent members remains unchanged.

They have no hesitation to state that the first round demonstrated support for the intermediate approach, and even call for tabulating support. But they remain at the forefront to block any attempt to genuinely quantify support for any proposal.

Listening to this welter of inconsistency, I am left wondering whose game this group is playing. Are they speaking for those who seek to maintain the inequitable status quo, or those whose cause they claim to champion, or just giving expression to their own insecurities.

Thank you.

753. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri at the General Assembly Plenary meeting on Implementation of the Declaration of Commitment on HIV/AIDS and the Political Declaration on HIV/AIDS.

New York. June 16, 2009.

Mr. President,

I would like to thank you for convening the plenary meeting on HIV/AIDS. This stocktaking is timely and pertinent and deserves to be fully utilized for reviewing the progress made so far and reinforcing the commitment of the international community towards combating the global HIV/AIDS pandemic. Coming as it does at a time when the world is confronted with a severe economic and financial crisis, it is of critical importance to ensure that the global efforts, particularly international financial and donor commitments, are further strengthened to reduce and reverse the incidence of HIV/AIDS. Otherwise, we risk reversing the gains made so far and there will be opportunity costs for the future. We must work together at the inter-governmental level towards enhancing governance and coherence in global institutions with a view to exploiting their synergies and promotion of international solidarity.

The UNAIDS has played a major role in enabling Member States put effective coordination and implementation mechanisms at the country level. However, developing countries are at the margins when it comes to playing a meaningful role in UNAIDS governance. This has led to a situation when the developing countries have not been able to get the resources channeled in accordance with their needs. At times, Member States have not been able to utilize grants by the Global Fund. With the new partnership of UNAIDS with the Global Fund, a mechanism must be put in place which ensures the Global Fund's accountability to multilateral framework.

There is need for UNAIDS to ensure that there is progressive strengthening of the developing countries role in strategic resource planning, country presence, grant disbursement, implementation and Monitoring and Evaluation. In terms of functioning, it must reflect the democratic and broad-based nature of the UN itself. This would be helpful in strengthening the sense of ownership among developing countries and also increase the effectiveness of the Programme.

Mr. President,

The HIV/AIDS pandemic and its response encompass several cross-cutting sectors and policy issues ranging from political, social, economic, human resources, trade, investments to IPRs. Developments in any of these areas have invariably an impact on the effectiveness of global, regional and national responses. Therefore, it is important that related policy initiatives and developments are formulated and implemented keeping in mind the overarching objective of fight against HIV/AIDS.

A holistic approach that includes effective prevention strategies and access to low-cost affordable treatment for all is essential to effectively combating this pandemic. This not only requires mobilization of additional resources, but also their efficient utilization. Despite concerted national and international efforts, only 30% of those who need anti-retrovirals are receiving the drugs according to UNSG's report and shortfalls are expected to continue.

Mr. President,

India is uniquely positioned as a source of low priced and effective generic retro-virals, which could fill this critical gap. Our companies and research have produced triple anti-retroviral as well as paediatric formulations that make life far easier for patients. India is also at the forefront of global efforts to develop a vaccine against HIV/AIDS. Unfortunately, there have been certain developments in the recent past, which are counter-productive to global efforts for providing affordable treatment for all and also undermine the public health dimension of the TRIPS Agreement.

During the last few months, several consignments of generic drugs of Indian companies have been seized in transit by the Dutch customs authorities including a shipment of Indian-made antiretroviral drug for HIV/AIDS treatment bound for Nigeria on grounds of alleged violations of domestic patents and trademarks. These generic drugs in question were perfectly IP legitimate generic drugs in both India and the destination countries. Several developing countries, NGOs and UN agencies including WHO and UNITAID have expressed their concern at these developments.

Mr. President,

Government of India attaches the highest importance to protection and enforcement of IPRs in accordance with the TRIPS Agreement. However, it does not see the Agreement as divorced from the Objectives and Principles as set out in its Article 7 and 8 and definitely does not support efforts to enshrine new, maximalist TRIPS plus provisions in other forums. The action of the Netherlands customs authorities to seize generic drugs, traded between developing countries in full conformity with international disciplines, runs counter to the spirit of the TRIPS Agreement, the resolution 2002/31 of the Commission on Human Rights on the right to enjoy the highest standards of physical and mental health and also the GA Resolution 60/262 on Political Declaration on HIV/AIDS. It is pertinent to recall that the TRIPS agreement as amended at Doha in 2001 allows "compulsory licensing" powers to the 'national governments' in case of drugs meant to fight endemic diseases. While we have taken up the matter bilaterally as well as in the WTO, it raises a key question whether developing countries, even abiding by international agreed commitments, do not have the right to have access to affordable medicines for their citizens?

Mr. President,

India recognizes that political commitment is essential to combat HIV/AIDS. Our National Council on AIDS is chaired by the Prime Minister and the State Councils by the Chief Ministers. This political commitment at the highest levels has been critical in containing the epidemic. Under its direction, a multi-sectoral response is underway involving participation of the private sector, civil society and key government departments.

India has a low adult HIV prevalence of 0.36%. However, in absolute terms it is estimated that the HIV positive population is around 2.46 million and is the third largest in the world. Enormous efforts have been made to contain and roll-back this epidemic during the past decade. The HIV/AIDS policies and guidelines in India view this as a developmental problem rather than a mere public health issue. The Third National AIDS Control Programme is integrated with various development programmes like the National Rural Health Mission (NRHM), Reproductive and Child Health (RCH) programme and the Revised National Tuberculosis Control Programme (RNTCP). The focus of all these programmes is prevention of HIV transmission.

The National AIDS Control Programme in India is based on the premise that prevention is better than cure. It is committed to ensuring universal access to HIV AIDS prevention. 75% of the National AIDS control programme's budget is allocated to execution of Preventive services, particularly among groups with high risk behaviour such as commercial sex workers, injecting drug users, truckers and migrant labour.

Counselling and testing services, which started in a few centres in 2000, are now provided in nearly 5000 facilities and are provided free to all Indians. This scaling up of testing facilities has resulted in the detection of 1 million HIV infections. It is planned to further increase the number of tests by 300% in the next five years and bring it to 22 million annually by 2012.

The Government of India recognizes that the stigma and discrimination associated with the disease can be as bad as the physical suffering. A comprehensive communication strategy on HIV/AIDS developed by the Government addresses this issue along with the classical prevention aspects. Special attention is being given to youth and women, who are often the worst sufferers. An adolescent education programme covers more than 100,000 schools.

The efforts to promote an enabling environment and reduce societal discrimination of persons infected with HIV and their families are being made involving civil society, political leadership, grass root level workers, self help groups and others. A government policy document on gender equality and a law on AIDS are being finalized that will, among other things, address these issues.

In India the Government has actively involved civil society in the war against HIV/AIDS. As of 2006, 1080 NGOs and Community Based Organizations have been enlisted by the National AIDS Control Programme to deliver targeted interventions. Despite resource constraints and competing priorities, the Government remains committed to ensuring that no Indian dies of AIDS because of lack of treatment. Presently, around 200,000 of our citizens are currently being provided anti retroviral therapy and treatment for opportunistic infections. Blood monitoring services to determine when HIV positive persons might require treatment also provided free. We are also trying to make available second line drugs.

Mr. President,

We have come a long way since we committed ourselves to goals related to the HIV/AIDS pandemic. In the moving words of one of our leaders, HIV is "a most deadly scourge, a disease that is not a medical or a scientific subject alone but a poignant social issue as well". India is fully committed to effectively responding to the HIV/AIDS pandemic in a multi-pronged, multi-sectoral and multi-dimensional way.

Thank you.

754. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on the Report of the Secretary - General on the Peace-building Fund.

New York, June 17, 2009.

Mr. President,

I have the honour to introduce, on behalf of the co-facilitators Sweden and India, and other sponsors, a draft resolution on the United Nations Peace-building Fund, as contained in document A/63/L.72.

I should like to mention also, since the draft resolution was tabled before the Assembly, the following countries have also become co-sponsors: Belgium, Benin, Brazil, Czech Republic, Egypt, France, Germany, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Netherlands, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Republic of Korea, Slovakia, Spain and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The resolution before you is the outcome of a longer process. That process began with an informal process to identify the essence of the views of interested Member States on the operation of the Peace-building Fund and its relationship with the Peace-building Commission. These discussions built upon a mandated assessment of the Fund by an independent evaluation, the response of the management to this evaluation, and a useful assessment of the Fund by the Advisory Group of the PBF.

The views expressed on this basis by Member States were then distilled into a non-paper that was to serve as an input for the draft report of the Secretary-General on the Peace-building Fund, and its terms of reference. The subsequent report of the Secretary-General then put forward a revised set of terms of reference for the operation of the Peace-building Fund. That became the point of departure for the draft UNGA resolution that we are to adopt today.

Since it is on the basis of these informal consultations that we have not only worked with the Secretariat to revise the terms of reference for the Peace-building Fund, but also to bring it to the implementation stage, it is only fitting that on behalf of Sweden and India, I extend our sincere appreciation to all delegations for the constructive spirit in which the consultations took place.

Mr. President,

The purpose of this entire exercise was to ensure that the revision of the terms of reference for the Peace-building Fund would help improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the Fund. The intention is that the Fund should be able to expeditiously provide short-term emergency funding to create quick-wins in the early stage of peace consolidation. Equally, it should be able to provide catalytic funding to help address the causes of conflict over the medium term. The revised terms of reference will contribute towards this end, along with continuing efforts to improve the management structures of the Fund.

The spirit of the revised terms of reference is as important as the text. It is important, therefore, to recall that the revision of the terms of reference was guided by two broad objectives. The first was to enhance the Fund's capacity to serve as a flexible, responsive and focused resource for peace-building support, including through rationalizing and simplifying the structure and architecture. The second objective was to enhance and maximize the synergy between the Peace-building Commission and the Fund through provisions for enhanced transparency and consultation. The relationship with the Peace-building Commission, and all donors, needs to be managed creatively, so as to utilize synergies in existing peace-building strategies.

The terms of reference would be implemented through updated policies and guidelines that would address management and administrative issues. The Peace-building Support Office should develop these guidance documents in close cooperation with the UNDP, as the Fund's administrative agent, as well as other relevant United Nations organizations, and the Advisory Group. Management processes should be transparent to ensure continued support from Member States and other stakeholders.

Mr. President,

The Secretary-General will submit an annual report to the General Assembly on the operation and activities of the Fund. At the sixty-sixth session, this report will include the findings and recommendations from the next comprehensive independent evaluation. Similarly, the Peace-building Support Office will also organize regular briefings on the performance of the Fund with Member States. An annual meeting is aimed at providing all stakeholders with the opportunity for a thorough review of Fund performance, results and emerging lessons. The annual event will also provide an opportunity to regularly replenish the Fund. We look forward to such regular interactions as a means to ensure maximum transparency and participation of Member States in the peace-building process.

Mr. President,

On behalf of the co-facilitators and the sponsors, I sincerely hope that the procedural draft resolution contained in document A/63/L72 can be adopted by consensus. We are grateful for the support of all delegations in this regard.

Thank you Mr. President

755. Intervention by the Joint Secretary (Energy Security) in the Ministry of External Affairs Sanjay Verma during the Interactive Thematic Dialogue on "Energy Efficiency, Energy Conservation and New and Renewable Sources of Energy" at the 63rd session of the UN General Assembly.

New York, June 18, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Over the last few years, India has achieved a growth rate of over 9%. While this has reduced somewhat following the economic crisis, India needs to maintain a growth rate of about 8 percent over the next 25 years to eradicate poverty and meet its human development agenda. Energy is critical to these efforts. India's per capita consumption of energy is amongst the lowest in the world, and a third of the world average. Further, we are also conscious of the need for energy efficiency, and have taken various national measures in this regard, including a national Energy Conservation Act in 2001. Energy efficiency across all sectors of the economy is essential to enable decoupling of energy supply growth from economic growth, while ensuring that energy service demands are met. In this regard, let me highlight that India's energy intensity of 0.18 kg of oil equivalent-kgoe- per dollar of GDP expressed in purchasing parity terms is actually lower than the OECD average 0.19 kgoe/GDP-PPP. India, however, remains an energy deficit country, importing nearly three-fourths of its crude oil. Accordingly, India's energy policy aims to supplement, complement, substitute and eventually replace fossil fuel-liquid, gaseous and coal, in that order. We have achieved some success in this regard. Grid power from renewables stands at over 14000 MW, accounting for about 9% of the installed capacity of the country. Of this 14000 MW, nearly 70% is contributed by wind.

India is developing and deploying renewable energy systems / devices through voluntary measures, without any targets, as per our national priorities and circumstances. India aims to facilitate development of indigenously designed, developed and manufactured new and renewable energy products and services that are reliable, convenient, safe, efficient and affordable and which are at par or even excel international standards, specifications, performance parameters and are lower in cost. The major drivers for deployment of new and renewable energy in India are poverty alleviation, economic development and energy security. However, our renewable energy programme also has a positive contribution towards making the environment clean. We have embarked on this despite our low GHG emissions profile.

To illustrate, India's GHG emissions in 1994 were 1228 million tonne of CO<sub>2</sub> equivalent, which is less than 3% of the global GHG emissions. In per capita terms, it is one-fourth the global average, one twenty-fifth the US average or one-tenth the EU average. India attaches great importance to the ongoing UNFCCC climate change negotiations. It is vital that these negotiations remain under the UNFCCC mechanism and its Kyoto Protocol, and not be held through partnerships outside these processes. The prescription of de-carbonization targets by such partnerships may ultimately adversely impact on the energy mix of the member countries. We therefore would like to stress that the choice of energy mix needs to be left to the member countries in line with their national priorities. Emergence of a consensus on this vital global issue under the UNFCCC mechanism is required to redress and contain the climate change problem. The Clean Development Mechanism has been used as an instrument to assist developing countries and reduce emissions of developed countries. A number of CDM projects have been hosted in India. However, India is concerned about the CDM mechanism not being up to the expectations in terms of revenue and technology inflows, especially for renewable energy, for which both technology and cost reduction are of immense importance. India has always articulated its concerns regarding the fair and equitable treatment for the developing countries while discussing the issue of sharing the GHG mitigation burden. India has also emphasized the need for placing clean technologies under public domain for their effective transfer to developing countries. In this context the TRIPS Agreement requires a judicious balance between rights of the creators and the societal concerns at large. Just like the treatment of public health concerns under the TRIPS Agreement, new and renewable energy technologies should also be made available at reduced costs to the developing countries.

As regards technology transfer pertaining to new and renewable energy technologies, the following are key:

The development of renewable energy technologies requires a concerted global action through joint research, design and development, so as to reduce high developmental costs and provide a conducive policy framework to encourage mainstreaming of renewable energy. Developed countries need to closely involve the developing countries to jointly develop new and renewable energy technologies, products and services that would eventually make their deployment cost-competitive.

Developed countries need to play a proactive role in facilitating transfer of new and renewable energy technologies to developing countries by reducing technical and licensing costs in the short term with a cap at 0.7 percent of turnover and eventually rolling back of these costs to zero percent.

Developed countries should provide access to researchers and technologists from developing countries to their research institutions. New and renewable energy technologies, products and services to be treated as non-commercial goods and services. Existing new and renewable energy technologies to be placed in public domain.

Mr. Chairman,

Our meeting today is significant in our attempts to consider the energy issues, particularly new and renewable energies. We look forward to these deliberations contributing constructively towards our future efforts. Thank you.

756. Intervention by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, during the Informal Plenary Meeting: Exchange 3 of the Second Round of Negotiations on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and Related Matters at the 63rd Session of the UN General Assembly.

New York, June 22, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me begin by reiterating my delegation's support to your efforts. We urge you to continue to remain steadfast in guiding this process toward real reform. During my last intervention I had commented on the inevitability of reform, and the futility of arresting the movement of history.

Let me reiterate that attempts to merely make cosmetic changes, limit our efforts to actions that we know will not succeed, or block progress altogether through procedural manoeuvrings, are doomed to fail against the inevitability of a reform that is long overdue. I urge those that seek to follow this unenlightened path to rise above their own self-interest and insecurities and join the overwhelming majority in the greater good for all of humanity.

Mr. Chairman,

The issue of the veto, including the extension of veto to new permanent members, has come up repeatedly during our deliberations. As we all know, there is no reference to the veto as such in the Charter. It is only Article 27(3) that stipulates that UNSC decisions require the concurring votes of its permanent members. Separately, Articles 108 and 109(2) mandate ratification by permanent members for any amendment to the Charter to enter into effect.

Thus, once we have new permanent members, the requirement of their concurrence, or their right to veto as is commonly stated, is automatic.

The concept of extension of veto to new permanent members is actually misleading as Article 27(3) [and Articles 108 & 109] would have to be specifically amended if we have to deny the veto to new permanent members.

Our national position has been and remains that veto should be extended to new permanent members. This is predicated on the logical and principled position that there can be no discrimination within the same category of members of the Security Council.

Indeed, we believe that new permanent members should have the same responsibilities and obligations as the current permanent members. This principle is upheld by many other delegations.

However, we recognize that this is not as yet universally accepted. We have also heard concerns voiced by a large majority over the use of the veto. Such concerns have merit. Any objective analysis of the historical record of the use of the veto will demonstrate that its usage has more often not contributed to the credibility of the Security Council. In fact, in some instances, the use of the veto has manifestly led to the diminution of its credibility.

It was in deference to such concerns that in the G-4 proposal of 2005, we accepted that new permanent members should not exercise the right of veto until the question of the extension of the right of veto to new permanent members had been decided upon through a review.

Some have argued that new permanent members without veto rights will not make any difference to the functioning of the Council, and hence there should be no new permanent members. This is a disingenuous argument. In fact, the automatic corollary of the argument is that new permanent members must be given the veto right! I must emphasize that new permanent members, with their institutional memory and permanent presence, is imperative to genuine reform of the UNSC.

Interestingly, the same delegations that feel that permanent members without the veto will make no difference are happy to push the view that non-permanent members, who certainly will not have the veto, and will be there for shorter terms, will be able to deliver real reform! A large number of delegations have called for a variety of restrictions on the use of the veto. While we could discuss these in detail, we remain skeptical about the feasibility of implementing such restrictions. In fact, the best hope of implementing such restrictions lies in the force of example that new permanent members, accountable to the general membership through a review process, would bring.

Mr. Chairman

Let me now turn to the issue of the relationship between the UNSC and the UNGA. Both these bodies are Charter organs of the UN. And it is naturally important that relationships between Charter organs be effective and harmonious, in accordance with Charter provisions.

However, the importance of the relationship between the UNSC and the UNGA goes beyond this. Article 24(1) of the Charter contributes to making this particular relationship unique, by stipulating that in carrying out the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, the UNSC acts on behalf of all Member States.

The composition of the UNSC, where the permanent members exercise a key role in its decision making, also contributes to the singularity of this relationship. The reporting requirement of the UNSC to the UNGA further highlights the special relationship between these organs. While Article 15.2 mandates the UNGA to receive and consider reports from all other UN organs, a separate and specific Article viz. Article 15.1 requires the UNSC to report to the UNGA, both annually and through special reports. This requirement is underlined in Article Article 24.3. Nevertheless, it is the concept of acting on behalf of all Members and the key role of the permanent members in reaching a decision in the UNSC that are at the heart of the relationship between the UNSC and the UNGA.

It is therefore imperative that in order to improve and strengthen this relationship, the UNSC must reflect contemporary realities, particularly in its permanent membership. Only then can we address the problems of credibility and legitimacy of the UNSC, and ensure its accountability to the membership at large.

This reflection of contemporary realities is certainly not feasible without an expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories, and addressing the under-representation of developing countries.

Your overview, Mr. Chairman, has suggested options to enhance the relationship between the two bodies including through adherence to their respective mandates, enhanced reporting by the UNSC, and regular consultations between the UNSC and the UNGA. We certainly agree with all these. The UNSC's reporting, in particular, must be improved and made more analytical, instead of merely being a compilation of events as is often the case.

It is also vital that the UNSC adheres to its mandate, instead of trying to re-define 'threats to international peace and security'. Such efforts encroach upon and undermine other principal organs, particularly the UNGA. Desisting from doing so will assist in improving the relationship between these two organs.

Mr. Chairman,

I would add that an improvement in the working methods of the UNSC would also be crucial to enhancing the relationship between the UNSC and other bodies, including the UNGA. For instance, the shortcomings of the Council's reports to the UNGA are reflective of its insufficient representativeness and its non-inclusive working methods.

Let me also stress that since the UNSC acts on behalf of all Member States, the UNGA has a legitimate role in deliberating upon the working methods of the Council.

The options listed in the overview under working methods are all important. Better access for non-members of the UNSC; the need for transparency and consultation; rigorous implementation of Article 31 & 32 on the right of participation of non-members with a special interest in the substantive matter under consideration; and participation of Troop Contributing Countries in decision making of peacekeeping operations are all vital elements in improving the working methods of the UNSC. In this regard, we are happy that the S-5 Group has submitted an updated set of measures for improving the working methods of the UNSC. These deserve serious and careful consideration. However, that brings us back to the basic question - how do we ensure that all these worthy proposals to improve the working methods are implemented, instead of being left on paper. Recent experience of efforts to discuss our way into improvements of the working method of the Council have not generated commensurate results.

Exhortation will not produce the change we desire. Nor is it realistic to expect real changes by merely adding more non-permanent members. We tried this more than 40 years ago, and the fact that we are still discussing these issues speaks eloquently of the results, or lack thereof, of that effort.

That we did not succeed is not due to any lack of effort by many non-permanent members. But they were not, and have never been in the core of decision-making of the UNSC, especially with regard to its working methods. And their transient status has never permitted them to ensure real and lasting changes. It is evident that genuine reform in the working methods cannot be achieved without a comprehensive reform in the membership of the Council, with expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories. And this is the demand of a clear and overwhelming majority. Only new permanent members can be truly effective in securing such reform. They will provide the necessary institutional memory to follow through and implement far-reaching changes. They would also be accountable to the wider membership through a review. As mentioned, they will also provide the necessary peer pressure through example.

Mr. Chairman,

We have now had two rounds of negotiations, focusing on all elements of the reform process, individually and together. The overwhelming majority of Member States has unambiguously stated it wants to see real reform, with expansion in both permanent and non-permanent membership.

It is but natural that we should now focus on this option in the next round. While we are ready to discuss all options, we believe that this has already been done many times. Attempts to now focus on proposals that enjoy marginal support are not productive. They will only serve the benefit of those who wish to stand in the way of inevitability of change.

I hope you will take this into account so that the third round of negotiations will be focused and action oriented, concentrating on the proposals that enjoy the maximum support, perhaps through a negotiating text. Detailed discussions should then be conducted on the various possible negotiables under each option.

Thank you.

757. Statement by Minister of State for External Affairs Mrs. Preneet Kaur at the Plenary meeting of the United Conference on the World Financial and Economic Crisis and its Impact on Development.

New York, June 25, 2009.

Mr. President,

The United Nations provides a unique forum, with unparalleled legitimacy and inclusivity. This UN Conference on the World Financial and Economic Crisis and its Impact on Development is only the second such gathering held of the United Nations on the financial and economic system and architecture, the first being the UN Conference on the Monetary and Financial System held in Bretton Woods in 1944 with the participation of all the then 44 members of the UN. In that sense, this is a truly historic meeting. It is vitally important that this landmark event coupled with the UN's convening power is used to hear the voice of the entire global community on the extraordinary crisis being faced by the global economy today. Allow me, therefore, at the outset to express our appreciation for all your personal efforts in organizing this Conference.

Mr. President,

The global financial and economic crisis was the result of a failure of global regulatory and supervisory mechanisms, excessive speculation and excessive risk taking. This was further aggravated by global imbalances. There is now a general acceptance that the present economic and financial crisis is the worst recession since the Great Depression and the first ever contraction of global GDP in the post-War period. Given the magnitude of the crisis and the widespread meltdown, some have dubbed it the Great Recession.

Developing countries were not the cause of this crisis, but they are amongst its worst affected victims. Their exports have been hit and they are facing vastly reduced capital flows and foreign direct investment. The economic crisis coupled with the food and fuel crises of last year has slowed down their economic growth and casts an ominous shadow on eradication of poverty and achievement of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). The human dimension to this crisis is even more frightening with estimates of additional millions being pushed back into extreme poverty.

For governments in developing countries the loss in export earnings and remittances with adverse consequences on employment and growth has meant reduction in the fiscal space for investments in critical infrastructure and social sectors like education, health, etc. as much larger social safety nets have now to be financed. As Prime Minister of India, Dr. Manmohan Singh, had said at the G-20 London Summit: "While India will be able to manage, many other developing countries may not be in the same position and this is where the international community can help. We must ensure that countries hurt by the massive withdrawal of private capital that has taken place, ..... are able to rely upon an increased flow of resources from the international financial institutions. This will help these countries to maintain a higher level of demand than would otherwise be possible and thus help global revival".

Mr. President,

Any new thinking for a more sustainable global economic system has to be based on a conscious policy where there is a building up of the capacities of the poorer countries and regions to play a healthy and equitable role in tapping the potential of free market for their prosperity and advancement.

Specific responses to the financial and economic crisis must address both short-term needs, as well as the longer-term imperatives of reforming structures of global governance, including here at the UN and at the Bretton Woods Institutions (BWIs). These reforms need to redefine the role of institutions of global economic and financial governance to reflect contemporary realities of today while being rooted in pragmatism and collaboration. It is imperative that in key decisions and decision-making processes the voice and real participation of developing countries is substantially strengthened and increased.

The future shape of international governance, including of international financial institutions (IFIs) and the crafting of a new global financial architecture is, perhaps, the most far-reaching element of reform for providing global stability and security. At the UN, the General Assembly must be revitalized along with a real reform of the Security Council. We believe that this requires expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories of the Security Council and reform of its working methods. The present crisis has once again underscored the need for the Economic and Social Council to be robust and effective in coordinating global responses to global challenges for a better quality of life for the vast majority of humankind.

At the BWIs, the voice and quota reform needs to be accelerated so as to make these institutions both responsive and effective as well as credible and relevant in continuing to play vital roles in global economic affairs. Again, as my Prime Minister had said, "The world has changed greatly since the multilateral institutions were established and the role of these institutions needs to be redefined and their mandate suitably revised. The representation of the developing and emerging market countries in the decision making levels of these institutions also needs to be improved. Better representation is essential if the institutions are to have the legitimacy they need to play their role".

Mr. President,

Of immediate importance is the revival of the world economy. Counter-cyclical stimulus measures are, therefore, critical. There must be a substantial increase in lending by international financial institutions (IFIs) and the Multilateral Development Banks (MDBs) with increased limits for developing countries and emerging economies. The capacities of the MDBs to do so, including adequacy of their capital, requires to be urgently addressed.

There is a particular imperative to make good the decline that has taken place in capital flows to developing countries by increased multilateral and bilateral flows, including ODA. Increased resources for international financial institutions are very relevant but conditionalities associated with the use of these resources need to be softened, otherwise their deployment will be counter-productive in the countries affected.

Mr. President,

Measures to address the crisis should not create other problems for the future.

We need to address regulatory and systemic flaws. There should be better and transparent regulatory mechanism for capital markets, including the non-banking sector, redefine capital requirements to avoid pro-cyclicality, and avoid build-up of excessive leverage.

There should be a better system of surveillance and regulation. Surveillance should be even-handed with greater focus on the systemically important institutions. We also need to develop an effective early warning system to spot a build-up of risk. It is particularly important that in any such vulnerability assessment there is no intrusiveness.

In this context, it is particularly necessary that we should not permit protectionist tendencies, not just protectionism of trade in goods, but also protectionism in free flow of persons, protectionism in financial services as well as imposition of non-tariff barriers, to succeed in our response measures. Developing countries have limited policy space. They must continue to have this space to determine measures that best fit their specific requirements.

Mr. President,

Insofar as India is concerned, we have fared much better than others though we are also affected and our growth rates have come down from the nearly 9% average of the past four years to 6.7% in 2008-09. In response to the crisis, we have made aggressive use of fiscal and monetary policy, with particular focus on fiscal stimulus in infrastructure investment.

Our primary challenge is to get rid of chronic poverty, ignorance and disease, which still afflict millions and millions of our citizens. For this, we need a high rate of growth coupled with measures to make it inclusive. We have endeavored to achieve this through huge investments in the rural and farm sector, a massive rural employment guarantee scheme, infrastructure development projects, major national food security and rural health missions, and an urban renewal mission.

Mr. President,

Leaders of some of the largest economies, the G-20, have met twice in the past months and declared their determination to instill confidence and restore stability to the world economy. They have also pledged to strengthen regulation, reform international financial institutions, reject protectionism and build recovery. The package of US$ 1.1 trillion to restore credit and growth together with national measures constitutes a global plan for recovery on an unprecedented scale.

India has actively engaged in the G-20 framework aimed at redressing the current global economic situation so as to bring the global economy back to the trajectory of sustained growth.

The Commission of Experts appointed by you Mr. President that included the former Governor of the Reserve Bank of India, Dr Y V Reddy, has also made several recommendations that deserve serious consideration.

Mr. President,

We have a vested interest in the world economy doing well as that is a key enabler for our growth too. But as we strive for global solutions to this global crisis, we must remember that development or economic growth cannot be slowed, halted or sacrificed in the search for solutions to the crisis.

Thank you.

758. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on 'Thematic Debate on Peacekeeping' at the United Nations Security Council.

New York, June 29, 2009.

Mr. President,

Thank you for organizing this thematic debate. With over 100,000 peacekeepers, a US$ 8 billion budget and expanded mandates, Peacekeeping remains at the heart of the activities of the United Nations. India aligns itself with the statement by Morocco on behalf of NAM.

Mr. President,

India has been an active participant in peacekeeping since the word itself was invented in 1956. We have, over the past five decades, contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers to 40 UN operations. We continue to provide troops and policemen to the most difficult operations that the UN conducts. India sends these soldiers and policemen under the flag of the United Nations because it is steadfast in its commitment to the Charter of the United Nations, and because it believes in the principles for which the United Nations stands for.

Mr. President,

Let me put things in perspective with an example. Even as I speak to you, more than 5000 Indian soldiers and policemen are deployed in MONUC. They are the cutting edge in translating this Council's words into deeds. And, they do so in exceedingly challenging circumstances. I would also like to point out India is amongst the largest contributor of air assets to UN operations.

We have also, in a practical demonstration of our progressive record on gender issues, deployed an all-women Formed Police Unit in Liberia - the first and only such unit. We, therefore, bring to this table an unique combination of commitment to peacekeeping and of knowledge and of experience of peacekeeping of which we are very proud.

Mr. President,

The world of peacekeeping today is very different from what it was two decades ago. In 1986, one Under Secretary General, an ASG, 3 D-2 level officers and 3 professional officers with, a budget of approximately US$

240 million managed about 10,000 peacekeepers. The number of peacekeepers is now about 140,000; the budget for the present year is US$ 8 billion; and the Under Secretary General and his staff have become the DPKO, DFS and PBSO with the 1300 jobs being sought for peacekeeping on the support account last year.

Mr. President,

The talk of a crisis in peacekeeping has been present throughout this period of expansion and refuses to go away. Be that as it may, let us examine what the main elements of this crisis are.

In his statement to the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations made on January 23, 2009, the Under Secretary General for Peacekeeping, Mr Alain Le Roy highlighted a number of them. These include "sheer overstretch"; a "wide gap" between supply and demand for the numbers and types of personnel; and, the absence of critical enabling capacities such as air assets.

Mr. President,

It is a self-evident truth that there is no scarcity of the personnel and capacities of the type that the United Nations requires. There are enough troops, enough policemen, enough civilian experts, enough capacities and enough helicopters available to the international community. That is not the problem. The problem is that there is reluctance on the part of Member States to make these available to the United Nations.

We need to carefully examine the reasons behind this state of affairs and collectively take the steps that are required to rectify matters.

Mr. President,

A major issue that we all must tackle is the nature of the Security Council's mandates and the manner in which they are generated. Related to this is the question of whether the mandates have any correlation to the ability of the organization to deliver. Mandates are increasingly "robust" and place peacekeepers, most of whom come from Member States not represented in this Council, in non-permissive environments. They are faced with situations where they are more frequently being called upon to use force not just to defend but to enforce mandates. We fully endorse Under Secretary General Le Roy's statement that peacekeeping mandates have become too broad and too all encompassing. We also agree that the limits of "robust" peacekeeping are not properly defined.

For a country like India which has thousands of troops and policemen on the ground, the lack of clarity in mandates has practical repercussions. We have been receiving feedback from our personnel on the ground that questions of substantive interpretation of the mandates - with repercussions beyond the immediate - are often left to the judgment of mission personnel in the ground. This is a difficult situation, particularly for military officers, who operate best when there are unambiguous instructions and objectives. Unrealistic mandates have led to situations where mission personnel are forced to ask national contingents to undertake tasks and utilize COE in a manner that is inconsistent with the legal framework under which they are deployed.

We reiterate the Brahimi recommendation that mandates be clear and achievable. We also reiterate that this will not be possible without substantively involving countries who contribute manpower and resources to Peacekeeping Operations.

Consultations with and briefings for TCCs and PCCs do take place more frequently but they are pro forma in nature and skirt around substantive issues with little or no scope for meaningful discussion. The most recent change in the Rules of Engagement and Concept of Operations in case of MONUC was communicated to the TCCs after they had been notified by the Under Secretary General during a consultation meeting.

Mr. President

You will agree that being informed is not the same as being consulted.

This exemplifies the manner in which the spirit of UNSC Resolution 1353 is being systematically undermined and raises doubts about the seriousness of the Security Council about addressing the reasons behind the crisis.

Mr. President

We reiterate the imperative of involving TCCs and PCCs both early and fully in all aspects and stages of mission planning. This should include the stage of preparation and planning of the operation, in the monitoring and conduct of an operation, and finally, in the evaluation of an operation. This should feed into a process where the views of TCCs and PCCs feed into the generation of mandates. It is only by doing so that Article 44 of the Charter will be obeyed in letter and spirit.

Mr. President

The operating environment for Peacekeeping has changed. The conventional wisdom that Peacekeepers must be drawn from the ranks of the military is an idea whose time is past. India believes that the future of Peacekeeping, and at least a part of Peacebuilding, lies in the development of Police and Rule of Law capacities in UN missions.

The development of these capacities must be relevant to the situations where they are to be applied. India strongly believes that the most relevant capacities in this regard are present in Member States that have gone through successful post-colonial nation building exercises. The experience that these nations have in building and nurturing institutions, particularly those relating to the development of robust security mechanisms that operate in visible, open and democratic environments, need to be taken into account as the DPKO develops its capabilities in this area.

A peacekeeping operation is effective when it succeeds in enabling national capacities. Training national security personnel is a key determinant of success in this area. This issue, which is sometimes dealt with in the discourse on "Security Sector Reform" needs greater attention. My delegation is of the view that training capabilities need to be inbuilt in the Force Generation process by which contingents are raised.

Mr. President

My delegation believes that mission support is another area that requires sustained attention. One of the principal objectives behind the realignment of DPKO and creation of the DFS was the improvement of mission support. We reiterate, in the context of this realignment, the imperative requirement of unity of effort and the need to establish clear command and control structures, coherence in policy and strategy, effective coordination and integration, as well the preservation of unity of command from Headquarters to the field.

We would also like to draw your attention to the importance of a lean and efficient support operation. UN Peacekeeping Operations are essentially military operations. As a general principle we believe that the DFS needs to model itself on well run, simple and efficient military logistical operations.

Mr. President

We have taken note of the New Horizons report. We would like it be an exercise that takes a clear, hard look at where the DPKO and DFS require to focus. We have engaged with the DPKO on the study and are looking forward to continuing this engagement in a constructive manner during the process of generating the report. It is not, however, our impression that the product of this study will influence the manner in which the fundamental issues raised above are being addressed.

Mr. President,

The statement made on behalf of NAM raises a number of pertinent issues including the importance of developed countries sharing the burden of peacekeeping. NAM, which contributes 80% of UN Peacekeeping personnel, expects that its concerns inter alia including those relating to security of personnel, reimbursements and selection procedures will be taken into account in the deliberations amongst Member States.

Mr. President

I would also like to take this opportunity to salute the peacekeepers from India and from other nations who laid down their lives while serving in UN missions.

Mr. President,

In concluding, I reiterate India's commitment to work with the UN in the maintenance of international peace and security including through the mechanism of Peacekeeping. We further reiterate our commitment to participating in the process of strengthening Peacekeeping in order to increase its relevance and effectiveness. We will also, where we deem it necessary and relevant, be willing to consider the deployment the capacities that are required by Peacekeeping operations in the years to come.

We look forward to continuing our engagement with other stakeholders in this process.

Thank You.

759. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri in the Security Council on the Situation in Afghanistan.

New York, June 30, 2009.

Mr. President,

Thank you for scheduling today's debate on the situation in Afghanistan. This is of immediate and abiding interest for India, as a close neighbour and civilizational partner of Afghanistan. Mr President, India welcomes the positive perspective reflected in the UNSG's report and the briefing by SRSR Eide regarding the three interlinked strategic shifts in Afghanistan. For India, the litmus test of cost-effective investment in assistance programmes is to ensure that these are aligned closely with Afghan priorities, and that they contribute to capacity-building. We endorse the UNSG's exhortation to the international community to maintain its broad and multinational presence. This is indeed not the time to reduce our efforts, but to enhance them in a coordinated manner. This has been our consistent position, even in the dark days of the attack on our Embassy in Kabul last July. The UNSG's report is a clear riposte to the voices questioning the utility of our collective effort. In response, we must stand behind the "civilian surge" and the expansion of Afghan capacity, both in word and deed. That implies strongly supporting priority areas identified by our Afghan partners, including agriculture, energy, private sector development, and capacity-building. JCMB XI took useful decisions in this regard. We must also support the expansion of the UN presence-undertaken at our collective exhortation-financially and administratively.

At the same time, organizational difficulties and political debates notwithstanding, the second national and Presidential election since 2001 should be more of a cause for satisfaction. We recognize that there are calls for to ensure that the elections are free and fair. Naturally, elections need a level playing field. But let us recognize that vibrant political debate is itself a hopeful sign. Energetic debates do not always imply the unravelling of the political process. We need also to be mindful that too much external advice often acts conversely and undermines domestic institutions. From all these standpoints, the moment has come for us to more vocally recognize and support growing Afghan capacities. Too much time has been spent berating Afghan actors for various failings, instead of placing them in the correct perspective: establishing a modern government after decades of war, displacement and privation was never going to be an easy task. We must no longer continue to miss the woods for the trees.

Mr. President,

On the negative side, the security situation remains deeply worrying. It does not take much foresight to predict that the coming six months will be difficult, most of all, for the Afghan people. Assymmetric warfare and complex terrorist attacks are being mounted and the well-springs that sustain such terror show no signs of being drained. We need to ponder deeply over how best this can be achieved. In this context, we continue to have reservations regarding the language used in UN reports to describe terrorist attacks. Surely such operations are not being mounted by "anti-government elements" or "insurgents". We welcome the progress recorded by the Afghan National Army, especially as the expansion of ANA capacity is the only viable guarantee of a successful conclusion to military engagement in Afghanistan. We note with appreciation the efforts being made by third countries to strengthen ANA capacities. Mr President, This brings me to reconciliation. While this is often a corollary of military strategies, in Afghanistan, this is a matter that requires great caution. Successive reports of the UNSG, and resolutions here and in the UNGA, have underscored that this should be an Afghan-led process, within the parameters of the Constitution of the land. It has also been reiterated that this must be pursued from a position of strength. We must consider if we are at this juncture as yet.

Reconciliation requires strategic clarity, unity of purpose, and due recognition of the nature of those with we seek to reconcile with. Without consensus amongst relevant parties over key issues, such as reconciliation with whom and how, we may well be dividing ourselves; not those we seek to "peel away" from terrorist groups. It is for this reason that we must go beyond unworkable divisions between "good" and "bad" Taliban. We have equally to be mindful that in pursuing these distinctions we are projecting impressions of weakness, desparation or a defeatist mentality.

Mr. President,

I should like to reaffirm our unswerving commitment to helping our Afghan partners to the fullest extent of our capabilities. Stabilizing Afghanistan is not only integrally connected with our own security, it is also connected to the civilizational legacy of our friendship. That is why attacks upon our people and symbols of our friendship only serve to outrage us and redouble our commitment to Afghanistan. Our commitment to Afghanistan has now crossed US $ 1.2 billion. It includes the widest range of activities; from a cold storage plant in Kandahar to a power transmission line to Kabul. We are building the Parliament Building, while simultaneously targeting community based local projects that provide quick peace dividends, such as schools and hospitals. In all of this, capacity-building is a core element. It is in support of this core task that India has expanded the current allocation of 1000 seats in our institutions for capacity-building and scholarship programmes by 35%.

Turning to the regional aspect, Mr. President, stabilization of Afghanistan must be a central part of regional processes, if it is to regain its role as the crossroads of South, West and Central Asia. This includes regional economic processes, such as SAARC and the Regional Economic Cooperation Conference on Afghanistan. These benefit the entire region. Hindering these processes affects Afghanistan, and the region as well. We must expand, rather than hinder, trade, transit and transport ties, including overland transit and trade. That is the best way of bringing the regional dimension into play in a positive manner.

Mr. President,

In conclusion, we note the UNSG's commitment to provide us with benchmarks of progress in his next report. It is a good step especially if these are result-based rather than timeline based. We look forward to participating in the discussion on these benchmarks, with the full ownership of the Government of Afghanistan.

I thank you Mr. President.

760. Statement by First Secretary (Economics) Ms. K. Nandini at the Permanent Mission at the UN in Geneva at the General Debate of the Coordination Segment of the 2009 Substantive Session of the Economic and Social Council.

Geneva, July 10, 2009.

Mr. President,

The current format of the coordination segment, where this segment follows-up on the Ministerial Declaration of the previous year, with particular focus on the role of the UN system in implementing the Declaration, has proved to be quite successful. This format ensures that our deliberations in the high-level segment do not remain a one-time event, and that there is an appropriate follow-up mechanism. In this context, we are happy to participate in today's discussions on the implementation of the 2008 Ministerial Declaration, which took up the issue of sustainable development. My delegation would like to thank the UN Secretariat for the detailed background reports that have been made available for our deliberations. We also wish to associate ourselves with the statement delivered on behalf of the Group of 77. Mr. President, The 2008 Ministerial Declaration clearly recognized the importance of an integrated approach to sustainable development, with emphasis on its three pillars of economic development, social development and environmental protection.

It is important that the UN system, in its efforts to assist developing countries pursue sustainable development, remains fully cognizant of this. We must remember that poverty eradication and development are overriding priorities for developing countries. The UN must strengthen its development assistance activities, and the international community must provide adequate resources to UN entities. This is particularly relevant in the context of the ongoing economic crisis. This crisis threatens to reverse development gains made over the years. Abilities of developing countries to respond to the adverse social impacts of the crisis are sharply constrained by its negative fiscal impact. It is imperative that the UN system respond appropriately to assist developing countries. And ECOSOC must fulfill its mandated role of coordinating the activities of the various UN entities so that the UN's response is comprehensive and holistic.

Mr. President,

Last year's Ministerial Declaration identified a number of areas for specific action. These include energy, climate change, bio-diversity, desertification, agriculture, rural development, integrated water management, urban planning, food security, gender equality, among others. The various UN entities that are tasked with specific mandates in these areas must enhance their efforts to assist developing countries. Further, there must be clear member-state involvement in and oversight of inter-agency mechanisms of the UN, particularly since their recommendations are proposed to be used as a guide for the activities of individual UN entities. The Commission on Sustainable Development is the most appropriate forum to provide a holistic perspective on sustainable development. We would encourage different UN entities to more actively incorporate the guidance of the Commission in their work. Technology has a crucial role to play in our efforts at sustainable development. It is important that the UN promotes transfer and dissemination of environmentally friendly technologies in developing countries. We believe that Capacity building is another area where the UN should play a more active role.

Mr. President,

Climate change has emerged as a vital issue in our efforts at achieving sustainable development. We look forward to an ambitious and equitable outcome of the forthcoming Copenhagen Conference of Parties of the UNFCCC.

Insofar as the UN system is concerned, it must make greater efforts to assist developing countries in the areas of adaptation and technology. Efforts to assist developing countries must fully respect the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities. Before concluding, Mr. President, let me briefly touch upon the issue of integrated and coordinated follow-up to the outcomes of the major UN conferences. This is another important role that ECOSOC discharges. In this context, we are concerned that future reports under this agenda item would no longer review how the UN system contributes to the integrated and coordinated follow-up. Instead, it has been proposed that future reports will focus on efforts countries themselves have made to promote integrated follow-up of conferences. It may be noted that the current report has itself highlighted the close cooperation between ECOSOC and the Commission on the Status of Women. We believe that it is this approach that needs to be further promoted, particularly with funds and programmes, where the report notes a lack of success. National actions are adequately reviewed through the AMR. It would, therefore, be desirable not to reorient the report under this agenda item away from action taken by the UN system.

Thank you Mr. President.

761. Statement by Acting Permanent Representative at the UN Manjeev Singh Puri on the Agenda item 'Post-conflict Peace-building' in the Security Council.

New York, July 22, 2009.

Mr. President,

At the outset, let me thank you for scheduling today's debate. It is a topic that is very relevant to the raison d'etre of the United Nations. I also welcome the report of the UN Secretary-General on peace-building in the immediate aftermath of conflict, which underpins today's discussion.

Mr. President,

The report collates several significant findings and recommendations. Key among these is the need for a more coherent and effective international engagement during the brief window between the cessation of conflict and the establishment of a peace process, and the more complex process of ensuring that such processes remain on track. There are clearly two levels of intervention in support of a peace process. The first is at the national and local level, and the second is at the regional and international level. Both processes must move in lockstep.

However, having said that, there are several elements of detail that require attention. These include the need to ensure that the supporting external interventions focus on delivering a peace dividend, expanding national capacity and ensuring the expansion of basic economic capacity so that surplus labour-especially the youth-can be gainfully employed. Such efforts need to be based on recognition of the complexity of post-conflict scenarios. Not all peace processes and agreements address the underlying causes of conflict. Similarly, not all local actors are untarnished by the rigours of conflict. Yet we need to work pragmatically with actors and circumstances as we find them, not as we would wish them to be.

From this standpoint, it is important to ensure that priority-setting is a local endeavour. It is both politically unworkable and strategically perilous for the international community to involve itself in determining national priorities. Sustainable peace requires genuine national ownership of the process, not a process that is nationally-owned only in times of difficulty. It is therefore essential that from the outset, peace consolidation efforts are focused upon expanding the capacity and competence of the local government to deliver services. Without this, there can be no national ownership or development, and without either, there will be no sustainable peace. There is a particular contribution that the nations of the South can make in this context, both with regard to providing training and services, and with regard to providing appropriate technologies. These potentialities need to be explored further.

Mr. President,

At the same time, there is also a need for greater efforts to align regional and international efforts in multilateral fora. Through better alignment and coordination, we can conceivably achieve more coherent interventions and inputs on the ground. This requires better horizontal as well as vertical coherence. That is to say, we need more coherent efforts by the international community to integrate sometimes disparate efforts in dealing with cross-cutting themes in a peace building context. Too often, the well-meaning efforts of the international community tend to be at cross-purposes, thereby undermining the collective effort.

Similarly, vertical coordination is also required, in particular, within the UN and its Agencies and Programmes, to ensure that a common objective is matched by a clear roadmap to that objective. Coordination and consultation between the UN and the international financial institutions, especially the World Bank, must also be expanded. The report clearly recognizes that if the UN is to be a lead actor in the process of peace building in the immediate aftermath of conflict, more must be done to improve its efficiency. It is of course positive that the report recognizes such lacunae. It is also important that the report implicitly recognizes that of itself, the significant convening power that the UN brings to the table is not enough. Thus section V of the report dwells at length on the means by which the UN and its Funds and Programmes may be able to contribute more effectively to the process. Naturally, while practitioners on the ground would be able to better assess the potential efficacy of such measures, perhaps in time, more deep-rooted reform will be required.

Mr. President,

I should like to conclude by highlighting the need for further consideration and discussion on the complex issue of post conflict peacebuilding. We need to be able to frame this debate within a conceptual framework that tries to answer certain larger questions regarding the purposes and principles of international involvement in post-conflict peace consolidation. These include the question of where early recovery fits within the larger continuum of peace keeping and peace-building, and where the transition from peacekeeping to peacebuilding, and from peacebuilding to peace consolidation and development begin. We also need to ask ourselves how international investment-both money and political will-can be expanded in support of peace building. In that context, there is clearly a need to expand the role of the Peacebuilding Commission and to deepen its strategic relationship with the Security Council, the General Assembly and the ECOSOC.

I look forward to a continuing dialogue on this subject in this and other fora within the UN.

I thank you.

762. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on Implementing the Responsibility to Protect at the UN General Assembly Plenary.

New York, July 24, 2009.

Mr. President,

I would at the outset like to place on record my delegation's appreciation to you for convening these discussions. I would also like to record our appreciation to the Secretary General for the presentation of his report entitled "implementing the responsibility to protect" before the General Assembly on 21st July 2009.

Mr. President,

The discussions so far have left some of us deeply disturbed. Perhaps, it is a sign of the troubled times we live in that these discussions continue to reveal both a sense of helplessness and deep intellectual acrimony in finding the political will to prevent the recurrence of the four identified mass atrocities. It has been India's consistent view that the responsibility to protect its population is one of the foremost responsibilities of every state. The right to life is one of the rights from which no derogation is permitted even in time of emergencies. This is a cardinal obligation under our Constitution. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which has 164 States Parties, also has this as its core obligation.

Para 138 of the World Summit Outcome document clearly demands that the international community encourage and help states to exercise their responsibility to prevent genocide, ethnic cleansing, war crimes and crimes against humanity and support the UN in establishing an early warning capability. Capacity building and early warning are indeed critical to ensure that these four mass atrocities do not recur. The report of the Secretary-General has very well identified several proposals under pillars 1 and 2 in this regard. These should be worked on intensively by the international community.

Mr. President,

Protection of populations is identified by the Secretary General as a defining attribute of sovereignty and Statehood in the 21st century. Sovereignty as responsibility has, however, always been a defining attribute for nation states where safeguards for protection of fundamental rights of citizens are constitutionally provided. In the international arena, in so far as the identified four mass atrocities are concerned, we have a specific Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide and several other legal instruments which not only lay down extensive obligations of the States towards their citizens but also hold them accountable where necessary. In fact, the entire human rights regime is fundamentally predicated on this.

The responsibility of the international community has also been identified, be it for war crimes or genocide. For example, under the Genocide Convention, on request of a State Party, the competent organs of the United Nations can take such action under the Charter of the United Nations as they consider appropriate for the prevention and suppression of acts of genocide.

Regrettably, despite all the safeguards and obligations, the international community has in the past failed in its duty to respond to mass atrocities even when they were a clear threat to international peace and security. It is for this reason that this issue came up for consideration in the 2005 World Summit.

Mr. President,

The World Summit Outcome document was a large omnibus document that tried to find common ground on a vast array of issues of global interest. While, of course, disagreement prevented the document from addressing disarmament, we also need to accept that on the issue of responsibility to protect there was a cautious go-ahead. Discussions to provide doctrinal, policy and institutional life to paragraphs 138 and 139, if they are to be faithful to the 2005 document, must therefore, not lose sight of this fact.

Mr. President,

Since words have meaning, it would be useful to recall that in Para 139, the international community was enjoined to use appropriate diplomatic, humanitarian and other peaceful means, and I would like to repeat, peaceful means, to help protect populations in the specific situations of genocide, ethnic cleansing, war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Willingness to take chapter VII measures can only be on a case-by-case basis and in cooperation with relevant regional organizations with a specific proviso that such action should only be taken when peaceful means are inadequate and national authorities manifestly fail in discharging their duty. These measures, Mr. President, not only have to be used as a last resort but have to be in conformity with the provisions of the UN Charter.

Moreover Mr. President, we also have to be realistic. We don't live in an ideal world and, therefore, need to be cognizant that creation of new norms should at the same time completely safeguard against their misuse. In this context, responsibility to protect should in no way provide a pretext for humanitarian intervention or unilateral action. To do so would not only give responsibility to protect a bad name but also defeat its very purpose. Perhaps finalization and adoption of the definition of aggression under the Rome Statute would assuage to some extent the concerns regarding the misuse of this idea.

As students of history, we should remember that to disregard the lessons of history makes us vulnerable and commits us to the folly of repeating mistakes of the past. The need for extra vigilance, therefore, cannot be overemphasized.

Mr. President,

The 2005 World Summit Outcome document provides the parameters regarding the application of responsibility to protect to the four identified mass atrocities. Our deliberations must therefore, be within this framework. Sticking to these parameters is important in view of the very general linguistic meaning that the expression responsibility to protect can invoke. We are all aware that even after 2005 there have been attempts to disingenuously use responsibility to protect, also at the highest levels in the international community!

It is, therefore, important that the UNGA discusses these issues holistically in an open, inclusive and transparent manner so that in developing this new idea, we ensure that it will be used only for its stated purpose and that the potential for its misuse is minimized.

Mr. President,

The Secretary General's report examines some of the most heinous events during the UN's watch and notes the issue of mandate and means. Even a cursory examination of reasons for non-action by the UN, especially the Security Council, reveals that in respect of these tragic events that were witnessed by the entire world, non-action was not due to lack of warning, resources or the barrier of state sovereignty but because of strategic, political or economic considerations of those on whom the present international architecture had placed the onus to act.

The key aspect, therefore, is to address the issue of "willingness to act". Here, of course a necessary ingredient is real reform of decision making bodies in the UN, especially the Security Council in its permanent membership, to reflect contemporary realities and make them forces for peace and capable of acting against mass atrocities.

Thank You.

763. Statement by Permanent Representative to the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on peacekeeping in the UN Security Council.

New York, August 5, 2009.

Mr. President,

Let me begin by thanking you for organizing this debate on Peacekeeping. India attaches the greatest importance to the issue of Peacekeeping. This is the second time within a space of six weeks that I am speaking in this chamber on this topic. This is indicative of the importance that my delegation attaches to engaging in the ongoing deliberations on this subject in the Council and in other fora. My delegation would like to take this opportunity to align itself broadly with the statement made by the Delegation of Morocco on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement. Mr. President, A number of initiatives, including the initiative by the delegations of the United Kingdom and France, are presently underway to take stock of the current state of peacekeeping.

Their efforts are being supplemented or complemented by those of the Security Council Working Group and the Secretariat's New Horizon project. A number of common themes run through these parallel efforts. The draft Presidential Statement circulated amongst Member States, which we have studied carefully, attempts to come to grips with some of these issues. Without going into the merits of whether a Presidential Statement is the appropriate format for addressing these issues, we would like to express our appreciation for the work that has gone into the document. We find some of the ideas and recommendations useful and timely.

Mr. President,

As a nation that has provided and continues to provide the United Nations thousands of soldiers and policemen, in addition to a large proportion of operating air assets, we feel that the nature of the Security Council's mandates and the manner in which they are generated is an area of major concern. Mandates are too broad and have very little correlation with the ability of the organization to deliver. We reiterate the importance of the Brahimi committee recommendation that mandates be clear and achievable. We also reiterate that this will not be possible without substantively involving countries who contribute manpower and resources to Peacekeeping Operations. Mr. President, India is not unfamiliar with the concept of "robust" peacekeeping. In December 1962, an Indian officer, General Dewan Prem Chand, led an acclaimed UN military operation, largely with Indian troops deployed in ONUC, which ended the Katangese secession and restored authority to the Congo government. ONUC, where India lost 39 peacekeepers, was the first UN "robust" peacekeeping operation. This operation was conducted in response to a clear mandate arrived at after consultations. Today we receive feedback from our personnel on the ground that questions of substantive interpretation of the mandates - with repercussions beyond the immediate - are often left to the judgment of mission personnel in the ground. This is a difficult situation, particularly for military officers, who operate best when there are unambiguous instructions and objectives. Unrealistic mandates have led to situations where mission personnel are forced to ask national contingents to undertake tasks and utilize COE in a manner that is inconsistent with the legal framework under which they are deployed.

Mr. President,

We take note, with appreciation of the thrust of the Statement on the question of triangular consultations. We would here once again draw your attention to our most recent experience in respect of MONUC where changes in the Rules of Engagement and Concept of Operations were communicated to the TCCs after they had been notified. I will reiterate that being informed is not the same as being consulted. Mr. President, We also take note of the Council's intention to increase interaction with the Secretariat during drafting of a mandate on the rule of law and peace-building dimensions of an operation. We believe that the future effectiveness of the United Nations in the maintenance of peace and security in the context of peacekeeping lies in its ability to harness national governance capacities in affected countries. These national capacities, as the post-colonial experience in many societies reveal, usually exist in ample measure. The challenge lies in applying the capacities and knowledge of countries that have undergone successful post-colonial nation-building exercises to these situations. The Council therefore needs to expand the ambit of its consultations to include these countries. The UN Secretariat has a predilection for codification. Doctrines and benchmarks are constantly being written and updated. While we have no argument with the need to set standards, we need to remind ourselves that standards should be set in a manner which is realistic and relevant to the operating environment in which UN peacekeepers deploy. Doctrines and standards must not become like mandates - statements rather than a blueprint for action.

Mr. President,

Field Support needs far greater attention. It is our view, based on the experience of supporting the large contingents that we currently have under deployment, that the Department of Field Support needs far greater internal coordination and client-orientation. It has also been our view that the Department of Field Support needs to function as a military support operation with a lean command structure. We feel that there is a need for far greater engagement of Member States on functioning of the DFS. Mr. President, In concluding, I would salute the peacekeepers from India and from other nations who laid down their lives while serving in UN missions. I would also like to reiterate India's commitment to work with the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security including through the mechanism of Peacekeeping. Thank You.

764. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on informal meeting of the Plenary on the Intergovernmental Negotiations on the Question of Equitable Representation of and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and other matters related to the Council in UN General Assembly

New York, September 1, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for your energetic efforts to move this vital process forward. We appreciate your dedication and the courage you have consistently displayed in the discharge of your duties. I reiterate India's continuing support for you in this regard.

We are today at the beginning of the third round of negotiations. Looking back at the first two rounds, two messages emerged loud and clear: first, that an overwhelming majority of member states believe that the status quo is untenable, in response to which genuine reform of the UN Security Council is essential. Second, substantive reform requires an expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories of membership, and significant improvement of the Security Council's working methods.

I am encouraged that that these facts are duly reflected in your letter of July 16. In fact, if anything, your letter perhaps understates the clarity of the second message. Nonetheless, a good start has been made in concentrating on proposals that genuinely reflect the sense of this body.

During the first two rounds, we have looked at the five key issues both in isolation and combinations. So it is appropriate that today we look all these issues in a composite manner.

Let me therefore reiterate our firm conviction that only an expansion of the membership of the UNSC in permanent and non-permanent categories will be credible, effective and genuine. Only such measures will meet the aspirations of the membership at large. The G-4 framework resolution of 2005 proposed six new permanent members and four additional non-permanent members. We remain convinced that this is the optimum expansion that meets both the tests of representativeness and manageability.

Naturally, new permanent members would have the same rights and responsibilities as existing permanent members, including that of the veto. Nevertheless, recognizing the complexity of the issue, the G-4 proposal offered to defer its utilisation until a review is undertaken.

Mr. Chairman,

We see the reform of the working methods of the Council as a key objective of our collective effort. Several useful proposals have been presented over the years that the OEWG meandered along. Perhaps out of sheer fatigue, even the Council discussed this a few times, with a few small steps being taken in this regard. This is useful, but not enough. The efficacy and legitimacy of the Council cannot be enhanced by tinkering at the margins. The many useful suggestions made by delegations here must be seriously considered.

Nevertheless the problem we face is not what the elements contain, but their implementation. The reality is that however good these ideas may be, they will not be implemented unless the structure of the Council is changed. And that will happen only when the Council stops reflecting the world of 1945. Hence effecting serious reform of the working methods of the Security Council is integrally connected with its composition.

Mr. Chairman,

The views of delegations have been eloquently presented and reiterated during the past few months of negotiations. We must now move beyond repetition of well-known positions and focus discussions to make real progress. Your vision of this third round is an effort towards that end.

However, we continue to harbor apprehensions over the notion of an intermediate model. First of all, it is unclear that a discussion on this model will serve the interests of finding a solution that garners requisite support. Apart from the limited support of a few here, and at that as a tepid second preference, it is unclear if this proposal can satisfy the central demand voiced repeatedly by members for genuine reform. Some have tried to portray the intermediate approach as a compromise solution. I remain unconvinced since it is unclear what this is a compromise between. As we see it, an interim solution appears to limit expansion of the Security Council solely to the non-permanent category.

Therefore it can hardly be a sign of flexibility to support an option that currently does not include a sense of a compromise at all. Therefore, in keeping with your suggestion that we focus on "what has commanded the most support", we see little point in discussing a proposal that is in essence a negation of the core demand of the membership, i.e. expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories of membership. Perhaps it would be more useful to use the day earmarked for discussing an interim model for a discussion of the specificities of the various models suggested for expansion of both categories of membership.

Thank you.

765. Statement by Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri at the meeting of the UN General Assembly Plenary on the Intergovernmental negotiations on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and other matters related to the Council.

New York, September 2, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for your dedicated efforts as Chair of our inter-governmental negotiations on this important issue.

Let me place on record our satisfaction at the fact that these negotiations are finally focusing on the reform model that clearly enjoys the support of an overwhelming majority of Member States.

This is a step in the right direction, even though it has taken years of going around in circles in the open-ended working group. Even in these negotiations, we have spent far too much time avoiding this issue rather than dealing with it directly.

Unfortunately, even today, there are some amongst us whose principal objective in attending these meetings sometimes seems solely to ensure that there be no progress whatsoever, either today or in any meeting that substantively discusses expansion in both categories of membership of the Security Council.

Some of these colleagues have even criticized your decision to hold today's meeting on the specious argument that this represents a "selective" choice of one of the five key issues. It is hard to find merit in this somewhat self-serving claim. The fact is that today's discussions are on the model with expansion in both current membership categories. Naturally, the details of this model, and its variations, obviously encompass all the five key issues, for instance as in the G-4 proposal. Moreover, this model also represents an integrated approach to all five key issues, which has been a repeated demand of these very colleagues.

Therefore, to these distinguished colleagues of mine, the naysayers, I would say: do not remain on the wrong side of history. It is evident that we are at a juncture where the prospects of substantive reform of the Security Council are visible. To remain in this negative mould only defers the inevitable; it does not change it.

It is essential that we collectively promote this process, to ensure that the desire of the vast majority of the membership of this Organization for genuine reform can be fulfilled.

In this effort, Mr. Chairman, you have a key role to play. You have correctly, and courageously, noted that today's topic has commanded the most support. It is only logical therefore that henceforth, we focus our attention on this model alone, and not on other options that do not command the support of more than a handful of States.

While this is obvious to most of us, it would perhaps have been more accurate to state that this model enjoys the support of an overwhelming majority, and that it is only a handful of countries that persist in their opposition to this model. If we are to have a serious negotiation aimed at reaching substantive conclusions in the near future, we should focus our attention ahead, and not revisit old and discredited arguments.

Mr. Chairman,

Permit me to digress for a moment to refer to a few intriguing comments that I heard in the pre-lunch from some colleagues, who defy both empirical fact and recent developments to question the level of support enjoyed by the reform model with expansion in both categories of membership.

Despite the fact that I learnt my mathematics in the land that introduced the concept of zero to the world, I confess to being baffled by the new system of mathematics that these colleagues seem to use. The issue is simple - only 12, or at best 15, delegations have ever objected to an expansion in the permanent membership. The rest, even the P-5, have not objected, not once, in repeated rounds of open negotiations, or even in the OEWG process that preceded it.

Yet, using specious and wordy arguments, this tiny minority would have us believe that most delegations are not in favour of expanding the UNSC in both categories.

Mr. Chairman,

Listening to these specious arguments, I utilized the lunch break to look for inspiration. I found it in Lewis Carroll's classic work, "Through the Looking Glass..." With your permission, Mr. Chairman, let me quote you some inspiring passages from this classic work:

"The time has come," the Walrus said, "To talk of many things: Of shoes, and ships, and sealing-wax Of cabbages, and kings. And why the sea is boiling hot-- And whether pigs have wings."

"But wait a bit," the Oysters cried, "Before we have our chat;"

For some of us are out of breath, And all of us are fat!" "No hurry!" said the Carpenter. They thanked him much for that.

There are several other inspiring pieces, Mr Chairman, but the reality is they, the minority, who are very well aware of the overwhelming support enjoyed by this model. They are equally aware of the fact that it is they who stand on the wrong side of the tide. Hence their vociferous objections, in the forlorn hope that stridency can substitute for a lack of numbers. If there is genuine doubt about the basic premise that most delegations support expansion in both categories, then, my knowledge of mathematics tells me that we should test the hypothesis scientifically. So, let me ask, why do they not want us to schedule a straw poll to ask who really objects to an expansion in both categories? I suspect the results would clearly demonstrate that this is a small minority. Perhaps this is already evident to them, hence their desire to avoid further highlighting their isolation.

I think there is little doubt in this hall, or elsewhere in the building, which model my delegation prefers.

Suffice therefore, for me to underline for the record that we see a need to increase the membership of the UN Security Council by 6 permanent and 4 non-permanent members. Two each of the new permanent members would be from Asia and Africa, and one each from Latin America and Europe. The four new non-permanent seats would be equally filled between Asia, Africa, Latin America and Eastern Europe. This was the proposal put forward by the G-4 in draft resolution A/59/L.64. It remains our preferred option.

Naturally, new permanent members would have rights and responsibilities on parallel with existing permanent members, including the right to the veto. However, they would not exercise the veto power until the question of the extension of the right of veto to new permanent members is decided through a review after 15 years from the date of entry into force of the reform measures.

Indeed, as various rounds of discussions demonstrate, this remains the most comprehensive proposal. It is also the tidiest. No other option comes remotely close to satisfying the varying concerns of the membership in this important issue.

Mr. Chairman,

Clearly, today we no longer need to debate which model to follow. Instead, we should concern ourselves with the details of how to expand the membership of the Council in both permanent and non-permanent categories. Instead, we must discuss variants of this model tabled by several member states, for instance by the African Group, identify the most suitable option, and then discuss which variant to implement at the earliest.

We must carry out a rigorous evaluation of each variant of this broadly-acceptable model, and build up a package on which our views can converge.

Only then can we address the leitmotif of these negotiations: that the UNSC no longer represents the interests of the collective membership, and therefore cannot discharge its functions on behalf of all Members. Enhanced representation of developing countries is a crucial requirement in rectifying this unacceptable state of affairs.

Mr. Chairman,

How should we proceed from here? The way forward is clear: we must begin work by identifying the various proposals made by delegations regarding ways of expanding membership of the Council in both categories. Thereafter, detailed negotiations can commence urgently.

We count on you, Mr. Chairman, to take us forward along this path. You can be assured that my delegation will extend the fullest support to you in an effort to focus our collective energies-and time-in negotiations on specific options for reform of the UN Security Council in both permanent and non-permanent categories of membership.

Thank you.

766. Statement by Special Secretary, International Organizations and Political issues in the Ministry of External Affairs Vivek Katju, at the Informal Plenary Meeting of the General Assembly on "Intermediate model" at the United Nations.

New York, September 3, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, I would like to express my appreciation for you, Mr Chairman, and to greet colleagues here as I take the floor for the first time on the reform of the UN Security Council, which remains an issue of abiding interest for all of us.

Mr. Chairman,

I wish to commend your impartial leadership of these intergovernmental negotiations and your willingness to listen to all shades of opinion, including on an intermediate model, which is not in consonance with the desire of the majority of member states. As you have correctly noted, Mr Chairman, the majority favours expansion of the Security Council in permanent and non-permanent categories of membership.

It is for this reason that India had suggested earlier this week that we might find better use for our limited time today. Colleagues have argued, and I believe convincingly, that the focus of this round of negotiations should be forward-looking. That obviously means we should focus on the details of what Member States desire, which is reform and expansion of the Security Council in both existing categories of membership.

In suggesting we make better use of our time, my delegation was not motivated solely by its apprehensions on the intermediate approach. Equally, it was predicated on the fact that the intermediate model does not address the core demand of Member States. i.e, genuine reform of the Security Council. That being so, it is hard to see how it helps us to engage in a discussion on this issue since this model does not appear to garner overwhelming, or even requisite, support.

While we are open to general explorations of ideas and proposals, we need clarity on the utility of such general ideas. What is the intermediate model "intermediate" to? For those of our UFC colleagues who present this notion as a sign their "flexibility"--which, as we know, is a distillation of the old wine of limiting expansion to the non-permanent category in the new bottle of flexibility, we need to ask ourselves, in what way is it "intermediate"? If it is in the sense of a "compromise", where is the "compromise" on their part, since this is essentially limiting us to expansion in the non-permanent category.

For those of us who believe that an intermediate solution is essentially an interim measure, in that it postpones a decision until it is easier for those who have opposed expansion of the Security Council in both categories for fifteen and years and more, I can only say that we are deluding ourselves to believe that a comprehensive solution will be easier to find later. Indeed, one can argue that the quest for a lasting solution would be stymied by an interim structure.

It is sometimes suggested that the intermediate model is a stepping stone to a permanent seat. If that is so, it would be better to say so directly and proceed with discussions on the model of expansion in both categories, which commands majority support.

Mr. Chairman,

Not making the right choices will mean that the problems that currently beset the UNSC will persist in the future. It is for this reason that we think we need to be practical and forward-looking. It is clear that the so-called intermediate model does not enjoy wide support, even as a second preference. Let us instead discuss the variations on the model of expansion of both categories. That would be sensible.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that you have shown your willingness to allow all possible views to be heard, it would make sense to focus our future efforts on the model that commands majority support: that is, expansion in both current categories of membership. We look forward to continuing these negotiations of the GA in informal plenary in the forthcoming 64th session on this basis. We would therefore support Germany and others who have suggested that progress made in negotiations over this year should be summarized, so that we can build upon the progress achieved. The suggestion that we have a workplan and a timetable for such discussions in the 64th UNGA session is also useful.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

767. Intervention by External Affairs Minister at the Round Table during the Climate Change meeting at the UN .

New York, September 22, 2009.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs.

Permit me to begin by appreciating the admirable manner in which you are guiding our discussions. I am also appreciative of the Secretary General for convening this meeting. It is imperative that our meeting galvanizes political momentum for the real negotiations at the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs,

India faces one of the most enormous development challenges in the world. Nearly 200 millions live on less than 1$ a day and nearly 500 million do not have access to modern sources of energy. Our overriding priority, therefore, has to be eradication of poverty for which we must address our energy poverty and use all sources of energy, including fossil fuels. Climate change has now posed for us a huge adaptation challenge too as we are severely affected. We have a major interest in ensuring a substantive and constructive outcome in Copenhagen and we will be part of the solution, even though India has not caused the problem in any way. The outcome must be rooted in equity and respect the provisions and principles of the Convention, especially common but differentiated responsibilities and also historical responsibility. It must also ensure that developing countries can pursue accelerated development, also so that they have the resources to cope and adapt to climate change.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs,

The background paper for today's event has posed important questions with the one on lifestyles, perhaps, being the most pertinent. Here we cannot get away from the fundamental fact that unsustainable lifestyles and patterns of production and consumption in the developed world have caused climate change. This cannot continue. And, the way forward must ensure that developing countries can pursue growth and poverty eradication. Scientific evidence suggests limiting global emissions by the middle of this century to a level that would keep the temperature rise to 2 degrees Celsius. It is imperative that this aspirational global goal includes an equitable burden sharing and that all citizens of the world have an equal right to the global resource of the atmosphere. Moreover, developed countries must commit and deliver on significant reduction in their emissions of at least 40% by 2020 from the agreed 1990 baseline.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs,

India's per-capita emissions are only around 1 tonne of CO<sub>2</sub> equivalent per annum, which is a quarter of the global average and half that of the developing countries as a whole. Moreover, our contribution to the stock of carbon dioxide is negligible. We have also repeatedly reaffirmed that our per-capita emissions would never exceed the average per capita emissions of the developed countries, even as we pursue our development objectives. We are taking many domestic adaptation and mitigation actions on a voluntary and systematic basis. These include national missions and other actions in the area of solar energy, extensive deployment of renewables, use of clean coal technologies, boosting energy efficiency, adoption of green building codes, large scale reforestation efforts and promotion of green agriculture, among others. Many of the mitigation efforts in different sectors like energy, transport, industry, agriculture and forestry will have specific quantitative and time-bound domestic goals, with even mid-term deadlines, that would enable our national democratic institutions to monitor and check their implementation.

The creation of mechanisms along with provision of financial resources and access to technology which will enable us to upscale our national efforts is an important expectation that we have from Copenhagen. Naturally, efforts that are supported by external sources will be subject to international monitoring, but it is important that the ambition levels of domestic actions are not crimped by an international review obligation. And while private funding is important, government commitment for funding, both for mitigation and adaptation, has to be a key element, to ensure predictability and to catalyze other flows. For new green technologies to be deployed effectively in the developing world, rewards for innovators would need to be balanced with the needs of humankind. This, along with collaborative R&D activities, I believe is the critical piece of the climate puzzle. In this connection, I would like to mention here that India is organizing a major conference on technology cooperation for climate change in collaboration with the United Nations in Delhi in October this year. This Conference will feed into Copenhagen substantively.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs,

Climate negotiations should be focusing on the developed countries from where the problem has emanated and who are reluctant even to meet their commitments on emission reduction, let alone provide technological and financial support to developing countries on the vast scale that is required. Instead, the onus for action is sought to be shifted to developing countries, which have contributed little to the accumulation of greenhouse gasses and face the huge burden of adaptation. Protectionist trade and border tax response measures, which basically seek to protect their competitiveness, are being talked about in developed countries under the garb of climate change. And, regarding financial resources for developing countries, even in so far as the minimalist amounts that appear forthcoming; all efforts are underway to ensure that their governance remains outside the UNFCCC and squarely in control of developed countries. There is a tide of change in world economic relations. Climate negotiations should not seek to stem this tide.

768. Statement by the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the General Debate of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, September 26, 2009.

Your Excellency, Mr. President, Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

Please accept my congratulations on your assuming the Presidency of this 64th Session of the United Nations General Assembly. My delegation assures you of our fullest cooperation during your stewardship of this august Assembly that embodies the hopes, aspirations and our shared vision of peace and development for all the people of our planet.

Mr. President,

When this General Assembly ends next year, the United Nations would have completed 65 years of existence. These past decades have seen the world change in fundamental ways. Connectivity defines our global condition, and the challenges that we collectively face are global. The resolution of these challenges, as we are aware, require global approaches and solutions. What may happen in one part of the world has an impact on other regions. In the context of these rapidly emerging changes and their deep and diverse effect, we must introspect more deeply on whether the United Nations and other global governance structures are geared to effectively meet the challenges that confront us all. It is of concern that even after more than six decades, international governance structures are neither inclusive nor participatory. Consequently, these structures and institutions have not kept pace or evolved, with the changed nature, the intensity and the depth of contemporary global issues. The question therefore is: are these institutions able enough to address these challenges either adequately or satisfactorily? The reform and restructuring of the global governance architecture is the critical need of our times and the voice of the developing world, including the small island nations and of Africa, is of principal and core relevance, if we are to have truly participatory and global responses to global challenges. One need not look too far to identify these challenges. The economic and financial turmoil, which did not begin in the developing world, has affected developing countries the most. Growth has slowed down with recession overtaking many countries. The international response to this challenge has to be not only the measures that have been taken to stimulate economies but more importantly, to find ways to restructure the current international governance system which has failed to respond to the virulence of the financial and economic crisis. To gloss over this structural deficit of the current global financial and economic architecture, would imperil the future of a vast majority of the peoples of this world and presage greater difficulties in the future. In the face of the current economic and financial crisis, hard-won gains in alleviating poverty, hunger, illiteracy and disease are being reversed. Today, the achievements of the Millennium Development Goals are seriously threatened. Policies of protectionism under these already adverse circumstances will exacerbate the serious situation that many countries face.

It is imperative that the United Nations act in concert to coherently overcome these challenges. India, which is actively engaged in the G-20 and other processes, has always stressed that developing countries must receive priority in any global response to the crisis. The UN Conference on the financial and economic crisis held in June this year was opportune and provided a useful platform to collectively seek ways and means to respond to the crisis. We now look forward to an early implementation of the follow-up measures agreed to at the Conference, during the course of this General Assembly. We believe that international trade and commerce has a central role to play in revitalizing global economic growth. We are committed to negotiations in the Doha Development Round. We strongly favour fair and equitable rule-based multilateral trade negotiations, which recognize and address the legitimate demands of the developing countries. India supports resumption of the negotiations at an early date and stands ready to engage with all WTO Members to complete the modalities and addressing any outstanding problems. To support this process, we also organized an international ministerial level conference in New Delhi on 3-4 September 2009.

Mr. President,

At the centre-stage of multilateralism and international cooperation is the United Nations. The UN is a platform where the world meets to express views and undertake commitments on global issues of mutual concern on an equal footing. No wonder then that the Charter of the United Nations begins with the inspiring words: "We the people of the United Nations....." Inclusiveness and collective action, in all aspects of the work of the organization is at the heart of its Charter. This vision must be our lodestar, the guiding principle of all we undertake. India is committed to working with member states to making the United Nations more relevant and tuned in to contemporary realities. Reforming the United Nations is a matter of the utmost priority. Four years after the 2005 World Summit, there has not been much progress even as newer and more global crises and problems have emerged.

We should not let slowness of action weaken the organization in the face of such challenges. Rather, we must work in concert to make it more robust and capable of effective response. Reform in the three essentials of the Charter i.e. Peace and Security, Development, and Human Rights require our collective attention. The General Assembly must be revitalized in full measure and its role as the anvil of global deliberation must be strengthened. The ECOSOC must become the fulcrum of development. It must be accepted that the Security Council must be strengthened and made more representative by expanding its permanent and non-permanent membership. Ongoing intergovernmental negotiations during the last six months have unambiguously established that an overwhelming majority of Member States share the perspective that expansion in both categories of membership of the Security Council is needed.

Mr. President,

Climate change is one of the most important global challenges that we face today. Developing countries bear a disproportionate share of its adverse effects even though they are not responsible for it. Cognizant of the serious threat that climate change poses, India is engaged in the ongoing negotiations under the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change including in the upcoming Copenhagen Conference. India will work for an outcome that recognizes the development imperatives of developing countries and is rooted in the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. We also have to move away from concentrating on "mitigation" only and ensure that there is a focus on adaptation, which is critical for developing countries. We are hosting a high-level global conference on "Climate Change: Technology Development and Transfer" on October 22-23, 2009 in cooperation with the United Nations. The objective of this Conference is to help formulate a roadmap for technology in the context of climate change mitigation and adaptation to support the UNFCCC process. Developing countries must be supported financially, technologically and with capacity building resources so that they can cope with the immense challenges of adaptation. Special efforts are required to develop programmes that address the critical needs of Small Island States and of the most vulnerable countries. Poverty alleviation and livelihood security are central imperatives for India. For this, accelerated economic growth and energy security are critical drivers. In pursuing our development goals, India has been successful in significantly reducing its energy intensity. India will continue to pursue this path. India is aware that the continuing volatility in the fossil-fuel markets together with the threat of climate change which makes the development of all renewable and clean energy sources, including nuclear energy crucial. In this context, international civil-nuclear cooperation is important. India has also taken several independent initiatives to address the issue of climate change. We have put in place a comprehensive policy and legislative framework as well as a National Action Plan on Climate Change with separate Eight National Missions. An unprecedented afforestation campaign has been launched with doubling of the budget for forestry this year to US$ 1.3 billion and this increase is going to be sustained every year. The Prime Minister's Council has approved National Missions for Enhanced Energy Efficiency, and Solar Energy setting ambitious goals. We are supporting and facilitating major research to assess various aspects related to climate change.

Mr. President

India attaches the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament and has an impeccable non-proliferation record. We welcome the renewed global debate on achieving a world free of nuclear weapons. This corresponds with India's longstanding and consistent advocacy of nuclear disarmament as one of the highest priority of the international community. We have put forward a number of proposals on nuclear disarmament in the UN, including a Working Paper in 2006, proposing elements to fashion a new consensus on disarmament and non-proliferation. Last year, at the 63rd UNGA, consistent with India's longstanding commitment as articulated in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan in 1988, India reiterated its proposal for a Nuclear Weapons Convention for banning the production, development, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and to provide for their complete elimination within a specified time-frame. The international nuclear order cannot be discriminatory. Further, states must fulfill the obligations they have undertaken. Once more, with feeling and with commitment, India reiterates that proposal. We will continue to engage with key countries to intensify this debate with the hope that greater international understanding could lend itself to a firm commitment for action on nuclear disarmament. It was in this spirit that we supported adoption of a Programme of Work, including on a Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty, in the Conference on Disarmament in May this year. This is consistent with India's position, to work with others in the Conference on Disarmament towards conclusion of a non-discriminatory, multilaterally negotiated and internationally verifiable FMCT, provided it meets India's national security interests. We remain committed to a voluntary, unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing.

Mr. President,

India stands committed to the safeguarding of international peace and security. Over the past five decades, we contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers and have suffered the highest number of casualties in these decades. Strengthening the normative basis for peacekeeping operations and giving major Troop Contributing Countries (TCCs) a greater say, will serve to make peacekeeping more effective.

Mr. President,

The barbaric terrorist attack on the innocent people of Mumbai on November 26, 2008 reminds us of the daily and malignant menace that terrorism poses to all countries. There cannot be any justification whatsoever for such mindless terrorist acts. It is our collective responsibility and duty to work together to ensure that terrorists, organizers, perpetrators and supporters of such crimes are brought to justice. To strengthen the international legal framework of the fight against terrorism, India had proposed a Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT). Discussions on the draft have gone on for far too long. It is time that the Convention be finally adopted. India earnestly calls upon all countries to make serious efforts in the next few weeks to arrive at a consensus on the text.

Mr. President,

Peace, security, stability and welfare of our neighbourhood is vital for India. There is a new beginning in Sri Lanka; in Nepal strengthening the peace process is in our collective interest; and in Afghanistan, the international community must remain intensively engaged and support its development efforts and the maintenance of peace and stability. India is committed to establishing good neighbourly relations and resolving all outstanding issues with Pakistan through peaceful dialogue. Mr. President, In conclusion, I wish to reiterate India's steadfast commitment to the work of the United Nations. Speaking to this Assembly 41 years ago, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi said and I QUOTE "the United Nations is the trustee of the world's peace and represents the hopes of mankind. Its very existence gives a feeling of assurance that the justice of true causes can be brought fearlessly before the world. This Assembly and the agencies of the United Nations should, in all that they do, sustain those hopes and promote the causes of peace". The truth and conviction of these words are more meaningful today than ever before.

Thank you.

769. Statement by the Deputy Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri at the meeting to Review the Implementation of UNSC Resolution 1540.

New York, September 30, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

I congratulate you on this initiative to convene an open meeting to review the implementation of the UN Security Council resolution 1540. I assure you of our constructive participation in these deliberations.

India recognizes that proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is a major challenge facing the international community. We fully understand the dangers of WMDs falling into the hands of terrorists. We have therefore supported the general objectives of UNSCR 1540. The resolution was in harmony with our own General Assembly resolution "Measures to prevent terrorists from gaining access to WMD", which was first introduced in 2002 and is adopted by consensus.

Since the adoption of the 1540 resolution we have taken additional steps to further strengthen our existing legislative and regulatory mechanism for exercising controls over WMDs. A major step was the enactment of the WMD Act in June 2005. The Act provides for an integrated and over-arching legislation on prohibiting unlawful activities in relation to WMDs, their delivery systems and related materials, equipment and technologies. The Act criminalises a range of unlawful activities in relation to WMDs and their means of delivery. Industry outreach activities are undertaken on regular basis in different parts of the country to sensitize exporters and industry to various aspects related to the 1540 resolution. In addition, training programmes are organized for officials connected with the administration of dual-use export goods.

India filed its first report on UNSCR 1540 in November 2004. This report was followed by two addendums in January and February 2006. An update to these reports and addendums was filed in April 2009, focusing on developments of the past three years and the draft matrices circulated by 1540 Committee.

India has contributed to the work of the 1540 Committee, including through nominating an Expert, Dr. V. Siddhartha, who worked for the Committee for a two year term.

We have noted that a large number of countries have taken measures to implement the resolution at a national level and have reported to the Committee. We support efforts to prepare guidelines for handling assistance requests by countries and to find means to address the most commonly found gaps in the implementation of 1540. It is important that these activities are performed only at the request of a country and keeping in mind the varying national capacities, procedures and systems. Based on specific requests by countries, India remains ready to assist them bilaterally in capacity building and fulfilling their obligations under UNSCR 1540.

The resolution is global in its reach and should be taken forward along with everyone so that broader synergies are utilized for its better implementation. The involvement of regional organizations may need to be carefully considered since this subject is rather specialized in nature, and capability and expertise at the level of regional or sub-regional organizations may not be often available.

Thank you.

770. Statement by the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on Women and Peace and Security at the Security Council.

New York, October 5, 2009.

Mr. President,

Let me begin by congratulating you for assuming the Presidency of the Security Council.

We are happy to participate in today's open debate on "Women and Peace and Security". The theme of today's discussion "responding to the needs of women and girls in post-conflict situations for sustainable peace and security" is both timely and pertinent. India attaches very high importance to ensuring concrete action in this area and welcomes the report of the Secretary-General.

Mr. President,

We had co-sponsored UN Security Council Resolution 1888, which was adopted last week under the Presidency of the United States, and we are also happy to co-sponsor the resolution 1889 adopted today.

Nevertheless, let me underscore that the issue of "Women and Peace and Security" has implications which are cross-cutting as well as multi-dimensional. Therefore, the need for discussing these issues in the universal forum, the General Assembly, cannot be over-emphasized.

India has consistently held that greater participation of women in areas of conflict prevention, peace negotiations, peace keeping and post conflict reconstruction is the sine qua non for lasting peace and security.

As far as the UN is concerned, its achievements have been at best modest, particularly in terms of deployment of women in peacekeeping forces. Women, presently, comprise only 8 percent of UN police officers, and about 2 percent of the military personnel deployed in UN peacekeeping operations. Given the critical role of the UN in peacekeeping operations and peace building in post-conflict countries, we firmly believe that the UN must lead by example. Precisely for these reasons, India has contributed a female peacekeeping unit of 100 personnel, which is presently deployed in Liberia. This mission in Liberia stands out as the only one of its kind among the ongoing UN peacekeeping operations.

Mr. President,

We commend the work of Secretary-General in mainstreaming the gender perspective in the UN recruitment process. We hope that this process will be institutionalised at the earliest and that we achieve a gender balance in the UN system, especially in the field, where it is most required. There is also much need for ensuring greater representation of women in high decision-making positions at the UN.

Mr. President,

It is a matter of deep regret that the international community has to repeatedly debate the issue of sexual and other forms of violence against women and girls in situations of armed conflict. This abhorrent behaviour has to be unequivocally, unambiguously and resolutely condemned, whether perpetrated by parties to armed conflicts, peacekeeping personnel, including its civilian component, or humanitarian actors.

Mr. President,

The promotion and protection of the human rights of women and girls in armed conflict continue to pose a pressing challenge. There should be no tolerance for gender based violence. All cases of gender based violence in an armed conflict must be investigated and the perpetrators prosecuted.

Let me assure you that India will continue to contribute positively to United Nations efforts in protecting vulnerable sections, particularly women and children, in conflict and post-conflict societies. This needs to be done in a comprehensive manner with active involvement of all the Departments and Agencies of the United Nations. I would also like to stress that the international community needs to enhance cooperation by providing new and additional financial resources, sharing of experiences, expertise and capacity building in areas of justice and rule of law.

Thank You.

771. Statement by the Deputy Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri on Agenda Item 136 - Scale of Assessments for the Apportionment of the Expenses of the United Nations at the Fifth Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 5, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

As this is the first time in this session that my delegation is taking the floor, let me congratulate you on your election as the Chairman of the Fifth Committee. We also extend our felicitations to the other members of the Bureau. We are confident that under your stewardship, the Fifth Committee would undertake constructive and meaningful deliberations during this session. I assure you of my delegation's fullest cooperation in the Committee's work.

I would also like to convey our appreciation to the Chairman of the Committee on Contributions for introducing his Committee's report and to the Chief of the Contributions Section for introducing the report of the Secretary-General on multi-year payment plans.

I would also like to strongly support the statement made by the Chair of the Group of 77 before this committee.

My delegation is of the view that the current methodology for preparing the scales of assessment for the apportionment of the expenses of the Organization truly reflects the fundamental and inviolable principle of "capacity to pay". It is also our clear understanding that this is the view of an overwhelming majority of the Member-States.

The current methodology, which includes the base period, the per capita Gross National Income, conversion rates, Low Per Capita Income Adjustment, debt burden adjustment based on debt stock approach, floor, ceiling for LDCs etc. has evolved over the last 65 years, as a result of careful and deep thought involving lengthy deliberations by our predecessors in this very house.

Recognizing the credibility of the current methodology, the General Assembly in 2006, unanimously decided to maintain the methodology for the 2007-2009 period.

The suggested figures for contribution by different Member-States to the regular UN budget before us now using the current methodology clearly account for changes in relative growth rates of different Member-States. This fact by itself provides all the validation to the methodology's integrity that should be required. Indeed, as the Chair of G77 has noted, a majority of the developing countries will see a substantial increase in their assessed contributions in 2010-2012 based on the current scales of assessment.

We are all confronted today by a global economic and financial crisis, in which developing countries have been hit the hardest, despite not being responsible for creating the crisis. In these times, mere fair-play demands that developing countries are not asked to shoulder a greater burden of financing the Organization and that too by changing the methodology, according to the convenience of a few and adversely affecting the vast majority, especially developing countries.

We have many arguments and evidence in support of each element of the current scales methodology, but we would not like to go into the details at this stage, as they are also well known to the others. My delegation is firmly of the opinion that given the circumstances, it would be in the interest of all us to maintain the current methodology for the 2010-2012 period and do so now. Attempts to selectively target developing countries will unravel the consensus around the current methodology, which has been carefully crafted over the years.

While statistics can be manipulated to prove any self-serving argument, we believe that all Member States should fulfill their financial obligations towards the Organization, in full, on time, and without conditionality, especially when these obligations are determined by the General Assembly, on the basis of clear, transparent, logical and unanimously agreed guidelines.

On the other important issue of exemption from Article 19, we fully support the conclusions of the Committee on Contributions on the submissions before it by six Member States for exemption from the application of the provisions of Article 19. We endorse the recommendation to permit the six Member States to vote in the General Assembly until the end of the 64th session of the UNGA.

Normally, while concluding, my delegation would have said that we were looking forward to discussing the issue of the scales of assessment in greater detail during informal consultations of this Committee. However, in this instance, I would echo what the Chair of G77 emphatically said in his statement, that given the clarity on this subject amongst the overwhelming majority of Member States, we like to see the adoption of the existing scales of assessment methodology for the 2010-2012 period right now. This would not only save us precious resources on conference services, but would also give us more time to deliberate on other more pressing issues before the United Nations that have to be decided in this main session.

772. Statement by the Deputy Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri on Agenda Item 63 - Social Development at the Third Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 6, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Since I am taking the floor for the first time in this Committee, let me begin by conveying to you and to the members of your Bureau our warmest felicitations on your election and to you for chairing this important Committee of the General Assembly.

I would like to assure you of my delegation's full cooperation in the deliberations and work of this Committee. I wish to thank the Under-Secretary General for Economic and Social Affairs for his statement in this Committee yesterday. My delegation would like to endorse the statement made by the Chair of G77.

Mr. Chairman,

The World Summit for Social Development of 1995 was amongst the largest gathering of world leaders where a pledge was made to conquer poverty, achieve full employment and foster just, social and stable societies. It is a sad realization that today, even after nearly 15 years, we still have a very long way to go.

The last one year has been particularly difficult for developing countries due to the ongoing economic and financial crisis. This crisis, which did not originate in the developing countries, has negatively impacted them and has not only stalled economic growth, but has further eroded the slow progress of the last few years. This adverse impact has been clearly reflected in the Secretary General's report which states that the global crises will most likely reverse, the decline in levels of poverty witnessed between 1981 and 2005.

Mr. Chairman,

We are still grappling with the adverse affects of this unprecedented crisis. There are, of course, some signs of recovery but the fact remains that even these point only to a slow and prolonged process.

Developing countries like India have been more resilient and are poised towards resuming growth, but it is imperative that assistance efforts to developing countries are continued and even enhanced. The Secretary-General's report has also clearly brought out the direct co-relation between resource availability and progress in achieving MDGs. This must spur us to provide greater investment in areas where we are not on track to achieve the MDGs.

Mr. Chairman,

We welcome the Secretary General report referring to India as one of the few success cases on social development amongst the developing countries. It has been our endeavour to take active steps to ensure that the most vulnerable sections of the society benefit from our economic policies. Inclusive growth is the dominant theme of our 11th Five Year Plan (2007-12).

Some of our major efforts include national schemes to ensure availability of food grains at concessional rates to all and guaranteed employment. In this context, I must make reference to the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act (NREGA), which was enacted in 2006.

The NREGA provides a legal guarantee of one hundred days of employment every year for adults at a statutory minimum wage. This programme provided employment to almost 45 million people last year with programmes covering rural development. Women and other marginalized sections of society have been particular beneficiaries of this programme. We are presently seeking to expand the scope of this programme to include more activities within the ambit of 'work'.

NREGA works in conjunction with yet another programme, namely, Bharat Nirman which focuses on building infrastructure in rural areas. We are also working towards providing better housing facilities for slum dwellers in India through the newly instituted Rajiv Awas Yojana scheme.

Mr. Chairman,

Education is an essential component of social development. This year the Government of India brought into force the Right to Education Act. This Act provides for each child the right to education up to the age of 14 years. The Act also has a special focus on disabled children and their access to education.

Notwithstanding this, from this year onwards, in order to further reinforce education of girls, we have launched a Female Literacy Mission, with the aim of reducing female illiteracy by half, in the next three years.

Mr. Chairman,

George Bernard Shaw very succinctly once said 'the greatest of evils and the worst of crimes is poverty'. Eradication of poverty and social integration is the overriding priority for developing countries. The global economic and financial crisis has exacerbated the problem. We must ensure that economic and social development does not just remain an aspiration for many. Let us work collectively so that we strengthen our efforts to translate this global aspiration into a reality.

I thank you Mr. Chairman.

773. Statement by the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on Agenda Item 107: Report of the Secretary General of the Work of the Organization at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 6, 2009.

Mr. President,

I would like to begin by thanking the Secretary-General for the comprehensive nature of his report on the Organization. Given the global nature of the challenges of today, the Secretary-General has rightly noted that "this is the ultimate multilateral moment". It is, therefore, imperative that the UN embody the hope of the new multilateralism.

Mr. President,

The Secretary-General has identified five essential elements to renew multilateralism. While we are in broad agreement with the elements identified, it is evident that the 5th element, i.e. reform of the global multilateral architecture, holds the key to progress on all other elements. Efforts to promote a new multilateralism have little chance of success without a comprehensive reform of global governance structures. The on-going financial crisis has further highlighted the urgent need to take concrete action to restructure international governance architectures in a manner that reflects current realities and provides for enhanced representation of developing countries. If we want our multilateral institutions to be able to counter current and emerging challenges, we cannot continue with structures that date from the Second World War, and do not reflect the current and emerging global realities. Small steps, like an enhanced role for the G-20, are a beginning but certainly not the end.

In this context, at the UN the critical need is an expansion in both the permanent and the non-permanent membership of the Security Council and an improvement in its working methods. We are happy that a unanimous decision was recently taken to continue the inter-governmental negotiations on UNSC reform immediately. The decision to build on the progress already achieved allows us to focus now on what is the opinion of the overwhelming majority i.e. expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories.

Mr. President,

We are still grappling with the adverse affects of an unprecedented global economic and financial crisis. Developing countries, where the crisis did not originate, have been the most affected. It is imperative that stimulus efforts and other actions to help developing countries are continued and enhanced. There is no place at this time for protectionism in any form in the developed countries. The Secretary General has eloquently brought out the direct co-relation between resource availability and progress in achieving MDGs. The fact that efforts of developing countries towards achieving MDGs have been hit by the economic and financial crisis demands that the international community significantly spur provision of greater assistance and investment flows to developing countries. At the recently held Mini-Ministerial meeting in New Delhi of Trade Ministers we have made major progress towards revitalizing the Doha phase of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations. We hope that the Doha Round will now make progress towards an outcome that is development oriented and can assist developing countries in meeting their development goals. Mr. President, The Secretary-General has correctly highlighted climate change as a top priority. We appreciate his initiative in organizing the Summit on Climate Change on 22nd September 2009. As a country that is hugely affected by climate change, India will be part of the solution and push for an ambitious and equitable outcome at Copenhagen.

The outcome must be in accordance with the provisions and principles of the UNFCCC, in particular, common but differentiated responsibilities and ensure that developing countries can pursue their overriding development imperative of poverty eradication. We are also undertaking numerous mitigation and adaptation measures domestically to address climate change. Many of these will have specific, quantitative and time-bound goals. On the multilateral side, there has to be a greater focus on technology access for developing countries. The UN has to play a true facilitator's role in access to and transfer of affordable and cost effective technology to developing countries. There is also no escaping the need to revisit the IPR regime from the perspective of balancing rewards for innovators with the common good of humankind. Mr. President, Peacekeeping remains the most visible UN activity and also one, that perhaps more than any other, represents the aspirations of the Charter to prevent the scourge of war from afflicting societies. However, as things stand today, the UN has neither the resources nor the expertise to satisfactorily execute many of its ambitious peacekeeping mandates. There are countries that are willing and able to contribute more in terms of resources. The challenge is in creating the framework that will enable the United Nations to access and utilize these resources and capacities. As a Member-State that is closely associated with UN peacekeeping, India will actively contribute in building the renewed global partnership on peacekeeping that the Secretary-General has called for, including in the area of rule of law and deployment of police units. I am happy that the work of the Female Formed Police Unit from India that is deployed in Liberia has been much appreciated.

Mr. President,

Peacebuilding is one of the UN activities, which must evolve urgently in the coming years given the huge needs in post conflict societies.

Peacebuilding, of course, must be first and foremost a national process. But the international community must be there to assist countries recovering from conflict. Here again, I would like to reiterate the commitment of my Government to partner the UN, this time in its peacebuilding efforts. India has unique combinations of relevant experience, expertise and capacities, which we believe are critical for nation building in any part of the world. Mr. President, We welcome the efforts made by the Secretary-General in using the opportunity of 60th year of adoption of the Universal Declaration of the Human Rights to strengthen Member States advocacy efforts on human rights and take concrete steps to integrate human rights into all aspects of the Organization's work. While integrating human rights in the work of the UN, we should ensure that the development agenda pursued by the UN should not be undermined by way of introducing new conditionalities in provision of development assistance. One of the priorities on the human rights front should include enhancing the Organization's commitment to make the Right to Development a reality sooner than later. Mr. President, India has consistently been of the view that Responsibility to Protect (R2P) its population is one of foremost responsibilities of every member state. We agree with the Secretary General that the consultations regarding the application of responsibility to protect to the four identified mass atrocities and emphasis on non-use of force should continue and therefore sponsored the resolution 63/308. However we need to be cognizant that creation of new norms should safeguard against their misuse. In this context, responsibility to protect should in no way provide a pretext for humanitarian intervention or unilateral action.

Mr. President,

We appreciate the progress made by the United Nations Democracy Fund (UNDEF) in the last four years. India was one of the first countries to support its establishment and has already contributed US $ 20 million.

Let me assure you that we will continue to be actively engaged in this Fund and its activities, which we believe contribute to promotion of good and participative governance practices. Mr. President, Terrorism is the scourge of our times. It needs to be combated with all the power at the command of the international community. While I am glad that the UN has been working on operationalizing the Global Strategy, we believe it is essential that we adopt the Comprehensive Convention against International Terrorism (CCIT), which has been under negotiation for over fifteen years, in this session. This would then provide a solid legal basis for the fight against terrorism. Mr. President, India fully shares the concerns arising from the existence of weapons of mass destruction, and their possible acquisition by non-state actors and terrorists. India attaches the highest priority to the goal of universal nuclear disarmament and has an impeccable non-proliferation record. Nuclear disarmament and nuclear non-proliferation are mutually reinforcing processes and they require concerted and cooperative international efforts. We welcome the renewed global debate on achieving a world free of nuclear weapons. Mr. President, India's civilizational ethos of "Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam", we are one family, guides the way we perceive and work in the United Nations. We would do all that we can to strengthen the UN so that the international community can be united to address the world's problems through decisive action. In that spirit, the Indian delegation looks forward to meaningful and result-oriented discussions on the various items on the agenda of the General Assembly.

Thank you!

774. Statement of the Permanent Representative at the Conference of Disarmament at Geneva Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao at the General Debate of the First Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 8, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

It is a pleasure to convey to you our congratulations on your election to the Chairmanship of this Committee and we assure you the full cooperation of the Indian delegation. We would like to associate ourselves with the statement made by Indonesia on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

We commence this year's First Committee deliberations against the background of not only multiple challenges to global peace and security but an accompanying mood of optimism as well that we can find viable and enduring solutions through collective efforts underlined by a genuine spirit of multilateralism. In achieving this objective, as provided by the UN Charter, the General Assembly and the First Committee, dealing with international security and disarmament issues, can play a vital and substantive role.

Mr. Chairman,

India attaches the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament. During the 63rd Session of the UNGA, India's Prime Minister reiterated our proposal for a Nuclear Weapons Convention prohibiting the development, production, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and providing for their complete elimination within a specified timeframe. Our policy is consistent with the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament enshrined in the Final Document of SSOD-I and in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan of 1988. The Non-Aligned Movement reaffirmed the same objectives during its recent summit at Sharm-el Sheikh.

We believe that just as it was possible to prohibit chemical and biological weapons, through non-discriminatory and global international conventions, achievement of non-discriminatory, global nuclear disarmament is not only possible but that global security would be enhanced by a nuclear weapon free world. Such a vision brings together principle and pragmatism. India welcomes the active debate amongst scholars and statesmen on nuclear disarmament and a number of initiatives launched to add new life to the global disarmament agenda, including by the UNSG in October last year.

There are some encouraging signs, including the declared intention of the United States and Russia to negotiate further cuts in their nuclear arsenals as well as the willingness of the United States, as indicated in President Obama's statement in Prague in April this year, to reduce the role of nuclear weapons in its national security strategy.

The goal of nuclear disarmament can be achieved through a step-by-step process underwritten by a universal commitment to achieve the complete elimination of nuclear weapons. Nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation are mutually reinforcing processes but the overall goal of nuclear disarmament should not be held hostage to nuclear non-proliferation. At the same, we must ensure that non - proliferation objectives are achieved through concerted and cooperative international efforts. Expansion of nuclear energy, which is vital to ensure global energy security and to combat climate change, must be ensured in a manner that does not enhance proliferation risks.

To take forward the global debate on nuclear disarmament, India has suggested the following measures:

Reaffirmation of the unequivocal commitment of all nuclear weapon States to the goal of complete elimination of nuclear weapons;

Reduction of the salience of nuclear weapons in the security doctrines;

Taking into account the global reach and menace of nuclear weapons, adoption of measures by nuclear-weapon States to reduce nuclear danger, including the risks of accidental nuclear war, de-alerting of nuclear-weapons to prevent unintentional and accidental use of nuclear weapons.

Negotiation of a global agreement among nuclear weapon States on 'no-First-use' of nuclear-weapons;

Negotiation of a universal and legally-binding agreement on non-use of nuclear weapons against non-nuclear weapon States.

Negotiation of a Convention on the complete prohibition of the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons;

Negotiation of a Nuclear Weapons Convention prohibiting the development, production, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and on their destruction, leading to the global, non-discriminatory and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons with a specified timeframe.

Mr. Chairman,

During its 2009 Annual Session, the Conference on Disarmament reached consensus on a Programme of Work, an important milestone, after more than a decade of impasse. We share the disappointment that the Conference was, thereafter, unable to get down to substantive work. As the single multilateral negotiating forum on disarmament, the CD bears a responsibility to meaningfully respond to the international community's expectations in the disarmament field, particularly on the priority issue of nuclear disarmament.

India is committed to participating constructively in the FMCT negotiations in the CD as part of its Programme of Work. Our Prime Minister stated on 13th August, 2006 that India is willing to join only a non-discriminatory, multilaterally negotiated and internationally verifiable FMCT as and when it is concluded in the Conference on Disarmament, provided our security interests are fully addressed. India is a nuclear weapon state and a responsible member of the world community, and would approach these negotiations as such.

India continues to attach importance to addressing wide-spread international demands for conclusion of an agreement on effective international arrangements to assure non-nuclear weapon states against the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. As part of its credible minimum nuclear deterrent, India has espoused the policy of 'No First Use' and non-use against non-nuclear weapon states and is prepared to convert these undertakings into multilateral legal arrangements. India is committed to maintaining its voluntary, unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing.

India would support continuing international efforts to strengthen the international legal framework to ensure the safety and security of space assets and to prevent the weaponization of outer space. Issues relating to the possession and use of missiles should be addressed in a sustainable and comprehensive manner through a global process based on the principle of equal and legitimate security.

India attaches importance to the continuing role of the UN in addressing conventional arms control, including regulation of small arms and light weapons in view of the nexus between small arms proliferation and terrorism. We remain strongly committed to the CCW process as being vitally important in strengthening regulation of armed conflict and international humanitarian law. India has ratified all the five protocols. It will be India's honour to Chair the Annual meeting of States Parties to Protocol V in November this year.

Last year, India welcomed the opening of the new UN Regional Centre for peace and Disarmament in Asia and Pacific in Kathmandu. India will extend all possible support for the Kathmandu Centre to fulfill its mandate.

Mr. Chairman,

As in the previous year, India seeks the support of the First Committee for the following three resolutions:

- a) Convention on the Prohibition of Use of Nuclear Weapons
- b) Reducing Nuclear Danger
- c) Measures to prevent terrorists from acquiring Weapons of Mass Destruction:

We will be making more detailed statements to introduce these resolutions during the time allocated for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman,

We would like to assure you of our full support in ensuring the success of this year's deliberations.

775. Statement by the Deputy Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri during the General Debate of the Special Political and Decolonization Committee (Fourth Committee) of the UNGA.

New York, October 9, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

India's independence in 1947 was one of the most important milestones in the history of decolonization. The deliberations of the Fourth Committee, and in particular the items on decolonization, therefore have a special significance for India. My delegation attaches the greatest importance to the deliberations of this Committee. My delegation wishes to congratulate you on your assumption of the chairmanship of this Committee, and assures you and other members of the Bureau of the fullest support and cooperation in the conduct of its business. Mr Chairman, We are about to compete the first decade of the 21st century. It is a sad reflection that we still continue to concern ourselves with the issue of colonialism. Colonialism is a product and a concept of an exploitative past. It runs contrary to the principles of sovereign equality on which the United Nations and other modern multilateral systems are grounded. It is anachronistic, archaic and outmoded; it contravenes the fundamental tenets of democracy, freedom, human dignity and human rights.

Mr. Chairman,

One of the greatest achievements of the United Nations has been to rid the world, or most of it, of this scourge. Nearly 50 years ago, the Declaration on Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (Resolution 1514), boldly set forth our goal: "the end of colonialism in all its manifestations". We can legitimately claim to have largely fulfilled the trust imposed by the Charter and the Declaration. 80 million people living in 60 former territories have been decolonized and much of the world is free. Decolonization has been perhaps the greatest success story of the United Nations. Yet, the goal set out in the Declaration has not been fully realized. In December 2000, the 55th United Nations General Assembly mandated a second international Decade for the Eradication of Colonialism (2000-2010). The 16 Non Self Governing Territories in the UN list serve as constant reminders that the business of decolonization is not yet complete.

Mr. Chairman,

Resolution 1541 (XV) further defined full self-government as being one of three options; independence; free association with an independent state; or integration into an independent state. We need to ensure that the achievement of these goals is approached with a combination of urgency and activism and sensitivity and circumspection. In doing so, special attention needs to be paid to the needs of the people of the Territories themselves. Many of the Territories have made considerable progress in their political, constitutional, economic and social development and have gone a long way towards self-government. The issue is of finding the appropriate format and timing for the completion of decolonization in each Territory. The role of the Special Committee and indeed of the UN as a whole here is crucial as it is delicate; ascertaining the political aspirations of the people in each of these territories and, taking into account the stages of development and advancement of each territory, so that they are enabled to acquire for themselves political and socio-economic institution and structures of their choice.

Mr. Chairman,

The administering Powers have a special responsibility in this regard. Their role is crucial in attaining the objectives that we have laid down for ourselves. The Special Committee on Decolonization has sought to engage the administering Powers in a constructive and meaningful discussion on the fate of the remaining Non Self Governing Territories, as cooperation, and not confrontation, is the key to our work. We are happy to note that this spirit has imbued the ongoing dialogue with the administering Powers.

Dissemination of relevant information regarding options that many be available to the people in the Territories is crucial. On occasion, the local population may be unaware of the legitimate political options available to them. For real constitutional and political advancement to occur, the peoples of a Territory must have sustained access to unbiased information about their options. Visits by UN Missions to Non Self Governing Territories and the conduct of Regional Seminars by Special Committee of 24 are important tools to bridge this information deficit in the process of decolonization. The instrumentality of visiting Missions helps in the collection of adequate, first-hand information on conditions in their Territories and in ascertaining the wishes and aspirations of the peoples concerning their future status. Such missions are also important in the contest of furthering modalities and action plans for decolonization and observing acts of self-determination. We hope that the administering powers would continue to extend their full cooperation in facilitating such visits.

Mr. Chairman,

India as a founding-member of the UN and the Special Committee has been in the vanguard of the struggle against colonialism. We are privileged to have been a co-sponsor of the Declaration on Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. We reaffirm our commitment to the noble ideals enshrined in the Declaration as we come to the end of the Second International Decade for the Eradication of Colonialism.

Thank You.

776. Statement by the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on Agenda Item 104: 'Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice' and Agenda Item 105 - 'International Drug Control' at the Third Committee of the 63rd Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 9, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me begin by thanking the Executive Director of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) for his statement in this Committee yesterday and also the Secretary General for all his reports under this Agenda Items related to 'Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice' and 'International Drug Control'.

Mr. Chairman,

Terrorism is the scourge of our times. It undermines peace, democracy and freedom, endangering the international community and humankind as a whole. India has been a victim of terrorism for decades. The barbaric terrorist attack on the innocent people of Mumbai on November 26, 2008 reminded us of the daily and malignant menace that terrorism poses to all countries.

Our diplomatic missions are also being targeted. In July 2008, the Embassy of India in Kabul was subject to a dastardly attack in which a large number of people lost their life, including Indian diplomats, security personnel and scores of Afghan civilians.

Earlier today, our Embassy in Kabul was again subjected to yet another terrorist attack, which has resulted in injury of Indian security personnel as well as death of large number of Afghan civilians. Countless innocent lives have been lost to heinous terrorist attacks. It is imperative that our resolve against perpetrators of such attacks now be manifested in a strong and resolute manner.

While it is important for the international community to condemn terrorism and these attacks in an unequivocal manner, it is also critical that we strengthen the legal framework in the fight against terrorism. The Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT) has been under negotiations for years at the UN and, indeed, the Working Group on CCIT is meeting right now. It is time for the global community to conclude the negotiations and make a firm commitment by adopting the Convention.

Mr. Chairman,

We would like to express our profound concern on the deep-rooted nexus between drug mafias, arms dealers, and money launderers for financing terrorism. This is a grave, dangerous and destructive nexus. There is a need to create as well as reinforce bilateral, regional and international cooperation to develop strategies to combat the menace of this nexus. We support the efforts of the UNODC in providing necessary assistance to countries to put in place appropriate counterterrorism legislation. More efforts are also needed at national, regional and international level to implement practical measures on the ground to tackle this.

Mr. Chairman,

A notable observation in this year's World Drug Report (2009) has been the evidence of reduction in the cultivation of crops for drugs and decline in the demand for illicit drugs globally. Perhaps, it is time that we build on these gains by strengthening our efforts to tackle this menace.

In this regard, the Secretary General's report on 'international cooperation against the world drug problem' has rightly identified long-term national and international political as well as financial commitment to the alternative development programmes of supply reduction strategies as the cornerstone in the fight against the menace of illicit drug. Unfortunately, there has not been substantial support for these activities by the international community in the affected regions.

We would like to voice our support for such initiatives by strengthening not just North-South cooperation but also South-South cooperation by sharing of best practices and lessons learnt as well as by providing technical assistance. It should be our endeavour to further strengthen our efforts in providing sustainable alternative livelihood to the cultivators of these crops and strive for overall economic development of such regions.

Mr. Chairman,

The need to counter the problem of drug addiction is imperative. While harm reduction approach has been tried, countries and policy makers should make an informed and evidence based decision on this issue.

India is the world's largest producers of licit opium. Therefore, we pursue balanced drug control measures. We ensure that the demand and supply of licit opiates required for genuine medicinal and scientific purposes is maintained and there is no proliferation of manufacture beyond the traditional and established manufacturers of licit opiate. In this context we welcome INCB's contribution in monitoring the balance between demand and supply for opiate for legitimate purposes.

Mr. Chairman

India has evolved its Code of Criminal Procedure and other relevant laws to ensure speedy justice to all. This also takes into account the rights of citizen. India has enacted strong anti-money laundering domestic legislation and has also entered into bilateral agreements with several countries to develop joint programs to prevent money laundering, counter terrorism and organized crime. India is a signatory to the UN Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and its three Protocols as well as the UN Convention against Corruption.

Mr. Chairman,

International peace and security is the very bedrock of every nation. No amount of social progress can secure us against transnational organized crime, illicit drugs, money laundering and international terrorism. Problems of such transnational nature and global magnitude can only be dealt with cooperation at the national, regional and international level. India remains committed to working bilaterally and through regional and international cooperation towards a world free of transnational organized crime, illicit drugs, money laundering, illegal arms transactions and last but not the least, terrorism.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

777. Statement by Dr. Anupam Ray, Counsellor, exercising Right of Reply on the issue of Jammu & Kashmir, during the General Debate of the Special Political and Decolonization Committee (Fourth Committee) on October 09, 2009

Mr. Chairman,

The distinguished delegate of Pakistan went back to the language of the past during his intervention. This has necessitated our exercising this right of reply.

We had hoped that their focus would be on the crying need of the hour which is dismantling the infrastructure of terrorism and taking resolute action against those who perpetrate terrorist acts.

Jammu and Kashmir is an integral part of the Union of India and participates in the democratic process of India. We would also like to remind them that there is no place for bilateral disputes in multilateral fora.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman

778. Statement by the Minister of State in the Ministry of External Affairs Shashi Tharoor during the commemoration of the Fifteenth Anniversary of the International Conference on Population and Development at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 12, 2009.

Mr. President,

Sir As I am speaking for the first time in the UN General Assembly as the representative of India, please allow me to congratulate you on your election as the President of the General Assembly.

I am honoured and privileged to participate in today's open debate to commemorate the 15th anniversary of the International Conference on Population and Development, which was a major international initiative on an issue of critical importance for India.

Mr. President, Excellencies, Distinguished Delegates,

The International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) held in Cairo in 1994 was a landmark Conference. Overcoming deep divisions among member states, it succeeded in forging an unprecedented global consensus and integrated the diverse range of population, development and human rights issues into a blueprint for 20 years of action, popularly known as the Cairo consensus. The Programme of Action addressed the complex interrelationships amongst population, economic growth and sustainable development, as well as population distribution, gender equality and empowerment of women, urbanization, migration, data collection and analysis.

For the first time, the population and development issues were dealt with in a holistic manner and individual human beings were placed at the very heart of the development process. There was a substantive effort to clarify the concept of reproductive rights and the programme also emphasized the centrality of reproductive health. It also acknowledged the central role of women and young people in the development process. In my own country, this led to a shift in the Government's approach towards population stabilization from being target based to one based on making informed and voluntary choices. The Cairo Consensus provided much of the groundwork for the Millennium Development Goals, which have now become the benchmark indicators for socio-economic development. Mr. President, I would like to pay tribute today to two women leaders of the UN system who have also been friends and close colleagues of mine: Dr. Nafir Sadik of Pakistan, the Secretary General of the Cairo Conference and a long-serving and effective leader of UNFPA, and Dr. Thoraya Obaid of Saudi Arabia, Dr. Sadik's dynamic and dedicated successor. Their work in promoting the rights of women remains indispensable to the future of our planet. India is bound to applaud and support their efforts. Today's event offers us an invaluable opportunity to comprehensively review the progress made so far and analyse the challenges that lie ahead. The statements of the Secretary General and the President of the General Assembly have underscored the critical importance of realising the vision set out 15 years ago.

A review would indicate that the global achievements have been mixed at best. There have been slippages internationally as well as in many countries, including my own. It is a matter of regret that globally, we are still far from realizing the goal of universal primary education, infant and child mortality and maternal mortality rates continue to remain high and access to universal reproductive health is still distant in many parts of the world. Nevertheless, it is my firm belief that these goals are still achievable. Resolute political will and concerted global action are needed to realise these goals. The benchmarks set by the ICPD Conference continue to highlight the onerous task ahead for all of us.

Mr. President,

India has been making a steady progress towards realizing the vision of the ICPD and attainment of the Millennium Development Goals. Despite the global economic slowdown, the Government of India has accorded very high priority to the education and health sectors, and has enhanced allocation by 19% to the social sector during the current financial year. The National Rural Health Mission (NRHM), launched in 2005, is one of the biggest interventions of its kind in the health sector in the world. The NRHM seeks to significantly upgrade effective healthcare throughout India covering over 600 million people. It aims to improve access of rural people, especially poor women and children, to equitable, affordable, accountable and effective primary healthcare. The Reproductive and Child Health Programme is one of the main components of the NRHM, and includes the ambitious programme of Janani Surakhksa Yojana (JSY), a safe motherhood intervention to promote institutional delivery with specific focus on poor pregnant women. So far, this programme has benefited more than 10 million women and has emerged as a major successful intervention in reducing maternal and infant mortality. As Dr. Obaid reminded us, no woman should die giving life. In statistical terms, India's Infant Mortality Rate is 55 per 1000 live births. Maternal Mortality Ratio has declined from 301 in the period 2001-03 to 254 in the period 2004-06. These are areas that require major attention on our part and our Government is seized of the problem. As regards the incidence of HIV/AIDS, it remains under 1% and is showing signs of reaching a plateau.

India's Family Planning Programme is one of the oldest in the world. It is based on the voluntary and informed choice and consent of citizens in availing of reproductive health care services. The programme aims at achieving population stabilization by addressing unmet needs through decentralized planning and programme implementation.

At primary health care institutions, there has been an integration of the HIV/AIDS programme with reproductive health care. India's Eleventh Plan recognizes that the "Development of Children is at the Centre of the Plan." This abiding policy commitment to an integrated approach to enhancing young child survival, growth, development and early learning is being translated into action through the Integrated Child Development Services (ICDS) Universalization with Quality Initiative. ICDS is today the world's largest early child development programme reaching out to over 78 million young children and pregnant and lactating mothers. There is added emphasis on convergence of services under various schemes and programmes including health, early childhood education and safe drinking water, so as to achieve the desired impact. India has also embarked on ambitious programmes for human resource development. The Sarva Siksha Abhiyan (Education for All Campaign) launched in the year 2000, is a major national intervention towards achieving universal primary education and allowing us to reap the benefits of a demographic dividend from a young population. This year the Government of India has brought into force the Right to Education Act. This Act aims to guarantee to each child, up-to the age of fourteen, the right to education. The Government has also launched a Female Literacy Mission this year with the aim of reducing female illiteracy by half, in the next three years. Gender equity and empowerment have been guiding principles in the development policies of the Government of India. India's planning process is fully committed to enabling women to be equal partners in development. Gender budgeting has been introduced across all the sectors. We have also moved on empowering women in the area of governance and decision making. The 73rd and 74th constitutional amendments introduced the provision for one-third reservation of seats for women in local self government institutions in India. We now have the distinction of having the largest number of women representatives in local government in the world and some three million of them hold elected office

Mr. President,

In these difficult times when the world is still grappling with the adverse effects of an unprecedented global economic and financial crisis, developing countries, where the crisis did not originate, have been the most affected. This threatens to undermine and even reverse the gains made so far in their arduous journey of development. Therefore, the need for donors to honour their pledges and the international community to keep up the stimulus and other efforts to spur the economies of developing countries cannot be overemphasized. The Government of India remains firmly committed to realizing the vision set out in Cairo 15 years ago and to fulfilling the MDGs by 2015. While we shall certainly do all that we can domestically and within our capacities with our partners in the South, it is imperative that the international community meet its commitments in the global partnership that is critical for a better quality of life for all of us on our shared planet.

Thank you.

779. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Prof. Saif-ud-Din-Soz on Agenda Item 61 - Macro-economic Policy Questions [B] International Financial System and development; [C] External Debt and Development: Towards a Durable Solution to the Debt Problems of Developing Countries; and [D] Commodities, at the Second Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 12, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

We would like to thank the Secretary-General for the useful reports on the macroeconomic policy questions being considered on the agenda today. We associate ourselves with the statement made by the Chair of the Group of 77.

Mr. Chairman,

As we all know, since last year we have been witness to an extraordinary crisis in the international financial system. Paradoxically, developing countries, where the crisis did not originate, have been the worst hit. Its multi-dimensional impact has been well elaborated upon, and I need not reiterate the same. Instead, what is of paramount importance today is the need to revive the global economy, and the complex challenges this poses for developing countries. The road to recovery remains slow and arduous, despite the scant green shoots of recovery visible in some areas. We are happy that concerted efforts were made early on to launch stimulus measures for counteracting the crisis. We believe this has borne fruit. We must now avoid the tendency to prematurely withdraw these stimulus measures under the misguided objective of an "orderly exit". India too has been affected by the financial crisis. However, our economy has shown greater resilience and we hope to resume robust growth shortly.

Our targeted interventions, including large stimulus measures, have assisted this process. However, we must also be conscious that many developing countries are not in a position to implement counter-cyclical measures or boost demand. There is, thus, an urgent need for international assistance in this regard. While we are happy that Official Development Assistance [ODA] in 2008 reversed a declining trend of many years, ODA flows are still far below committed levels. Moreover, we need to ensure that the ongoing crisis does not lead to a reduction in aid disbursements. In order to ensure an early return to global growth, we must encourage growth in developing countries through counter-cyclical measures. The loss in demand in developed countries has directly translated into a fall in exports of developing countries, and a consequent adverse impact on employment and growth. This lost export demand needs to be made up through expansion in other components of domestic demand like investment. In this context, India has been advocating increased infrastructure investment in developing countries. This measure would also serve to lay the basis for a high-growth trajectory in future.

However, as the report of the Secretary General also notes, the crisis has led to a sharp fall in foreign capital flows, including Foreign Direct Investment. Therefore, proactive efforts are required by the international financial institutions to encourage growth-oriented investment. In order to permit financial institutions, including regional development banks, perform this role, India supports an expansion in their capital base. But onerous conditionalities in disbursement of funds would be a self-defeating exercise. Developing countries must have the necessary policy space to implement policies suited to their unique circumstances. Unfortunately, the boom and bust cycles of commodities continue, and the sharp volatility in commodity prices witnessed over the last year is eloquent testimony to this.

Developing countries dependent on commodity exports have naturally been the most affected. However, the spike in prices of food and other imports has also adversely impacted commodity-importing developing countries. It is imperative that we collectively address the shortcomings of the commodity markets, including eliminating agricultural subsidies by developed countries, and improving regulation on speculative activities. Greater international efforts are also required to assist low-income commodity-dependent developing countries to launch their economies on a sustained growth path. The issue of external debt is also an area of special concern. It is encouraging that total external debt of developing countries as a share of GNI decreased from 25% in 2007 to 21.8% in 2008. However, as the report of the Secretary-General itself highlights, this aggregate figure hides severe disparities amongst countries. The situation for many countries has also been worsened by the financial crisis, and it is imperative that we consider special measures to assist such countries. We also need more transparent and objective debt sustainability analysis frameworks. Further, such frameworks must also distinguish between solvency and liquidity problems.

Mr. Chairman,

There is widespread recognition of the need for more effective regulation of the international financial system. We must collectively act to avoid a repetition of such a crisis. We are concerned at the increasing protectionist tendencies in developed countries. We must eschew protectionism in any form, be it in movement of goods and persons or in financial services. Such measures will only serve to delay the global recovery. In our efforts to address the crisis, let us not create problems for the future.

The crisis has also underscored the urgent need to reform international governance structures. We welcome recent moves in this regard. However, much deeper changes are required, including at least an initial 7% transfer in quotas at the IMF to developing countries. We must ensure the full and effective participation of the developing world in the global financial and economic architecture, including in the governance structures of norm-setting and decision-making bodies. We are happy that a UN Conference on the financial and economic crisis was held here in New York earlier this year. The inclusive platform of the UN provides an important opportunity to hear the voices of the most affected. We look forward to the follow-up process of this Conference, particularly the work of the ad-hoc working group. India is also actively participating in the G-20 process, which has been at the forefront of efforts to tackle the crisis. Before concluding, Mr. Chairman, permit me to reiterate the critical need for a stable and inclusive international financial system that assists development efforts. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

780. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Bhartruhari Mahatab on Agenda Item 62 - [A] Advancement of Women and [B] Implementation of the outcome of the 4th World Conference on Women and of the 23rd Special Session of the General Assembly at the Third Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 13, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, please allow me to thank the Secretary General for his reports on this agenda item. Our delegation would like to align itself with the statement made by the Chair of the G77 in this Committee.

Mr. Chairman,

Advancement and empowerment of women is one of the most critical aspects of social development in all parts of the world. The centrality of women in our society can hardly be overstated. We, therefore, need to do all that is possible for the effective implementation of policies that would give women their rightful place in society. The beneficial impact of such empowerment can only have the most positive of impacts on all aspects of development and the achieving of the Millennium Development Goals.

Mr. Chairman,

The year that has just gone by has been one of the most difficult ones for most countries in the developing world with a disproportionately adverse impact on their economies even though they were not the cause of the global crisis. Within this disproportionate impact, women were among those most seriously affected as has been mentioned in various reports of the Secretary General.

The report on "the improvement of the situation of women in rural areas" notes that the current crisis exacerbated the inequalities and discrimination faced by women as they were the first to lose their jobs and social security while their household responsibility of care giving increased. Although countries have undertaken domestic responses to tackle this situation, the need for international cooperation and increased contributions to bilateral and multilateral financial assistance programs for developing countries cannot be overemphasized.

Mr. Chairman,

Since adoption of its Constitution in 1950, India has been taking numerous steps to ensure equality of women in all walks of life. Empowering women politically, educationally, economically and legally has been a major objective of the Government of India. The National Policy for Empowerment of Women seeks the creation of an environment conducive for the development of women; ending discrimination against women; and providing equal access to health care, education, employment and social security. The 11th Five Year Plan (2007-2012) has recognized women as agents of sustained socio-economic growth and change. Gender has been made a cross-cutting theme in all the development plans. The Ministry of Women and Child Development is implementing a number of programmes to achieve holistic empowerment of women through schemes that provide micro credit and support systems like working women's hostels, short stay homes and crèches.

One, particularly, successful scheme has been the women's empowerment programme, namely, the "Swayamsidha", which means "self help". This scheme seeks to empower women by creating economically sustainable Self Help Groups. It serves the purpose of generating awareness, ensuring access to resources and a sustained process of mobilization. This programme is a silent revolution for empowering women; as a result, more than 2.2 million Self Help Groups were created across the country, covering 33 million households.

Mr. Chairman,

Representation of women in the political processes of our country not only reflects our commitment to the advancement of women at every level but also gives them an opportunity to be heard on their terms. We are proud of the fact that India has given women equal voting rights right from our independence, more than 60 years ago. We have also successfully implemented reservation of 33% seats in urban and local self government for women, thereby giving more than one million women a voice at the grassroot level. The Government has also recently approved increasing this percentage to 50%, subject, of course, to approval of Parliament.

The Parliament, on its part, has a Joint Parliamentary Committee on Empowerment of Women which is charged with the task of ensuring that legislations in India are gender sensitive. Further, to ensure that gender sensitive policies are not abandoned for lack of funds, most of the Ministries and Departments of the Government have put in place Gender Budgeting. This initiative helps to monitor the actual implementation of policies and programs meant to benefit women.

Mr. Chairman,

While development and empowerment of women is one side of the coin, the flip side is the rampant problem of exploitation and violence against women. Apart from taking measures to punish the perpetrators of such crimes, we are also taking steps to rehabilitate victims and strengthen the legal system to prevent such crimes. India has enacted the "Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act" that has given women a powerful tool in the fight against domestic violence. The most recent initiative to follow-up on the legislation is the "National Campaign on Prevention of Violence against Women (2009-2015)" which was launched on October 2nd this year, the 140th birth anniversary of Mahatma Gandhi.

Mr. Chairman,

It has often been said that there are occasions when we must forget or unlearn the lessons of the past in order to progress. Women have been repressed and discriminated against for centuries even though they perform some of the most integral and socially valuable tasks in our homes and in the work place. Mahatma Gandhi had said nearly a century ago, "[woman] has the right to participate in the minutest details of the activities of man and she has an equal right of freedom and liberty with him". It is in our hands to channel the tremendous energy and potential that women have by giving them the rightful place in the society.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

781. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Rajendrasinh G. Rana on Agenda Item 133 - Programming Planning at the Fifth Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 13, 2009.

I would like to begin by expressing our appreciation to the Chairman of the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC), for introducing the Committee's report. We commend him for his stewardship of the Committee during the 49th session. We also thank the other representatives of the Secretariat for introducing their respective reports. My delegation aligns itself with the statement made by the distinguished representative of Sudan on behalf of the Group of 77.

My delegation reaffirms the importance of the CPC as the main subsidiary body of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council for planning, programming and coordination. The CPC's significance is further highlighted by its critical role in ensuring that the United Nations' programmes adhere to the letter and spirit of the legislative mandates given by the Member States to the implementing entities. It also identifies programmatic changes arising out of decisions by intergovernmental bodies and relevant conferences. Moreover, the CPC is a unique intergovernmental body within the UN system, which facilitates coordination amongst the multitude of its institutions and mandates. Given the critical role of the CPC in this Organization, we believe it should be provided with all resources necessary for it to fulfill its mandated tasks. We also commend the CPC's sincere efforts in improving its working methods within the framework of its mandate, as directed by relevant UN General Assembly resolutions.

My delegation endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the CPC of its 49th session. We urge the Secretariat to take full cognizance of the Committee's recommendations while implementing its mandated tasks, once the report has been adopted by the General Assembly. In particular, we support the CPC's recommendation on approval of the changes in the biennial programme plan reflected in the programme budget for the biennium 2008-2009 and programme budget for the biennium 2010-2011 as contained in the relevant consolidated reports of the Secretary-General. The importance of evaluations within the Organization cannot be overemphasized. While processes and procedures for evaluation by the Office of Internal Oversight Services [OIOS] and self-evaluation by programme managers should continue to be reviewed and improved, the Secretary-General should ensure that evaluations are used to contribute to and improve future policy decisions by programme managers. We look forward to the programme evaluation of the Department of Economic and Social Affairs in 2011, and thematic evaluation of Department of Peacekeeping Operations/Department of Field Support cooperation with regional organizations, as was decided by the CPC in its 49th session.

The CPC has recommended the urgent need to fill the position of Special Adviser on Africa. This is critical and we echo the stress that the Committee lays on it. In this context, we recall GA resolution 63/260 by which the General Assembly had decided not to abolish the post of Special Adviser on Africa. In one of its earlier report, the CPC had called the UN system a "crucial pillar" in canvassing, mobilizing and dispensing international support for special needs countries. Any structural alignment which threatens to weaken the UN's focus on special needs of these countries should be carefully examined. On the in-depth evaluation of the Department of Political Affairs [DPA], we concur with the CPC that the OIOS should refrain from value judgments on issues that are still under the consideration by the General Assembly.

The OIOS should also take into account the decision of the General Assembly on strengthening the DPA when evaluating the future implementation of the OIOS recommendations endorsed by the CPC at its 46th session. We take note of the report of the OIOS on the thematic evaluation of lessons learned: protocol and practices. We hope that it would further help staff to improve the work environment, including knowledge sharing, foster teamwork, strengthen outputs and promote efficiency. Finally, my delegation recognizes the importance of the United Nations' coordinating bodies, such as the UN Chief Executives Board for Coordination (CEB). We have taken note of the thematic evaluation of the United Nations coordinating bodies and join our voice in calling for further enhancement in their work in order to improve the effectiveness of programme delivery and organizational performance of their member organizations. To achieve that goal, the coordinating bodies will have to hold meetings on regular and predictable basis, achieve better follow up to their decisions and develop mechanism to regularly and systematically measure their own performance. India as a privileged member of the Committee for Programme and Coordination would continue to closely follow all these important issues in the future sessions.

Thank you.

782. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Kalyan Banerjee on Agenda Item 83: 'The Rule of Law at the National and International Levels' at the sixth Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 14, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

I congratulate you on your election as Chairman of this Committee and also congratulate Bureau Members on their election. I am sure that under your able guidance this Committee will make good progress. I assure you of my delegation's full cooperation and support.

I also thank the Secretary General for his Report on strengthening and coordinating United Nations rule of law activities. The Report illustrates the key achievements, identifies the areas in need of further concerted action and highlights the ongoing implementation of the SG's recommendations made last year.

Mr. Chairman,

We align ourselves with the statement made by Iran on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement. India strongly adheres to the rule of law both at the international and national levels. We see the promotion of the rule of law as an essential tool for ensuring sustainable development and peaceful co-existence and cooperation among States.

Mr. Chairman,

We welcome the initiation of the rule of law dialogue with the Member States by the Rule of Law Coordination and Resource Group, supported by the Rule of Law Unit. We hope that the Rule of law unit will move towards approaches that are nationally-driven, sustainable, and that can garner requisite political and popular support.

We are pleased to note that the Rule of Law Coordination and Resource Group has agreed on a Joint Strategic Plan for 2009-2010 to focus on the UN approach to the rule of law assistance, justice for children, and on constitution making.

Mr. Chairman,

This year, the focus of our debate on this agenda item is on the sub-topic 'promoting rule of law at the international level'. In this context, I would like to mention that the very concept of the promotion of rule of law at international level is ingrained in the Charter of the United Nations which is further supplemented by the international human rights law, international humanitarian law, international criminal law and international refugee law.

These universally established and universally applicable rules and standards also serve as the normative basis for the activities undertaken by the United Nations in support of justice and the rule of law at the international level. This international legal order is further strengthened by the international justice system comprising of the ICJ and other international tribunals and courts.

Mr. Chairman,

One of the aspects of the promotion of rule of law at international level is the implementation by States at the national level of the obligations taken by them under international treaties and agreements. India follows this requirement very rigorously in respect of the treaties to which it is a party. Compliance with the rule of law at the national level assures respect for mother, land and people and helps underprivileged to get justice, dignity and empowerment. It also helps to strengthen the linkages not only between municipal law and international law but also democracy. Our judicial system oversees that the rule of law is enforced at the national level.

Mr. Chairman,

In the Millennium Declaration the world leaders resolved to strengthen respect for the rule of law at the national and international levels. In 2005 World Summit Outcome Document, the Heads of State or Government again reaffirmed their commitment to an international order based on the rule of law.

Mr. Chairman,

Strengthening the rule of law at the international level is critical to effectively address global challenges. The promotion of rule of law at the international level is fundamental in promoting democracy, human rights, sustainable development, free and fair markets, fighting international crime and terrorism, and promoting justice and peace, especially in post conflict societies. In this regard, support for capacity building in the developing countries is crucial so that they can fulfill their obligations at the national level effectively.

Mr. Chairman,

The United Nations has played a commendable role in restoring justice and the rule of law in States in post conflict situations. There is a need to incorporate and strengthen the rule of law component in the UN Peace Missions with a view to address a number of issues, including the human rights violations.

This may be achieved in a number of ways, including by establishing national tribunals, truth and reconciliation mechanisms, victim reparation programs, providing international rule of law assistance, advising the host country rule of law institutions and putting the right laws and institutional arrangements in place.

The institutional arrangements may be strengthened further by providing training to the lawyers and judges and by building local expertise. All these measures would help improve the likelihood of success of a peace mission.

Mr. Chairman,

In addition to the United Nations there are other stakeholders, such as donor governments and non-governmental organizations that are also engaged in the area of promotion of rule of law at the international and national levels. Therefore better coordination and coherence in this regard is necessary to avoid duplication of efforts minimize waste of resources. For this purpose there is an urgent need to strengthen the Rule of Law Assistance Unit in the Secretariat. However, the policy issues that are being debated elsewhere in the UN in the context of system wide coherence should not be linked to the coordination functions of this Group or Unit.

Mr. Chairman,

We must strengthen the rule of law at all levels - national, international and institutional. In addition to the promotion of the rule of law at the national and international level there is a need to promote the rule of law at the institutional level as well. To ensure transparency, fairness and adherence to the rule of law in the UN, it is necessary that the mandate of one organ of the UN should not be infringed upon by the other organ of the UN. It is also necessary to strengthen those institutional policies and processes that ensure a just and effective international order based on rule of law.

Mr. Chairman,

A number of recommendations have made by the Secretary General in his Report to move the rule of law agenda forward. These recommendations require serious consideration by this Committee.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

783. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Chinta Mohan on Agenda Item 65 - "Promotion and Protection of Children" at the Third Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 16, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

I and my delegation on behalf of India thank the Secretary-General for his reports on children.

Children are important for our future. For the "World Fit for Children", we must give priority for their welfare and rights.

Secretary-General in his reports mentioned that 9 million children are dying before they reach one year of age, 75 million children do not have access for education, as well as 200 million are handicapped due to malnutrition and lack of healthcare.

Official Development Assistance (ODA) increased last year but there is a shortfall.

Mr. Chairman,

Secretary-General said India has eliminated tetanus in children and pregnant women in some parts of the country. India is taking all efforts for 100% eradication of Polio, tuberculosis and Diphtheria in India.

Mr. Chairman,

I would like to enlighten what we have done in India for children. 35 years back in 1975, we started Integrated Child Development Scheme. Under this Scheme, presently, we have nearly 140,000 Anganwadi children development schools to give nutritious meal to 34 million children and 7 million pregnant women.

Through the National Rural Health Mission, we are encouraging hospital delivery for all pregnant women. After delivery, we are giving financial assistance to needy for purchase of clothes for the new born, soaps for the new born and cradle for the new born children. We have also earmarked 100 million US dollars for building world class children hospitals in various parts of India, including my hometown, Tirupathi, in the State of Andhra Pradesh.

Mr. Chairman,

With the efforts of Madam Sonia Gandhi, Chairperson of United Progressive Alliance, Government of India, we are having mid-day meal programme for 140 million children every day in the schools. With this programme, we are giving high protein diet, eggs and fish twice a week to these children.

Mr. Chairman,

We enacted the Right to Education Act in order to provide free and compulsory education for all children below the age of 14 years. We also got an Act of the Parliament to ban child labour and violence against children.

Mr. Chairman,

I would like to quote the famous man Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, former Prime Minister of India. He said, "Children are our future. Investment in the future and health care of the children will be more useful to the world".

Mr. Chairman,

I conclude here by saying that India is the country, which is taking care of children from day one of the life in the womb till they attain the age of 14 years, the health, welfare, protection and rights.

No world can be safe unless we protect our own children for the future. I request the international community, all the leaders in the world to safeguard millions of children dying in infancy, millions of children who do not have access for education and millions of children who do not have nutritious food and healthcare by increasing ODA (Official Development Assistance) and see that there is no shortfall in these finances.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

784. Statement by the Minister of State in the Ministry of External Affairs Mrs. Preet Kaur on Sports for Peace and Development: Building a Peaceful and Better World through Sports and Olympic deal at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 19, 2009.

Mr. President,

I am honoured and privileged to participate in today's discussion on "Sport for peace and development: building a peaceful and better world through sport and the Olympic ideal".

As I am speaking for the first time in the 64th session of the General Assembly, please allow me at the outset to add my voice to that of all the others in congratulating you on assuming the Presidency of the General Assembly.

Mr. President,

By its very nature, sport is about inclusion and participation. It brings individuals and communities together and bridges ethnic and cultural divides.

It transcends social-cultural barriers, geographical borders, and promotes peace and harmony.

It also provides for understanding the importance of discipline and leadership.

Mr. President,

Sport is an inalienable part of the educational process and an essential component of a child's development.

It also fosters their physical and emotional health and building valuable social connections.

The fundamental elements of sports, including obvious benefits of physical and mental well being, make sports a most useful tool to support the achievements of the Millennium Development Goals.

Moreover, sporting activities have a unique convening power to spur social communication and advocacy.

They are most effective tools for social mobilisation supporting activities such as HIV/AIDS education and immunization campaigns.

In re-channelizing destructive impulses and harmful actions such as drug abuse and involvement in crime, the efficacy of sport cannot be overemphasized.

Mr. President,

A mastery over sports was considered as important as the knowledge of scriptures in ancient India.

The education system in modern India is trying to continue and build upon this heritage and respect for sports and physical education.

The effort of the Government of India has been for broad-basing sports and provision of modern sports infrastructure.

A National Sports Policy was adopted by India in 2001.

The Ministry of Youth Affairs and Sports in the Government of India has the national level responsibility for sports with the Sports Authority of India being its principal arm for nurturing talent and for provision of infrastructure, equipment, coaching and other facilities.

And, here, if I may add a personal touch - I am, indeed, proud that India's National Institute of Sports is located in my constituency, Patiala and my family has been and is intimately connected with the Olympic movement.

The Government has also encouraged the National Sports Federations to function more efficiently and is also encouraging the active involvement of business and industry in the promotion of sports.

Mr. President,

We are proud that New Delhi will be hosting the next Commonwealth Games from October 3-14, 2010.

These games are a unique, world class, multi-sport event held once every four years amongst the member countries and territories of the Commonwealth.

The three core values of the Commonwealth Games movement are humanity, equality and destiny, which were adopted by the games movement in 2001.

These values inspire and unite millions of people and symbolise the broad mandate for holding the games within the Commonwealth.

Last year, India organised Commonwealth Youth Games, a sub-event of the Commonwealth Games in Pune in October 2008.

Mr. President,

The founder of modern Olympic Games, Pierre de Coubertin, had said, "Sport must be the heritage of all men and of all social classes".

India is steadfast in its commitment to the Olympic charter and, as in previous years, is cosponsoring in the General Assembly the resolution on "Sport for peace and development: building a peaceful and better world through sport and the Olympic ideal.

We are also very pleased that the 2016 Olympics have been awarded to Rio de Janeiro in Brazil, a fellow developing country, and that the 2010 FIFA World Cup will be hosted by South Africa, a first for the African continent. We are also co-sponsoring the resolution on the "2010 FIFA World Cup in South Africa.

We also wish Canada all success in organizing the XXI Winter Olympic Games and X Para-Olympic Winter Games and commend Singapore's initiative to organize the Youth Olympic Games.

We have no doubt that the hosting of major global sporting events in developing countries would contribute in an immense manner to the advancement of sports in developing countries and spur developmental activities.

Mr. President,

Sport is a reflection of the society. The degeneration of values in the society - violence, corruption, hooliganism, deception and drug abuse are also making inroads in sport.

Concerted vigil and resolute action are needed to prevent intrusion of these evils and to protect the noble ideals and spirit behind the Olympic Games and other sports.

It must be our endeavour to promote sports and a culture of sports in our countries. This can only contribute in promoting development, peace, friendship, cooperation and understanding among peoples.

I thank you.

785. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN T. K. S. Elangovan on Agenda Item 56: Groups of Countries in Special Situation - [A] Third United Nations conference on Least Developed Countries; and [B] Specific Action Related to Particular needs and problems of Landlocked Developing Countries: Outcome of the International Ministerial Conference of Land Locked and Transit Developing Countries and Donor Countries and International Financial and Development Institutions and Transit Transport Cooperative at the Second Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 20, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

We would like to thank the Secretary-General for the reports on the agenda item "Groups of countries in special situations" under consideration today. We associate ourselves with the statement made by the Chair of the Group of 77.

Mr. Chairman,

It is common knowledge that developing countries have been the most adversely affected by the ongoing financial and economic crisis. Yet, even amongst us, the least developed and countries with geographical constraints have unfortunately been the worst affected. Our meeting today, therefore, assumes added significance as a manifestation of the global concern at the development prospects of these groups of countries in special situations. The report of the Secretary General has elaborated in detail the challenges being faced by the Least Developed Countries [LDCs] in coping with the crisis. We have also noted the large variations in economic and social indicators amongst them. The overall picture that emerges, despite these variations, is that enhanced and targeted assistance is needed from the international community, particularly the developed countries, to assist LDCs, particularly in implementing much-needed counter cyclical measures. Such a requirement is, of course, of concern given that the LDC group as a whole registered a 6% annual growth during the decade till 2008. This clearly underscores the need to focus on enhancing the inherent resilience of the economies of the LDCs. What is required is an integrated strategy, combining both short-term and long-term assistance measures, so that structural constraints are addressed. The ingredients are well known. New and additional funding from developed countries is a prerequisite. Foreign Direct Investment needs to diversify and enhance productive capacity, rather than remain concentrated in only a few natural resource rich LDCs. Trade capacity must be built up so that trade opportunities can be exploited. There must be enhanced market access for products of LDCs, and massive agricultural subsidies by developed countries must be reduced and eliminated so that domestic production can increase. Institution and capacity building efforts must be increased. We believe that the Brussels Programme of Action provides the necessary framework for putting the LDCs on a path of sustained growth. What is lacking is its full implementation. In this context, we look forward to the 4th UN Conference on LDCs in the year 2011, where we hope further concrete actions will be drawn up. It is important that its preparatory process is substantive and thorough. However, we would caution against proposals in the Secretary-General's report that dilute the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities.

Permit me to take this opportunity to reiterate that India will continue to demonstrate its solidarity with the LDCs. Last year, we unilaterally announced a scheme to grant duty-free and preferential access to products from all LDCs. The tariff lines covered under this scheme span 92.5% of global exports of all LDCs, and 94% of India's total tariff lines. India has also written off the debt owed by seven Highly Indebted Poor Countries [HIPC]. India's Technical and Economic Cooperation has a special focus on assistance to LDCs in general, and with those in our extended neighbourhood, in particular. Nevertheless, let me emphasize that efforts by fellow developing countries like India can only serve to complement the necessary efforts of our developed partners. We would like to congratulate Equatorial Guinea for having been recommended by the Economic and Social Council to be graduated from the list of LDCs. This is indeed a tribute to the development efforts of Equatorial Guinea, and we wish it all success for the future. However, we urge the international community to be mindful of its post-graduation challenges, and call for assistance to Equatorial Guinea, and other LDCs in the post-graduation phase, so that their achievements can be sustained. This is even more critical now in the context of the financial and economic crisis.

Mr. Chairman,

Landlocked developing countries [LLDCs] are another group of countries severely affected by the financial crisis. The marginalization of many of these countries from the international trading system has been worsened by this crisis, particularly on account of the contraction in demand in developed countries and the consequent fall in LLDC exports. It is imperative that there be full implementation of the Almaty Programme of Action, particularly through sustained international support and enhanced financial and technical assistance. In this context, the mid-term review of this Programme last year identified useful points for action. We must continue with our efforts to holistically address trade and transit issues. We must also remain cognizant that any effective solution must address the constraints and challenges faced by the transit developing countries that neighbour landlocked developing countries. As a transit developing country, India has been active in enhancing its close and historical links with its landlocked neighbours. Landlocked countries with a contiguous border with us have special bilateral cooperation agreements for easy transit of their goods through India. We have also been privileged to have contributed to their development efforts. We will continue with such efforts for these countries, as well as of other landlocked and transit developing countries, as part of South-South cooperation.

We agree with the report of the Secretary-General on the importance of regional and sub-regional organizations in the implementation of the Almaty Programme of Action. Regional initiatives to improve transit connectivity and intra-regional trade are a priority for us. However, we must keep in mind the significant regional variations, and that one size cannot fit all. Bilateral initiatives, where appropriate, also play a key role. We would also urge cooperation for meeting special transit requirements of landlocked regions within a country, which due to geography or political boundaries, have similar difficulties in accessing international markets as LLDCs.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

786. Statement by Minister of State in the Ministry of External Affairs Shashi Tharoor on New Partnership for Africa's Development : Progress in Implementation and International Support at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 20, 2009.

Mr. President,

I am happy to participate in today's Joint Debate on New Partnership for Africa's Development. Allow me to thank the Secretary-General for the comprehensive report on Implementation and International Support for New Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD) and the other reports prepared for this joint debate.

Mr. President,

India's ties with Africa are historic. Trade across the Indian Ocean has linked us for hundreds of years. For the people of India, Africa is also the land of awakening of the Father of our Nation, Mahatma Gandhi.

In the past, we have shared the pain of subjugation and the joy of freedom and liberation. We have worked shoulder to shoulder in the fight against apartheid and racial discrimination. India was at the vanguard of the struggle against colonialism, apartheid and racial discrimination - a struggle that helped transform the lives of millions of people in Africa and Asia.

During our march together, we have traversed similar paths, shared similar values and cherished the same dreams. Our long and historic relationship has now evolved into a sustainable and enduring partnership.

Mr. President,

The Secretary General in his report New Partnership for Africa's Development: 7th Consolidated Progress Report Implementation and International Support has underscored that international cooperation is vital for Africa's development. The report emphasizes the need for concerted and urgent action by international development partners to mitigate the socio-economic impact of the global financial and economic crisis and help the African countries in their progress towards implementation of NEPAD and realization of the MDGs. The report also highlights India's contribution towards Africa's development in the context of South-South cooperation.

Mr. President,

India has a long-standing, close and multi-layered relationship with Africa. A vibrant India and a resurgent Africa are witnessing an intensification of relations and growing convergence of interests in their common quest for sustainable economic growth and development. Our partnership encompasses priority sectors integral to the developmental goals of Africa in the 21st century. India is committed to work together with Africa in accordance with the priorities of the continent. Priority areas of cooperation include infrastructure development, capacity-building, agriculture, health and food security and technology cooperation. We have accorded high priority to development of economic infrastructure including railways, IT, telecom and power.

The First India-Africa Forum Summit held in Delhi in April, 2008 was a major milestone in India's engagement with Africa. The Delhi Declaration and the Africa-India Framework for Cooperation adopted during the Summit highlighted our shared vision and world view. Taken together, these provide a sound foundation for the intensification of our engagement in the years to come.

India has so far extended over US$ 3 billion of concessional lines of credit to countries in Africa. During the India-Africa Forum Summit, India also decided to enhance the available concessional lines of credit for Africa to US$ 5.4 billion for the next five years.

Since the inception of the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) Programme in 1964, capacity building and human resource development in Africa has been an area of high priority for the Government of India. The ITEC programme has benefited thousands of experts and students from Africa who came for training courses in professional institutions in India. These courses cover diverse fields such as agriculture and agro processing, entrepreneurship development, tool design, small business creation, promotion of rural industries and information technology. We have increased the number of training slots for African countries from 1100 to 1600.

In addition, several thousand African students are currently studying in Indian universities and colleges. We have also doubled the number of scholarships for the African countries to 500.

Over the next five to six years India will also be undertaking in Africa, on a grant basis, projects in critical areas such as higher and vocational education, science, IT, agriculture and renewable energy. A sum of US$500 million has been allocated for this endeavour.

The Pan African E-network project that seeks to bridge the "digital divide" between Africa and the rest of the world is one of the most far-reaching initiatives undertaken by India. Already 42 countries have joined this programme which is intended to provide E-services with priority on tele-education and tele-medicine services and VVIP connectivity by satellite and fibre optic network amongst the Heads of State of all 53 countries. The Project would give major benefits to Africa in capacity building through skill and knowledge development of students, medical specialists and for medical consultation.

Mr. President,

India has been actively engaged with NEPAD since the very beginning. The Government of India announced a line of credit to NEPAD of US $ 300 million during the India-Africa Forum Summit. This line of credit, is in addition to the US $ 200 million of lines of credit to NEPAD extended earlier in 2002.

Indian private sector is increasingly engaged in Africa. Indian companies have made large investments in Africa in industry, agriculture, services, human resource development and infrastructure. India's trade with Africa has been growing rapidly. India's bilateral trade with Africa was over 36 billion dollars in 2008-09, which represented an almost six-fold increase in as many years. We look forward to working with our African partners to take these trade and investment levels to newer heights.

Mr. President,

The Secretary General in his report on NEPAD has called for the long-overdue successful outcome of the Doha round of multilateral trade negotiations. At the India Africa Forum Summit, India and Africa had decided to work together on pressing global issues of shared interests and concerns including the WTO such as the issue of cotton subsidies. India has made a unilateral announcement of duty free and quota free market access to goods from 34 Least Developed Countries in Africa. This covers 94% of India's total tariff lines and provides preferential market access on tariff lines that comprise 92.5% of global exports of all LDCs.

Mr. President,

An important factor in addressing the causes of conflict and contributing to durable peace and sustainable development in Africa, as indicated in the Secretary-General's report, is the commitment of the international community, including United Nations organizations, to allocate increased financial, human and technical resources for the regional strategies .

On its part, India has been extensively involved in peacekeeping efforts in Africa over the past six decades. Presently, India has over 7000 peacekeepers serving in Africa, including a 5000 strong contingent in the Democratic Republic of Congo. India's first full all-female formed police unit is currently deployed in Liberia. In addition to peacekeeping, this unit has been successful in reaching out to the most vulnerable sections of the society i.e. women and children and in inspiring women who have so often been victim of war to see themselves also as sources of soccour and strength in this recently war torn society.

As a founder member of the Peacebuilding Commission, India remains actively engaged with the work of the Commission. The UNSG's report mentions that 92% of the Peacebuilding Fund-allocated funds have gone to African countries. We are hopeful that with the revision of the terms of reference for the Peacebuilding Fund, the efficiency and effectiveness of the Fund will be further improved.

Mr. President,

Africa's fight against Malaria is dealt with in Secretary General's report transmitting the WHO's report on "2001-2010: Decade to Roll Back Malaria in Developing Countries, particularly in Africa". It is a matter of deep regret that more than one million malarial deaths still occur each year, when the disease is preventable, treatable and perfectly curable.

While we are happy to note that a number of preventive measures, such as distribution of treated mosquito nets, are being undertaken on a much larger scale, it also remains a fact that the developing world's ability to combat public health crises of this nature at times has been circumscribed under the pretext of intellectual property rights. Access to affordable medicines is a fundamental part of the right to health, and this has even been recognized by the TRIPS regime. Unfortunately, this remains more in the realm of theory than practice.

The Africa-India Framework for Cooperation 2008 includes capacity building programmes for medical and health specialists to tackle pandemics like malaria, filarial, polio, HIV and TB.

Mr. President,

In conclusion, I would like to state that India envisions an Africa that is self-reliant, economically vibrant and at peace with itself and the world. While highlighting the vitality of African continent, the first Prime Minister of India, Pt. Jawaharlal Nehru, had said, "Of one thing there can be no doubt, and that is the vitality of the people of Africa. Therefore, with the vitality of her people and the great resources available in this great continent, there can be no doubt that the future holds a great promise for the people of Africa."

It is this promise that our Partnership with Africa seeks to fulfill. India will offer its fullest cooperation to harness the great potential of the African people for the cause of Africa's progress and development.

787. Statement by Member of the Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Ali Anwar Ansari on Agenda Item 30 - International Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space at the Special Political and Decolonization (Fourth) Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 21, 2009.

Mr. Chairman

The Indian delegation is happy to note that UN-COPUOS, under the mandate of the General Assembly, has been contributing significantly towards capacity building for sustainable development and strengthening international cooperation to maintain outer space peaceful towards serving the interests of all the countries. We are pleased to note that substantial progress has been made during the 52 session of UN-COPUOS, under the able chairmanship of Ambassador Mr. Ciro Arevalo Yepes of Columbia. The Indian delegation is delighted to note that with the approval of the UN General Assembly, a new agenda item on 'Space and Climate' has been included and fruitful deliberations of this pressing issue of global concern has taken place at this 52nd Session of UN-COPUOS. The Indian delegation also expresses its full satisfaction at the work carried out by the two sub-committees of UN-COPUOS, the Scientific and Technical Sub-committee at its 46th session and the Legal Sub-committee at its 48th session.

Mr. Chairman

The Indian delegation places on record its appreciation to various member nations for their significant achievements in space during the last one year.

Mr. Chairman

During the last one year, India made a significant stride in space exploration through the Chandrayaan mission. On 22nd October 2008, India's launch vehicle PSLV-C11 injected the Chandrayaan-1 spacecraft into an elliptical transfer orbit around the Earth and later, through a series of orbital maneuvers, Chandrayaan-1 was placed in a 100 km circular orbit around the Moon. On 14th November 2008 India set its imprints on the surface of the Moon using the Moon Impact Probe. With well-defined objectives through high-resolution remote sensing of moon in the visible, near infrared, microwave and X-ray regions of the electromagnetic spectrum, Chandrayaan-1 mission intended to study the Moon using eleven scientific instruments built in India and five other countries. With this, preparation of a 3-dimensional atlas of the lunar surface and chemical and mineralogical mapping of entire lunar surface is undertaken by scientists from India and abroad. Recently scientific community across the globe gathered in Bangalore to study the invaluable data yielded by various instruments of Chandrayaan mission. The Indian delegation is proud to report that within a short time, Chandrayaan-1 has achieved its mission objective to the satisfaction of global scientific community.

Mr. Chairman

Our delegation is proud to report that the students and faculty of an Indian University built an experimental satellite called ANUSAT under the overall guidance of ISRO. ANUSAT was successfully launched by PSLV in its fourteenth successive successful flight on 20th April 2009, as a co-passenger to the Radar Imaging Satellite RISAT-2.

Mr. Chairman

The Oceansat-2, slated to be launched shortly, would also carry a Radio Occultation Sounder from Italy. Also, India is getting ready for launch of CARTOSAT-2B, RESOURCESAT-2, Radar Imaging Satellite (RISAT-1) as well as the ISRO-CNES joint mission Megha Tropiques using PSLV. Six small satellites built by Germany, Turkey, Switzerland, a YOUTHSAT with participation of Moscow State University, an X-SAT with participation of NTU of Singapore, NLS-6 of Canada and ALSAT-2 from Algeria are also scheduled to be launched as co-passengers in these flights. Towards providing satellite-based positioning, navigation and timing service to be communities in the region, India is building GPS and Geo Augmented Navigation system GAGAN as well as an Indian Regional Navigation Satellite system - IRNSS.

Mr. Chairman

In the area of Space Applications, India has made notable progress in seamlessly integrating the advances in space technology and applications with the national developmental goals, particularly in vital services such as telecommunications, television broadcasting, meteorology, disaster warning, as well as natural resources survey and management. In our efforts to provide quality education across the country, the Tele-education project, undertaken a couple of years ago, now connects teacher and student at primary, secondary and University level through more than 35,000 EDUSAT classrooms. The Tele-medicine project today connects 375 hospitals, of which 305 hospitals in the Remote/rural/and District levels and 13 mobile vans have been connected to 57 Super Specialty hospitals located in major cities. Today, more than 470 Village Resource Centres including 45 Expert Centres have been established. We consider that this concept of Village Resource Centres is appropriate for other developing countries as well.

Mr. Chairman

India places considerable importance on bilateral and multilateral relations with space agencies and space related bodies with the aim of minimizing the cost of access to space, of taking up new scientific and technological challenges, defining international frameworks for exploitation and utilization of outer space for peaceful purposes, and building and strengthening existing ties between countries. Currently, formal Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) or Agreements are in place with more than 30 countries and international organizations. Many of these understandings pave way for sharing our expertise in the use of space-derived geospatial information for sustainable development. India's joint missions with France, namely, the Megha Tropiques and SARAL, will provide useful data to the global scientific community for understanding the tropical weather phenomenon. India also plays an active role in several international bodies in fostering partnership with the member countries in use of space technology for the benefit of mankind.

Mr. Chairman

India has also carried out many satellite based application projects which have direct relevance to sustainable development. Monitoring of snow & glaciers in the Himalayas including areas of neighbourhood countries;

Collaboration with GEO in Agricultural crop status monitoring; Mapping of coral reef in Sri Lanka, Bangladesh and Maldives; Impact of sea level rise on coastal environment in Sri Lanka and Bangladesh; Topographical mapping of Maldives; Establishment of remote sensing centres at Male, Mauritius and Myanmar; Disaster Management support through International Charter and Sentinel Asia initiatives; Locust prone area mapping in Kazakhstan are some of the projects pursued in this direction. India is actively participating in the initiative of the Asia-Pacific Regional Space Agency Forum (APRSAF) including Sentinel Asia project to share satellite data for disaster mitigation and STAR-Satellite Technology for the Asia-Pacific Region programme, for sharing expertise gained in developing and operating satellite IMS-1. India successfully organized the 8th IAA International Conference on Low cost Planetary Missions (LCPMB) at Goa, India during August 31 to September 4, 2009 with participation of scientists from various space agencies.

Mr. Chairman

India takes special interest in capacity building and services for enabling the developing countries in the application of Space technology. The Centre for Space Science and Technology Education for Asia and Pacific Region, affiliated to UN and operating from India, is an initiative in this direction. So far 824 scholars from 31 countries from the Asia-Pacific region and 27 scholars from 17 countries outside the Asia-pacific region have benefited from the educational activities of this Centre. India would like to request more participation from the member countries.

Mr. Chairman

Having achieved self-reliance in end-to-end space programme, the Indian space programme is entering into space exploration phase mainly to explore inner solar system and build such capabilities for exploring outer solar system. Exploration of outer space using planetary missions will be furthered with Chandrayaan-2 and its follow on missions. India has also been discussing at various levels the need for embarking on a human spaceflight programme. Mr. Chairman In conclusion, the Indian delegation would like to support the General Assembly and UN-COPUOS in all their endeavours to increase the awareness of space-based benefits and to encourage developing countries in taking up the space application programmes for sustainable development and to maintain outer space exclusively for peaceful purposes.

Thank you Mr. Chairman

788. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Dr. Girja Vyas on Agenda Item 57 - Eradication of Poverty and Development Issues; [A] Implementation of the Second UN Decade for Eradication of Poverty [2008-2017]; [B] Women in Development at the Second Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 22, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

We would like to thank the Secretary-General for the reports on the agenda item under consideration today, including his oral report on the progress in the implementation of efforts related to the theme of the Second UN Decade to eradicate poverty. We associate ourselves with the statement made by the Chair of the Group of 77.

Mr. Chairman,

Our shared objective of eradicating poverty has become even more relevant and urgent in the context of the ongoing financial and economic crisis. Coupled with the impacts of the food and energy crises of last year, the economic crisis has pushed millions back into poverty and threatens to reverse years of development gains. Against this background, it is imperative that poverty eradication continue to receive the highest attention of the UN and the international community. The First UN Decade to eradicate poverty from 1997-2006 played an important role in anchoring poverty eradication at the core of the UN development agenda, and led to concerted international efforts. We look forward to enhancing this momentum in the implementation of the Second UN Decade till 2017 on the important theme of employment. The UN must be proactive in creating an international environment that assists developing countries in implementing their national development strategies.

The issue of enhanced financial and technical assistance by the international community is a key element in this. In addition, improved market access, debt relief and transfer of technology also play a key role in creating an international environment conducive for development. Access to critical technologies at affordable rates is an area in particular where the UN needs to play an important facilitative role. International governance structures must also be reformed, with greater voice and participation of developing countries. Permit me to also emphasize that there is no "one-size-fits-all" answer to the complex problems of poverty eradication. It is, therefore, essential that each country must have the policy space to formulate and implement its own development strategy, based on its unique challenges and conditions. In the current economic environment, developing countries must be assisted to implement counter-cyclical measures for social sector investment and economic revival. Greater flexibilities are also required in international regimes to ensure primacy of the development dimension. In essence, the global partnership for development that we have all committed to must be fully implemented. We also look forward to the Development Cooperation Forum of the UN Economic and Social Council playing a central role in international development cooperation efforts.

Mr. Chairman,

The important role women can play as key agents in the development process cannot be overemphasized. The 2009 "World Survey on the Role of Women in Development" provides a useful and detailed insight in this regard. Gender equality and empowerment of women are vital, particularly because of the multiplier effect on socio-economic growth. Our policy approaches must encourage active involvement of women in planning and decision making, women's education, improved access of women to productive resources and opportunities as well as greater investment in women's health and nutrition. Progressive legal provisions, efforts to reduce the gap between de jure and de facto equality, gender mainstreaming and gender disaggregated information are crucial tools in these efforts. The international community must provide greater financial and technical resources to assist developing countries implement gender sensitive national development strategies.

I am happy to share that India has been actively promoting women's empowerment. Over one million Indian women at the grassroots level were brought into political decision making following the reservation thirteen years ago of one-third of all urban and local self-government posts in India for women. A similar reservation of seats for women in the Indian Parliament remains under consideration. India's Joint Parliamentary Committee on Empowerment of Women independently monitors equality and empowerment of women and ensures that Indian legislation is gender responsive. We have institutionalised gender-sensitive budgeting and are making efforts to mainstream gender in policies and programmes of various Government departments. The Government actively encourages and supports initiatives in formation of women's self-help groups. Today, there are more than 2 million women self-help groups in the country supporting more than 10 million rural families. We are happy that the "World Survey" has noted the important role being played by many self-help groups in India. We are also encouraging women entrepreneurs through special assistance schemes. We have a statutory body - the National Commission for Women, which I have the privilege of chairing, - for the protection, welfare and development of women. We are strongly committed to the Convention for the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) and that "women's rights are human rights". These rights should be enhanced to freedom to choose one's vocation; reduction in deprivation; reduction in discrimination; and reduction in exploitation. Overall, India's planning focus has shifted towards recognizing women as fundamental agents of sustained socio-economic growth and development.

Thank you.

789. Statement by the Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Syed Shahnawaz Hussain on Agenda Item 134 - 'Financial Situation of the United Nations' at the Fifth Committee of 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 23, 2009.

We thank the Under Secretary-General for the Department of Management for her statement on the financial situation of the United Nations. My delegation aligns itself with the Statement made by the Distinguished Representative of the Sudan on behalf of Group of 77.

My delegation believes that payment of assessed contributions by Member States, in full, on time, and without conditions, is not just a charter obligation but also a moral one. We also advocate that favorable consideration should be accorded to those Member States that are unable to pay their assessed contributions due to circumstances beyond their control.

As we seek full accountability from the Secretariat for efficient and effective implementation of mandates given by Member States, we are also duty-bound to provide the Secretariat with timely and adequate resources to ensure the attainment of that goal.

Regarding the regular budget, it is unfortunate that as on 13 October 2009, the unpaid assessed contributions amounted to US$ 830 million, which is US$ 74 million higher than in October 2008. Moreover, this amount is highly concentrated with 93% being owed by a single Member State and 7% by the rest. We all agree that a financially weak Organization is not in our interest. We hope that this situation would be addressed urgently by the concerned parties.

I would also like to take this opportunity to set the record straight that though India's name is missing from the list of Member States that have fully paid their assessment for regular budget, my country has, in fact, paid in full its assessed contribution for the regular budget on 31 March 2009. I hope the Secretariat would rectify this omission at the earliest.

Mr. Chairman,

As a major troop contributing country, which also has significant contingent-owned equipment deployed with UN peacekeeping operations, we are encouraged by the decrease in total amount of peacekeeping assessment outstanding to US$ 2.1 billion, which is US$ 796 million below the level in October 2008, even though the some of the decrease is related to lower level of assessments issued for this peacekeeping fiscal pending the approval of a new scale of assessments for 2010.

We acknowledge that the amount of unpaid assessments is partially due to the peacekeeping financial cycle. However a major portion is because of non-payment by some Member States. As in the regular budget, the unpaid assessments for peacekeeping operations are highly concentrated, with 53% owed by just two member states.

The delay in receipt of contributions from Member States adversely impacts the Secretariat's capacity to make quarterly payments to troop and COE contributors of peacekeeping operations. India's contribution of troops and contingent-owned equipment to UN peacekeeping operations is not a commercial venture. It is a manifestation of India's commitment to the principles and purposes of the UN Charter. However, once a formal MOU, defining terms and conditions of our participation in UN peacekeeping operations has been signed with the United Nations, we are justified in expecting that all parties to the agreement fulfill their legal obligations.

Delayed payment, sometimes non-payment of troop costs and contingent-owned equipment reimbursements, as in some closed peacekeeping missions, reflects poorly on the United Nations. It also makes it difficult for the troop contributing countries to explain to national legislatures, why such debt is owed to them by the United Nations. This situation must be rectified otherwise it could have a negative impact on Member States' commitment towards future peacekeeping operations.

The projection of US$ 944 million, as the amount of United Nations debt to Member States at the end of 2009 is higher than envisaged in May 2009. India is owed US$ 152 million as on 30 September 2009. We understand the Secretariat's compulsion and are willing to be patient in this matter. However, some who seek greater financial contributions by my country to the Organization should factor in this debt while measuring India's contributions.

An indebted United Nations should not be expected to evoke confidence from the peoples it aspires to serve. It is, therefore, essential that Member States assist the Organization in achieving zero indebtedness, as an integral part of our common quest for prudent budgetary and financial management.

Last week, the Under Secretary-General for Management in her statement said that the financial indicators of the United Nations for 2009 are mixed. While unpaid assessments have decreased for peacekeeping operations, there have been increases for the regular budget, the tribunals and the capital master plan. The number of Member States meeting their obligations in full is lower than one year ago across all categories. Acknowledging that the financial well-being of the United Nations is in our common interest, we add our voice in urging all Member States to pay their financial obligations in full and on time. My delegation would do the same.

Thank you!

790. Statement by Member of Indian Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN T. K. S. Elangovan on Agenda Item 81 - Report of the International Law Commission - Chapters I - III - Introduction, Chapter IV: Responsibility of International Organization , Chapter XIII - Other Decisions and Recommendations at the Sixth Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 27, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

I am taking the floor in this Committee for the first time. Therefore, let me first congratulate you and the members of the bureau on their election. I am sure the Committee will make good progress under your able guidance. I also wish to thank Mr. Earnest Petric, Chairman of the International Law Commission, for his comprehensive introduction of the Report of the ILC on its 61st Session. The Commission, at its last session, has had a very productive session, and has made considerable progress in its consideration of the various matters on its agenda, including the identification of possible new topics. We welcome the new members who have joined the Commission this year, Mr. Michael Wood of the United Kingdom and Professor Shinya Murase of Japan.

Mr. Chairman,

On the topic of "Responsibility of International Organizations", we commend the Special Rapporteur, Professor Giorgio Gaja, on the presentation of his Seventh Report which addresses certain outstanding issues such as the general provisions of the draft articles and the placement of the chapter concerning the responsibility of a State in connection with the act of an international organization. The Report also proposes certain amendments based on a review of comments made by States and international organizations on the draft articles provisionally adopted earlier as well as the recent decisions rendered by national and regional courts, especially on the issue of attribution.

Mr. Chairman,

We also commend Professor Gaja on the completion of the first reading of the set of draft articles on this topic, along with commentaries. The Draft Articles follow general pattern of the articles on Responsibility of States for International Wrongful Acts with necessary adjustments taking into account the different nature, structure and functions of international organisations. The Commission has sought the comments and observations of States on these draft articles. While we would be separately submitting our comments, we have a few preliminary observations on some of the provisions. On the question of countermeasures, we reiterate our position that the disputes between an international organisation and its members should, as far as possible, be settled in accordance with the rules and through the internal procedures of the organisations. Further, the rules of the organisation should be decisive in determining whether an organisation can take countermeasures against its members or be the target of countermeasures by its members. Only where the relevant rules of the organization expressly provide, should the taking of counter measures by an organization be considered. Accordingly, considering the availability of limited practice, the uncertainty of the legal regime and the risk of abuse inherent in the concept, it is necessary to adopt a cautious approach.

Mr. Chairman,

Draft article 39 deals with the requirement of members of an international organisation to take measures with a view to provide it the means necessary for effectively fulfilling its obligations, and thus is intended to provide for a situation where an organization which has responsibility lacks the means or resources to carry out its obligations. Article 39, as drafted, addresses the issue of responsibility of member States towards an organization of which they are members, whereas the topic deals with the responsibility of international organizations and not that of States. In any case, the obligations of member States towards the organization would be dealt with under the constituent instrument under which it is established. Accordingly, this article should be redrafted as an obligation of the organization to make necessary efforts to approach its members for providing it with the means for effectively fulfilling its obligations.

Article 60 provides for the responsibility of a member State seeking to avoid compliance with one of its own obligations by taking advantage of the fact that an international organisation of which it is a member has competence in relation to the subject matter of that obligation to commit an act, which, if committed by the State, would have constituted a breach of an obligation.

Mr. Chairman,

On the topic of "The Most-favoured-nation clause", we welcome the work of the Study Group, co-chaired by Mr. Donald M. McRae and Dr. Rohan Perera. The Study Group has considered and agreed on a framework that would serve as a road map for the future work. In particular, the Study Group has made important preliminary assessment of the 1978 draft articles and decided on eight papers to be dealt with under different topics. We also welcome the establishment of a Study Group chaired by Professor Nolte on the topic "Treaties over Time", which considered the question of the scope of the work of the Study Group and agreed on a course of action to begin the consideration of the topic. We welcome the appointment of Mr. Lucius Cafilisch as Special Rapporteur for the topic "Effects of armed conflicts on treaties". We appreciate the decision to make the edited summary records of the Commission's proceedings up to 2004, available on a pilot basis, on the Commission's website. Considering the delay in the publication of the Summary Records, this will be of great assistance to member States and others in following the Commission's work. Further, priority should be accorded to expedite preparation of the summary records of the Commission. Mr. Chairman, We also support the Commission's views concerning the question of honoraria, resulting from the adoption by the General Assembly of its resolution 56/272 of 27 March 2002. The decision to discontinue the honoraria especially affects Special Rapporteurs from developing countries, as it compromises support for their research work. The Special Rapporteurs should also be afforded the opportunity to participate in the Meetings of the Sixth Committee and interact with delegations during the consideration of their topics.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

791. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Dr. Girja Vyas on Agenda Item 19 - Necessity of ending the Economic, Commercial and financial Embargo imposed against Cuba at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 28, 2009.

Mr. President,

Thank you for giving me this opportunity to address the General Assembly.

At the outset I would like to thank the Secretary General for his report on the agenda item "Necessity of ending the economic, commercial and financial embargo imposed by the United States of America against Cuba"

My delegation also associates itself with the statement made by the Chair of the Group of 77.

Mr. President,

For the last 17 years in a row, the General Assembly, while deliberating this agenda item, has categorically and overwhelmingly rejected the imposition of laws and regulations with extra-territorial impact.

The General Assembly has also called upon all States, in conformity with their obligations under the United Nations Charter and international law, to refrain from promulgating and applying, as well as repeal and invalidate, laws and measures that have extra-territorial effects affecting the sovereignty of other States, the legitimate interests of entities or persons under their jurisdiction and the freedom of trade and navigation.

Unfortunately, these repeated resolutions remain unimplemented. The nearly five-decade old United States embargo on Cuba, including its extra-territorial aspects, continues to remain in force. We share the views expressed by the international community in its opposition to the extra-territorial aspect of the embargo.

Mr. President,

In the report of the Secretary-General, various UN entities have detailed the impact of the embargo, particularly its extra-territorial effects.

For example, the UN Resident Coordinator in Havana has noted that humanitarian and development cooperation implemented by the UN system in Cuba is significantly affected by the embargo. It also adversely impacts the functioning of UN offices, including for travel of UN staff.

The UN Development Programme [UNDP] has stated that the effects of the embargo can be observed in all spheres of Cuba's social and economic activities, as well as affecting the most vulnerable groups and human development in general. It highlights the negative consequences of the embargo on UNDP's development coordination activities, including an average increase in project cost by 15 per cent.

The UN Conference on Trade and Development [UNCTAD] refers to the attendant costs of the embargo both for Cuba and for citizens in third countries due to its extraterritorial application.

The UN Population Fund states that the impact of the embargo was specifically felt in some of its programmes.

The Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean has stated that the embargo adversely affects the standard of living of Cuban citizens.

The health sector has been one of the affected sectors on account of enhanced cost and restrictions on equipment and technologies. Thus, an indirect extra-territorial impact of the embargo has been on Cuba's efforts at South-South cooperation in this field.

I may also mention that the natural disasters in Cuba last year, and the ongoing financial and economic crisis, have made the impact of the embargo more acute.

Mr. President,

Given the geography, Cuba and the United States of America would be expected to be natural partners in trade and investment. While the embargo has not permitted this development, the potential for economic and commercial ties between the two countries clearly exists.

For example, by taking advantage of limited openings under the US Trade Sanctions Reform and Export Enhancement Act of 2000, the US has become the largest exporter of agricultural products to Cuba. The US International Trade Commission itself estimates that this would rise sharply if restrictions were lifted, which underscores the negative impact of the embargo on US trade and business opportunities.

Various efforts in the United States to relax or lift the embargo indicate the substantial interest, particularly in the business sector, for unhindered access to the Cuban market or contact with Cuba.

We are encouraged by the steps announced by the current US Administration earlier this year to reduce restrictions on travel and remittances to Cuba by Cuban-Americans and on US telecommunications services. We look forward to the full lifting of sanctions and embargo against Cuba.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I would like to reiterate India's opposition to unilateral measures by countries that impinge on the sovereignty of another country, including attempts to extend the application of a country's laws extraterritorially to other sovereign nations.

Thank you.

792. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation Syed Shahnawaz Hussain on Agenda Item 69 - Promotion and Protection of Human Rights at the Third Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 28, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

I would like to thank the UN Secretary-General for his reports as well as the Special Rapporteurs of the special procedures and Representatives of the UN Secretary General for their concise presentations under this agenda item relating to 'protection and promotion of human rights'.

Mr. Chairman,

Protection and promotion of human rights is fundamental duty of all states. A state that does not respect basic human rights would have failed in its primary responsibility.

The international community has been cognizant of this important mandate and has steadily played its role in the promotion and protection of human rights for all. Starting with the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, the international community has since adopted several international human rights instruments in the last 60 years.

Mr. Chairman,

For millennia, India has been a home to vast diversities, cultures, traditions and thoughts. India's commitment to rule of law, democracy, development and human rights is as old as our nation.

We adopted our Constitution in 1950 after nearly 200 years of being a colony. One of the most sacred pillars of the Constitution of India is the fundamental rights and freedoms granted to our citizens.

Article 14 and 15 of the Constitution guarantees equality before the law and freedom from discrimination based on race, sex, caste, religion or place of birth. Article 19 also guarantees every citizen of India the freedom of speech and expression, freedom to assemble peacefully and form associations and freedom of movement within the territory of India.

Mr. Chairman,

It is relevant to note that India is the largest democracy in the world with a solid secular foundation. We respect the right of every individual to practice, profess and propagate their religion.

Mr. Chairman,

Apart from fundamental rights, lawmakers in India are also guided by the Directive Principles of State Policy which the framers of the Constitution intended to serve as guiding principles for the years to come. These directives include eliminating and minimizing inequalities, ensuring gender parity, development of women and children; and development of physical and mental health of all.

Mr. Chairman,

We established an independent National Human Rights Commission almost sixteen years ago to examine complaints regarding violations of human rights. Various states in India have also established similar Commission to examine violation of rights at the state level.

In addition, in order to investigate and register complaints of violations of rights of women including sexual crimes, violence against women and discrimination against women, the National Commission for Women was also established.

Mr. Chairman,

While the Constitution of India is the bedrock of our legal and political system, India's independent judiciary, a free and vibrant media and civil society have reinforced the safeguards in order to ensure that these human rights for our citizens are not denied. India has also enacted the 'Right to Information Act' to ensure transparency and accountability of government's activities. Any discussion on human rights protection in India would not be complete without touching upon the role of the judiciary in India. The remedy of public interest litigations was crafted by the judiciary to ensure that even the most vulnerable sections of society who may not be able to approach courts otherwise can seek justice via a public spirited person or organization. This process of judicial redressal has been extremely effective in providing remedies to detainees, children and other vulnerable groups.

Mr. Chairman,

As a State Party of the principal covenants on human rights, and of practically all other major human rights instruments, India has consistently promoted civil and political rights on the one hand, and economic, social and cultural rights on the other.

Mr. Chairman,

We also welcome the report of the Secretary General on the Right to Development. The Right to Development is a fundamental link in the web of human rights that promotes social progress, pursuit of happiness and better standards of life for every person.

Mr. Chairman,

Every time a gross violation of human rights occurs in any part of the world its shocks the conscience of the international community. The process of monitoring and protecting human rights is not easy and the international community must continue its endeavor to unify their forces in the fight against perpetrators who commit gross violations. In that context it is important to recognize that targeting countries for intrusive monitoring is only indicative of a bias and does not further the cause of human rights. There is no doubt that human rights abuses must be addressed but it should be done in a comprehensive manner through cooperation, dialogue and consultation.

Mr. Chairman,

As I conclude, I would like to say that international community can achieve a lot if we are willing to work with each other in a manner that facilitates rather than obstructs the promotion of human rights. The need is for us to act promptly, collectively and effectively for universal adherence to human rights standards for all. We look forward to continue working with everyone in this arduous task that will make the world a better place to live in for our future generations.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

793. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Ali Anwar Ansari on Agenda Item 30 - Review of the Efficiency of the Administrative and Financial Functioning of the United Nations Procurement at the Fifth Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 28, 2009.

I would like to begin by thanking the Assistant Secretary-General for the Office of Central Support Services for presenting the comprehensive report of the Secretary-General on UN procurement activities. We thank the Chairperson of the ACABQ for introducing the Committee's relevant report. We also convey our appreciation to the Under Secretary-General for Internal Oversight Services for introducing the concerned report of the OIOS. My delegation aligns itself with the Statement made by the Distinguished Representative of the Sudan on behalf of Group of 77. Procurement activities in the United Nations have a very important role in ensuring efficient and effective delivery of mandates given to the Secretariat, especially in peacekeeping operations. Besides, it presents a high-risk area in terms of potential breakdown of internal controls and possible corruption, which harms the Organization not just financially but also tarnishes its image amongst the people.

We have experienced this phenomenon in the recent past and with procurement volume growing from US$1.3 billion in 2004 to US$ 3.2 billion in 2008, the need for greater vigilance is more pressing. In that context, my delegation is concerned by the ACABQ's observation that the Secretary-General's report does not provide a basis for assessing improvements in the procurement function or the adequacy of the internal control regime. Moreover, it does not provide data and other evidence to substantiate the statements on the progress achieved so far, in procurement reform. My delegation has noticed in the Secretary-General's report, hints of greater staff requirement for the procurement function, in view of the increasing workload. However, we believe that there is no linear correlation between the increases in volume of procurement and additional staff resources. Member States have to be convinced of the need for additional staff on the basis of a quantitative analysis of benefits that have accrued from various reforms implemented and resources provided in UN procurement, since 2006. Given the exponential increase in the demands of field operations, both in terms of size and complexity, it is important to have a well-defined and properly implemented delegation of authority with strict accountability for procurement in the field, in order to speed up the acquisition process.

In view of the dynamic and fast-paced nature of field operations, the adverse impact of a sluggish procurement process can be very high, even affecting the capacity of a peacekeeping operation to deliver its primary mandate of maintaining peace and security. In this regard, while we understand the need for a more decentralized procurement function, we concur with the ACABQ that the Secretary-General in his next report, should provide information on the experience gained in the implementation of the increased financial thresholds of delegated procurement authority. We would also be interested in knowing the status of the review of UN rules and procedures to support immediate operational requirements of peacekeeping missions, as promised by the Secretary-General in the 60th UNGA session. While taking note of the proposals on the governance arrangements for procurement function, such as co-location of requisitioners with procurement officials, my delegation looks forward to positive deliberations on the proposed regional procurement office concept, along with the discussions on the new field support strategy, when it is submitted to the General Assembly in the second resumed part of the 64th session. Regarding the new structures created in the procurement, such as the pilot project establishing the Independent Award Review Board and the Senior Vendor Review Committee, we look forward to the Secretary-General's next report on the experiences gained in the trial period. Similarly, the ACABQ has requested for additional information, in the next report of the Secretary-General, on the implementation of Best Value for Money Principle, the Lead Agency Concept, subcontracting, staff training etc. We expect that the future report on procurement would address all these pertinent issues in a comprehensive manner.

We take this opportunity to wholeheartedly commend the efforts of the Procurement Division in promoting procurement opportunities for vendors from developing countries and countries with economies in transition, particularly the proactive approach taken to identify means to expand participation of these countries in UN procurement. We encourage the Secretariat to keep up the good work and continue this right direction. Finally, on the concept of sustainable procurement, we agree with those who call for its cautious implementation, if approved by the General Assembly. The concept of sustainable procurement should be implemented in a manner which guarantees fairness, integrity and transparency and is consistent with the best practices in today's market. It should in no way become a restrictive practice that hinders the participation of developing countries in the UN procurement. For this to happen, clear guidelines and transparent procedures should be established as a precondition to its implementation, so that a good intention does not get derailed by suspicion and poor implementation.

THANK YOU.

794. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Sanjay Nirupam on Agenda Item 50 - Information and Communication Technologies for Development at the Second Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 28, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Permit me to begin by associating my delegation with the statement made by the Chair of the Group of 77 on this important issue of "Information and Communication Technologies for Development".

Mr. Chairman,

If there was ever any doubt on the transformative power of technology, developments in the information and communication technologies serve to unequivocally put them completely at rest. The mobile phone, the personal computer and the internet, which were a mere fantasy a few decades ago, not only seem indispensable today, but have served as critical inputs for development. Developing countries must, therefore, harness and be assisted in harnessing the benefits of information and communication technologies. Enhancing the penetration of information and communication technologies in developing countries is also one of the targets under Millennium Development Goal 8 as part of the global partnership for development. Apart from the growth and employment potential in the information and communication technology sectors, such technologies positively impact the development of other sectors of the economy. Further, they also assist in increasing access to remote areas, promoting markets in rural areas, improving public accountability, and enhancing access to information, to name just a few benefits. It is significant that global mobile penetration is now over 60%, with even some developing countries having achieved 100% mobile penetration. This demonstrates the possibility of developing countries leapfrogging the cycle of technology development. We are happy that India is one of the success cases of mobile telephone penetration, and that our case is being used as an example in some other developing countries. Our proactive public policies in this sector have served to reduce monopolies, encourage open competition, and promote development of the domestic industry. As a result, mobile telephony costs in India are among the lowest in the world. The report of the Secretary-

General has correctly noted the large disparities in terms of penetration and affordability, particularly in the area of internet access. Greater efforts are required, particularly by the international community, to bridge the digital divide. In this context, development of the necessary infrastructure, both physical and human resources, must be a major focus. The issue of affordable access is also key. We would like the United Nations to play a more active role in promoting these objectives.

We thank the Secretary-General for the report on the progress made in the implementation of and follow-up to the outcomes of the World Summit on the Information Society and call on the international community to provide greater financial and technical support for its full implementation.

Mr. Chairman,

I am happy to share that India has been active in using Information and Communication technologies for development. The Information Technology industry today contributes nearly 6% to the national economy and has been a major contributor to our economic growth in recent years. The industry has also generated millions of jobs, both directly and indirectly. India is also using Information and Communication technologies to implement an ambitious National e-Governance Plan. This involves the creation of physical infrastructure, setting up appropriate institutional mechanisms, development of policies and standards as well as adopting the necessary legal framework. Various areas like road transport, land records, taxes, agriculture, treasuries, education, passport, postal service and identification documents are under the ambit of this Plan. In addition, India has a special focus on software development in multiple Indian languages. We have also combined our expertise in satellite fabrication and launch to create wide area networks. These aim to reach rural areas through initiatives like tele-education and tele-medicine. We have embarked upon a gigantic project to assign a unique identification number to all our citizens. One of the leading pioneers of the IT revolution in India has been appointed to head this major national project.

Mr. Chairman,

Despite having to face the down turns of the global recession, the Indian Information Technology sector has been resilient, and remains one of the fastest growing sectors of the Indian industry. Some key areas of success include software development and Information Technology Enabled Services, including Business Process Outsourcing. We have now also moved to a higher value-addition level of Outsourcing i.e. Knowledge Process Outsourcing. These include valuation research, investment research, patent filing, legal and insurance claims processing, online teaching, media content supply, etc. These activities play an important role in promoting global growth. We must ensure that these are not hindered through protectionist tendencies. India has also been playing a leading role in international activities in the field of Information and Communication Technologies. We were privileged to host the Third Internet Governance Forum Meeting in India last year.

We have also taken steps to share our experience with fellow developing countries. A good example is the pan-African e-network project to support tele-education, tele-medicine, e-governance, infotainment, resource mapping and meteorological services across the continent using fibre optics and a dedicated satellite. We have also been assisting in capacity building efforts in other developing countries, both in our neighbourhood and beyond. We are happy that some of these efforts have been highlighted in the report of the Secretary-General.

Thank You, Mr. Chairman.

795. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Syed Shahnawaz Hussain on Agenda Item 72 - Report of the International Court of Justice at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 29, 2009.

Mr. President,

Thank you for giving me the opportunity to address the General Assembly on the report of one of the principal organs of the United Nations, the International Court of Justice. At the outset, I would like to thank the President of the International Court of Justice for his detailed presentation of the Report of the Court.

Mr. President,

The International Court of Justice is the principal judicial organ of the United Nations. It was established, along with the other organs of the United Nations, to save future generations from the devastating effects of war and to find means of settling inter-State disputes through application of international law. The Court still remains the only judicial body with legitimacy derived from the Charter, enjoying general jurisdiction. All other international judicial institutions have specific competence and lack general jurisdiction of a universal nature. Vide article 92 of the UN Charter the Statute of the ICJ has been made an integral part of the Charter. This is a status which is unique to the ICJ and not enjoyed by any other International Court or Tribunal established till date. All States are free to approach the Court for the resolution of their disputes with other States. Under article 36 of the Charter, the Security Council may also recommend to the parties to refer their legal disputes to the International Court of Justice while the General Assembly and the Security Council may seek advisory opinions from the Court. These provisions clearly indicate the central role given to the ICJ within the UN system.

Mr. President, The judgments of the Court have played an important role in the progressive development and codification of international law. Though cautious in respecting political realities, sentiments of States and its own Statute, the Court has asserted its judicial functions. The Court has clearly emphasized the role of international law in regulating inter-state relations even though inter-state relations are necessarily political in nature.

Mr. President, India continues to believe that no other judicial organ in the world can have the same capacity for dealing with international problems as the ICJ. The Court has contributed significantly towards settling legal disputes between Sovereign States, thus promoting the rule of law in international relations.

Mr. President,

Since its inception the Court has dealt with a variety of legal issues. It has pronounced judgments in areas including sovereignty over islands; navigational rights of States; nationality; asylum; expropriation; law of the sea; land and maritime boundaries; the principle of good faith and equity and legitimacy of the use of force. These judgments have played an important role in the progressive development and codification of international law. Presently, there are five cases before the Court between European States, four others between Latin American States and two between African States. The subject matter of these cases include territorial and maritime delimitation, environmental concerns, jurisdictional immunities of the State, violation of territorial integrity, racial discrimination and human right violations. This reflects the increased relevance of and respect for due process of law that States are showing and is an affirmation of faith in the Court.

Mr. President,

The growing acceptance of Court's jurisdiction by States further highlights the importance of the Court and confidence of the States in the Court's ability to resolve their disputes. This has increased the work load of the Court manifold. As on 31 July 2009, 13 contentious cases and one advisory procedure were pending before the Court. In order for the Court to respond effectively to the increasing demands on its resources and to carry out its mandate efficiently, it is necessary that the Court is provided with adequate resources. The ability of the Court to effectively discharge its functions is also critical for the credibility of the UN system as a whole.

Thank You Mr. President.

796. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN T. K. S. Elangovan on Agenda Item 33 - Comprehensive Review of the whole question of Peacekeeping Operations in all their aspects at the Special Political and Decolonization Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 29, 2009.

Mr. President,

With over 100,000 peacekeepers, a US$ 8 billion budget and expanded mandates, Peacekeeping remains at the heart of the activities of the United Nations. Mr. President, My delegation attaches the highest importance to the issue of Peacekeeping.

India has been an active participant in peacekeeping since the word itself was invented in 1956. We have, over the past five decades, contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers to 40 UN operations. We continue to provide troops and policemen to the most difficult operations that the UN conducts. India sends these soldiers and policemen under the flag of the United Nations. India is steadfast in its commitment to the Charter of the United Nations. We believe in the principles for which the United Nations stands for.

Mr. President,

I would like to take this opportunity to align ourselves broadly with the statement by the Delegation of Morocco on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement. Mr. President, A number of initiatives are presently underway to examine the current state of peacekeeping. We take note, with appreciation, of the efforts of the British and French delegations in this regard. We also take note of the Security Council Working Group and the Secretariat's New Horizon project. As a nation that has provided and continues to provide the United Nations thousands of soldiers and policemen, in addition to a large proportion of operating air assets, we feel that the principal challenge facing peacekeeping is the nature of the Security Council's mandates. The manner in which they are generated is an area of major concern. It is the view of my delegation that mandates are too broad and too ambitious. They have very little correlation with the ability of the organization to deliver. We reiterate the importance of the Brahimi committee recommendation that mandates be clear and achievable. We also reiterate that this will not be possible without substantively involving countries who contribute manpower and resources to Peacekeeping Operations.

Mr. President,

We are also disturbed that questions of substantive interpretation of the mandates - with repercussions beyond the immediate - are often left to the judgment of mission personnel in the ground. This can result in untenable situations, particularly for military officers, who operate best when there are unambiguous instructions and objectives. Unrealistic mandates have led to situations where mission personnel are forced to ask national contingents to undertake tasks and utilize Contingent Owned Equipment in a manner that is inconsistent with the legal framework under which they are deployed.

Mr. President,

We take note, with appreciation, of the most recent Security Council Presidential Statement on Peacekeeping. The statement has stressed the importance of substantive and timely triangular consultations between the Security Council, Troop and Police Contributing Countries and the Secretariat. In this connection, we welcome the initiative by the Security Council to hold consultations with Troop and Police Contributing Countries prior to renewal of mandates. This is a step in the right direction.

Mr. President,

The Department of Peacekeeping Operations, DPKO, is involved in the creation of police doctrines and benchmarks related to the Rule of Law operations. While we have no argument with the need to set standards, we need to remind ourselves that standards should be set in a manner which is realistic and relevant to the operating environment in which UN peacekeepers deploy. Doctrines and standards must not become like mandates - statements, rather than a blueprint for action. We feel that a greater effort needs to be made to involve developing countries in the generation of these doctrines.

Mr. President,

My delegation is of the view that the future effectiveness of DPKO lies in its ability to develop governance capacities in affected countries. DPKO needs to engage countries that have experience and knowledge in developing these capacities in the recent past. There are nations that have undergone successful post-colonial nation-building exercises analogous to what is being experienced in areas where the DPKO is deployed. The Council needs to meaningfully engage these countries.

Mr. President,

Field Support needs far greater attention. It is our view, based on the experience of supporting the large contingents that we currently have under deployment, that the Department of Field Support, DFS, needs far greater internal coordination and client-orientation. It has also been our view that the Department of Field Support needs to function as a military support operation with a lean command structure. We feel that there is a need for far greater engagement of Member States on functioning of the DFS. Mr. President, As I conclude, I would like to salute the peacekeepers from India and from other nations who laid down their lives while serving in UN missions. I would also like to reiterate India's commitment to work with the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security including through the mechanism of Peacekeeping.

Thank You.

797. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Ali Anwar Ansari on Agenda Item 55 - [A] Globalization and Interdependence: Role of the UN in promoting development in context of Globalization and Interdependence at the Second Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 29, 2009.

Mr. Chairman, At the outset I would like to thank the Secretary-General for the report on the agenda item under consideration today. We, of course, associate ourselves with the statement made by the Chair of the Group of 77.

Mr. Chairman,

The rapid spread of the financial crisis since last year has once again demonstrated just how globalized our world has become. This was, of course, a demonstration of the adverse consequences of globalization but one must accept the enormous benefits that enhanced flows of capital, goods and services, technology and even people has brought to so many, though not to all. Our focus needs to be on harnessing the benefits of globalization for all, while minimizing its adverse consequences, particularly on the vulnerable. It is important that globalization is fair and inclusive. A critical element in this is the need to provide enhanced assistance to countries that lack the capacity to cope with the adverse impacts of globalization. For example, many countries are not in a position to stimulate their economies by implementing countercyclical measures against the financial and economic crisis. Greater efforts are needed from the developed world to assist such countries. Further, the need for targeted Government intervention to ensure inclusive growth has been clearly established. I am happy to inform that India has been actively pursuing a strategy of "faster and inclusive growth" as part of our overall development efforts. Innovative schemes like the Mahatma Gandhi Rural Employment Guarantee Act, which provides for 100 days of work to each rural family, and time-bound rural infrastructure development programmes in housing, water supply, electrification, roads, telephony and irrigation, are examples of this strategy. In a broader context, what is essential is enhanced policy space for developing countries, through flexibilities in international regimes, so that they may choose the right policy tools in the context of their specific development challenges.

This is vital, given that globalization can lead to reduction in the degree of national autonomy in policymaking. Globalization must not mean "one-size-fits-all" policy prescriptions.

Mr. Chairman,

Climate change is a matter of serious concern for all of us. Developing countries like India are being hugely impacted and we want to be part of the solution even though we have not caused the problem. The outcome at Copenhagen needs to be ambitious and equitable while respecting the provisions and principles of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change, especially common but differentiated responsibilities. It must also ensure that developing countries can pursue their overriding imperative of poverty eradication. Mr. Chairman, We agree with the report of the Secretary-General that a key deficiency in the management of globalization is the lack of effective global governance. We need a genuine and comprehensive reform of international governance structures, with real voice and participation of developing countries. This includes reform at the Bretton Woods Institutions and at the UN, where the Security Council must be expanded in both its permanent and non-permanent categories to reflect contemporary realities. We also need to ensure that international regimes are equitable. A steady reduction in industrial tariffs has opened markets of developing countries, but they continue to face non-trade barriers in accessing markets of developed countries. At the same time trade in agriculture is distorted through huge subsidies to agriculture in developed countries. Moreover, it remains difficult and unaffordable for developing countries to access advanced technologies to combat climate change due to the existing Intellectual Property Rights regime. We welcome the suggestions made in the report of the Secretary-General to promote diffusion of technology in developing countries, including through a balanced IPR regime. The role of public funding to catalyse critical Research and Development, particularly in areas of climate friendly technologies, food production and public health, needs to be underscored.

We must also encourage collaborative efforts for joint R&D between institutions of developed and developing countries in these critical areas for the common good of humankind. Mr. Chairman, The UN has a unique legitimacy and universality among multilateral fora. We look forward to the UN playing a key role in assisting developing countries in addressing the impacts of globalization. The report of the Secretary-General has made various suggestions on the role of the UN in the context of globalization. Many of these deserve serious examination and need to be developed with the close involvement of Member-States.

Thank you.

798. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Sanjay Nirupam on Agenda Item 64 - Report of the Human Rights Council at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, October 30, 2009.

Mr. President,

Thank you very much for giving me this opportunity to address the General Assembly on the important issue of the "Report of the Human Rights Council".

At the outset, on behalf of my delegation, I would like to thank the President of the Human Rights Council for his report. Mr. President, My delegation notes positively the promise shown by the Human Rights Council since its inception in 2006 as the premier organ of the United Nations dealing with human rights. Considerable progress has been made in the last three years in strengthening of its institutional mechanism as well as reviewing, improving and rationalizing all mandates, mechanisms, functions and responsibilities of the former Commission on Human Rights.

Mr. President,

The strength of the Human Rights Council lies in its emphasis on dialogue, cooperation, transparency and non-selectivity in the promotion and protection of all human rights and fundamental freedom for all. The enthusiastic participation of Member States in the Universal Periodic Review process till date is a pointer in this direction. This also underscores the success of this innovative mechanism, which has provided a platform for sharing of national experiences and best practices in consultation and with the consent of the country concerned. The importance of the Universal Periodic Review mechanism was rightly summed up by the Secretary General when he said "this mechanism has great potential to promote and protect human rights in the darkest corners of the world".

Mr. President,

The holding of the special sessions on thematic issues over the past one and half years attests to the wide ranging debate being conducted in the Council. We reiterate our firm commitment to continue to engage constructively with all Member States, and strive to make the Council more effective, responsive and efficient. We strongly believe that international community can advance our common cause through dialogue and interaction.

Mr. President,

The Human Rights Council is still evolving. It is important that we continue to provide collective guidance to the Council and help it mature. We should also ensure that these efforts are inclusive and respect the diversity in historical national experiences, cultures and development of different countries.

In this regard, we would like to state that we look forward to the forthcoming review process of the functioning of the Human Right Council in 2011. Let me take this opportunity to also reaffirm our trust in the work and independence of the Special Procedures mandate-holders. While commendable work has been done by them, it is important that they exercise responsibility and be sensitive in discharging their respective mandates. The Human Rights Council has provided mandate-holders with the Code of Conduct; it is important that this is adhered to. Any attempt to reinterpret the Code of Conduct or depart from their mandates would weaken the mandate holders and the important functions entrusted to them by the Human Rights Council. In this regard, we welcome the Council's resolution, 11/11, on the System of Special Procedures.

Mr. President,

We are encouraged by the efforts of the Human Rights Council to translate the Right to Development into a reality. Discussions on the Right to Development are gradually moving away from the realm of theory and principles into design and implementation of policies, leading to its realisation. In this connection, we note the significant contribution of the Working Group on the Right to Development.

Mr. President,

The Council must play a central role in denouncing terrorism, which poses the biggest threat to our common efforts towards peace, security and development. It also undermines the very foundations of freedom and democracy and enjoyment of human rights, including the most important fundamental right of them all, namely the right to life. Mr. President, In conclusion, I would like to say that the work of the Human Rights Council should proceed in a spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding. It should strive to promote human rights through international cooperation and genuine dialogue among Member States, including capacity-building and mutual assistance. India remains committed in making the Human Rights Council a strong, effective and efficient body capable of promoting and protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms for all.

Thank you, Mr. President.

799. Intervention by the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri after the Secretary General's briefing on the situation in Afghanistan to the General Assembly.

New York, October 30, 2009.

Mr. President,

At the outset I would like to thank you Mr. President for making it possible for the Secretary General to brief us this afternoon. India condemns in the strongest possible terms the dastardly terrorist attack in Kabul on the UN's premises that killed five UN staff members and injured several others. Our own Embassy in Kabul has been attacked on two occasions, with the last one being only some weeks back. We have lost colleagues in these attacks with several more injured and loss of many innocent Afghan lives. We share the sense of grief of the UN community and offer our deepest condolences to the families of the victims, not only in this but similar attacks on the UN in this region and elsewhere. The terrorist attack, for which the Taliban has claimed responsibility, is a desperate attempt of those opposed to lasting peace and security in Afghanistan and aimed at disrupting the Presidential run-off elections scheduled on November 7, 2009. We could not agree more with the Secretary General that the UN was targeted because of its support for the elections.

The successful conclusion of elections would be an important milestone in Afghanistan's evolution as a democracy. All stakeholders - the Afghan Government, the international community and the UN must redouble their efforts and work in close coordination towards the organization of these elections as per schedule. We commend the UN's resolve and determination not to be deterred by this tragic incident and to carry on its Mission in Afghanistan. We also express our solidarity with the people and Government of Afghanistan and commend their resolve to confront the challenges that lie ahead.

Mr. President,

We affirm our full support to all the measures outlined by the Secretary General for strengthening safety and security of the UN personnel and its facilities. There is no doubt in our mind for the need for stepped up safety and security measures and their rigorous implementation on the ground. I would be remiss, therefore, if I did not respond to the SG's demand for additional resources to meet the needs for enhanced security. I want to assure the Secretary General that these requirements will have our most favourable consideration in the shortest possible time-frame. We firmly believe that an expanded and enhanced UN presence on the ground is critical for effective coordination of international efforts. There is no substitute for the coordinating role of the UN in the reconstruction of Afghanistan.

Mr. President,

This incident once again clearly underscores the security challenges in Afghanistan. The challenge from a resurgent Taliban and Al Qaeda is real, and it is one that threatens us all. We need to confront this 'head on' as we are doing right now. The fight against terrorism cannot be compartmentalized. Given the recent dramatic decline in security, there is need for an intensified focus on security, governance and development by the Afghan Government and here the international community should do what it can to assist. Failure in Afghanistan's stabilization will entail a heavy cost for both the Afghan people and the world at large.

When we speak of recommitting ourselves to helping Afghanistan defeat the forces that seek to destroy all that has been achieved since 2001, it is important to recognize that all of us have an abiding interest in the success of this endeavour. What we believe Afghanistan needs is a long-term commitment, even while remaining mindful of the challenges. The Afghan people have displayed resilience and a survival instinct even against the greatest odds. We must do our utmost to support them.

Thank you.

800. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN B. K. Hariprasad on Agenda Item 67-Elimination of Racism and Racial Discrimination and Agenda Item 68 - Right of peoples to Self-determination at the Third Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 2, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

I would like to start by thanking the UN Secretary General for his reports under the agenda items dealing with racism and racial discrimination and rights of peoples to self-determination.

My thanks are also due to the Chairperson of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, the Special Rapporteur on Contemporary forms of Racism, Racial Discrimination and Related Intolerance, and the Chairperson of the Working Group on the Use of Mercenaries as a Means of Impeding the Exercise of Rights of People to Self Determination, for their statements to the Committee.

My delegation associates itself with statement made by the Chair of the G-77.

Mr. Chairman,

Mahatma Gandhi, the Father of our Nation, had experienced the full force of discrimination based on colour during his nearly two decade long stay in South Africa at the turn of the twentieth century even before his return to India to lead our struggle for independence.

Moreover, as a country that was under colonial rule for nearly two centuries, Indians were well acquainted with the abhorrent facts of racism and racial discrimination.

Very conscious of the destructive impact that racism and racial discrimination can have on society, the leaders of our freedom struggle ensured that the Constitution of India, even in its preamble, enshrined the basic value of equality.

Article 14 of our Constitution further-on clearly states that the State shall not deny to any person equality before law. This encompasses equality of opportunity as well as equality of status. And then we have Article 15 which expressly prohibits discrimination on grounds of religion, race, caste, sex and place of birth. These two articles are a mere reflection of the fundamental principles and values that are an integral part of the fabric that binds a diverse country like India, together.

While the Constitution of India is the foundation of our legal and political system, India's independent judiciary has been in the forefront in safeguarding these rights for all our citizens. These rights are also reinforced by a free and vibrant media and vocal civil society.

Mr. Chairman,

The fight against racism and efforts to rid the world of racial discrimination and colonization were, therefore, obviously a corner-stone of our foreign policy after independence. In pursuing such objectives we were also guided by the fact that several parts of the globe were still under colonial rule and the most despicable of all forms of racial discrimination, apartheid, was on an ascendant in South Africa.

At the UN, our delegation took the lead in drafting the Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD) and we are proud that distinguished Indians have served on the Committee on Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

We naturally support national and international measures that must be undertaken to combat racism. We share the concern of other countries and of the General Assembly that expressed alarm at the increase in the number of racist incidents in several countries.

Mr. Chairman,

We welcome the outcome of the Durban Review Conference which was held in April this year. This outcome made an assessment of the effectiveness of the existing Durban follow-up mechanisms and other UN mechanisms dealing with racism and racial discrimination. It also assessed the efforts that have been made to promote the implementation of the provisions of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination and the sharing of best practices. It is important that the focus of these efforts remain on addressing the abhorrent issues of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and other related intolerance as specified in its mandate. We would like to reiterate our firm commitment to the Durban Declaration and Programme of Action and seek to create more effective measures to enhance its effective implementation.

Mr. Chairman,

India has been an active supporter of the Palestinian people's right to self determination and realization of their inalienable rights. We remain committed to Palestine and will continue to do all within our capacity to assist the Palestinian people in building their capacities and institutions.

India believes that the solution to the Palestine issue should be based on the relevant UN Resolutions, the Arab Peace Plan and the Quartet Roadmap resulting in a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine living within secure and recognized borders, side by side at peace with Israel.

Mr. Chairman,

The right to self determination is sacrosanct and must be considered as a fundamental right for people of non self governing territories and trust colonies. This is a right that allows people to freely establish their governance structures and participate in national democratic processes and institutions.

At the same time, the right to self determination cannot be used towards subversive political agendas. The international community has always agreed that this right cannot be extended to component parts or groups based on ethnic, religious or other such narrow lines, within an independent sovereign state. Any attempts to erode the territorial integrity of a Member State, is in fact an attack on the fundamental principles enshrined in the charter of the United Nations.

Mr. Chairman,

We regret the unacceptable reference made by the delegation of Pakistan to the Indian State of Jammu and Kashmir. I would like to reiterate that the Indian State of Jammu & Kashmir is an integral part of the Union of India and its people regularly participate in free, fair and open elections. Pakistan would be well advised to concentrate its focus on combating terrorism and not allowing the use of its territory by terrorists and their infrastructure. Pakistan has already been advised that they should take credible action against terrorists and their support base. This is necessary to create conditions for meaningful dialogue. I would also like to request the Pakistani delegation not to use this forum to sow detraction in support for the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination.

Mr. Chairman,

For all of us in independent countries, nothing has a more empowering ring than the right to elect representatives, whether for national Parliaments, or for State legislatures or institutions of local self-governance. The exercise of this right, single-handedly, gives every citizen the most unique power to influence the course of the government in his or her country.

As the largest democracy in the world, we in India are, indeed, proud of our democratic traditions. This year we elected our 15th Lok Sabha, i.e., the Lower House of the Parliament. This enormous exercise involved more than 700 million voters exercising their franchise to elect 543 Members of Parliament.

Mr. Chairman,

Mahatma Gandhi once said "You must not lose faith in humanity. Humanity is an ocean; if a few drops of the ocean are dirty, the ocean does not become dirty".

The task ahead of us is long and challenging but we must firmly believe in the goodness of the human race. Equality and peace are fundamental to our existence. We should jointly purge the world of racist, xenophobic and discriminatory practices and facilitate the legitimate right of self determination for nations seeking freedom. We must use this opportunity wisely to rid the vast ocean of the drops of dirty water.

801. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Francisco Sardinha on Agenda Item 116 - Follow up to the Commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the Abolition of the Transatlantic Slave Trade at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 2, 2009.

Mr. President,

On behalf of the delegation of India, I am, indeed, honoured to address the UN General Assembly on the "Follow-up to the commemoration of the two-hundredth anniversary of the abolition of the Transatlantic Slave Trade".

Two year ago, when the resolution on the commemoration of the two-hundredth anniversary of the abolition of the Transatlantic Slave Trade was adopted by consensus by the General Assembly, India was proud to co-sponsor it.

We are again happy to co-sponsor the follow up resolution that has been tabled by the CARICOM today.

In this connection, I would also like to welcome the Secretary General's report on the program of educational outreach on the transatlantic slave trade and slavery.

Mr. President,

Slavery has been one of the greatest scars on the history of nations. For a man to enslave another is truly a crime of the highest degree.

It is, therefore, imperative that we commemorate the great struggles and battles that have been fought to get rid of this scourge.

Mr. President,

A Greek historian had noted of ancient India, "[it] is remarkable in India that all Indians are free, and no Indian ...is a slave". However this changed after we were colonized and India was forced to endure a form of indentured servitude for nearly two hundred years. The agony of slavery and the degradation that it leads to is, therefore, well understood by us.

Mr. President,

The transatlantic slave trade ravaged African and Caribbean nations to satisfy the rapacious economic greed and exploitation of the colonizers. The effects of its violence and human suffering are still visible today.

Lest we forget, it is important that the international community must take at least the first step in the right direction by paying homage to the victims of slavery and slave trade and acknowledging the tragedy.

We are humbled to be part of the initiative to erect a memorial in honor of the various victims of slavery and the transatlantic slave trade. The permanent memorial will be a small commemoration for the millions of victims who suffered silently with no hope of freedom before they disappeared into the night.

This memorial will not only serve as a hallmark for us to pay our respect but will also be a reminder for the international community to raise awareness about relevant issues that surround the great evil of slavery of which the transatlantic slave trade was one of the most abhorrent manifestation.

We welcome the establishment of the Committee led by the Caribbean and African countries to oversee the permanent memorial project. In this context, we feel it will be befitting if UNESCO undertakes the task of launching the international design project for the permanent memorial.

We also recognise the importance of education of current and future generations about the history, causes and impact of slavery and the transatlantic slave trade.

We support the initiatives undertaken by the United Nations and recognise that the appointment of the Goodwill Ambassador is a step forward in spreading awareness about this important issue.

Mr. President,

We welcome the initiatives undertaken by States in reaffirming their commitment to implement paragraphs 101 and 102 of the Durban Declaration of the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance aimed at countering the legacy of slavery and contributing to the restoration of the dignity of the victims of slavery and the slave trade.

Slavery and slave trade are symptomatic of evils that are still manifested in the form of racism and xenophobia. Our work at the United Nations will not be complete unless we can abolish all forms of slavery, including its present manifestations. This requires that we work together with a spirit of international cooperation to rid our world of these modern forms of slavery.

Thank you Mr. President.

802. Statement of Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Khagen Das on Agenda Item 53 - Sustainable Development at the Second Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA

New York, November 2, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

We would like to thank the Secretary-General for the detailed reports on the agenda item "Sustainable Development". We associate ourselves with the statement made by the Chair of the Group of 77.

Mr. Chairman,

The need for sustainable development has perhaps never been felt as strongly as it is being felt today. The multiple inter-linked crises that we face today necessarily need an integrated approach to sustainable development, with emphasis on all its three pillars of economic development, social development and environmental protection. This is key to achieving our development goals, particularly that of eradication of poverty and hunger. We agree with the views expressed in the report of the Secretary-General that Agenda 21 was truly an attempt to bring diverse agendas together. It is important that we continue to strive for full implementation of this important consensus, as well as its Johannesburg Plan of Implementation. In this regard, we also support the holding of a "Rio+20" event in Brazil in 2012 to comprehensively review the progress made in implementing the sustainable development agenda. Small Island Developing States [SIDS] have been particularly affected by the ongoing financial and economic crisis as well as climate change. Many of them have also been devastated by natural disasters this year. The enormous national efforts these countries are making must be complemented by greater international attention and action to address their special challenges. We hope the five year review of the Mauritius Strategy of Implementation next year will lead to further concrete actions in this regard. India has been privileged to have been able to contribute to the development efforts of SIDS in the spirit of South-South solidarity. We will continue with our efforts in areas like capacity building, natural disaster preparedness, adapting to climate change and enhancing resilience. However, efforts by fellow developing countries cannot replace the fulfillment of commitments by the developed world.

Mr. Chairman,

Our meeting today takes place at a critical time in the context of the ongoing climate change negotiations in the UNFCCC. We must reach an ambitious outcome at the forthcoming Copenhagen meeting, which also recognizes the centrality of the principle of equity.

This outcome must be based on the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities, as well as the historical responsibility of developed countries, which must commit and deliver on truly significant reductions in their emissions. The outcome must acknowledge that developing countries have to pursue accelerated development, and that they need hugely scaled up resources to address the challenge of climate change. As a country that is significantly affected by climate change, India, we have a major interest in ensuring a substantive and constructive outcome in Copenhagen. India will be part of the solution, even though we have not caused the problem in any way. It is also important to note that India's per capita emissions of around 1 ton of carbon dioxide equivalent per annum is only a quarter of the global average and half that of even the developing countries as a whole. Moreover, our contribution to the stock of carbon dioxide is negligible. We have also repeatedly reaffirmed that our per-capita emissions would never exceed the average per capita emissions of the developed countries, even as we pursue our development objectives. Nevertheless, India has domestically been taking voluntary mitigation and adaptation measures. Many of these will have specific time-bound goals. We have drawn up an ambitious National Action Plan on Climate Change. We are focusing on actions in a variety of areas like solar and other renewable energies, use of clean coal technologies, energy efficiency, green building codes, large scale reforestation efforts and green agriculture, among others. Ensuring affordable access to energy for millions of our citizens is a key element in achieving our overriding priority of poverty eradication. Promoting renewable energy is an important element in this effort. However, we are conscious that we will also have to continue to take recourse to fossil fuels in the foreseeable future. Affordable access to clean technologies is fundamental to both these strategies. It is imperative that we revisit the Intellectual Property Rights regime to ensure that for critical green technologies, rewards for innovators are balanced with the needs of humankind. We must actively promote collaborative R&D activities and technology transfer, particularly through public funding.

In this context, I am happy to recall that India jointly organized with UN-DESA the "Delhi high-level conference on climate change: technology development and technology transfer" on 22-23 October 2009. We will also organize the 4th International Renewable Energy Conference in New Delhi next year on the theme "Up-scaling and Mainstreaming Renewables for Energy Security and Climate Change". We welcome the setting up of International Renewable Energy Agency (IRENA), and designating Abu Dhabi as its interim headquarters.

Mr. Chairman,

India attaches significant importance to the full implementation of the Convention on Biological Diversity, particularly the ongoing negotiations on an international regime on access and benefit-sharing. We hosted the meeting of the Group of Experts on Traditional Knowledge of the Ad hoc Open-Ended Working Group on Access and Benefit-sharing earlier this year. We believe that a regime on access and benefit sharing should include provisions for mandatory disclosure of country of origin of genetic resources, prior informed consent in Intellectual Property Rights applications, and the fair and equitable sharing of benefits, as required under the Convention. Next year will also provide an opportunity to take a holistic look at the level of achievement of the 2010 bio-diversity targets, and decide on future action.

Thank you.

803. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN B. K. Hariprasad on Agenda Item 41 - Report of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. Questions relating to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons and Humanitarian Questions at the Third Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 3, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

My delegation would like to thank the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) for his report, as well as his presentation before this Committee. His report highlights the central challenges being faced by the UNHCR and the organization's efforts to address them.

Mr. Chairman,

Refugees and stateless persons are a particularly vulnerable group. Having been forced to leave the country of their nationality or origin, they have little choice but to rely on the hospitality of the country where they have sought refuge. It is particularly important that the international community remain cognizant of the plight of such groups and be prepared to extend all help that can be offered to allow such groups to live a life with at-least a minimum modicum of dignity. In this context, we appreciate the work done by the UNHCR in fulfillment of its mandate, including its efforts to strengthen capacities for both protection and quick response in emergency situations. At the same time, we remain concerned at protracted refugee situations, and the increasingly challenging environment in which not only are the numbers of those seeking refuge and protection rising but that the UNHCR has been unable to adequately access the very people it is supposed to protect in several situations. A major factor in this regard has been the role of non-state actors in situations of armed conflict, who have prevented humanitarian assistance from reaching the victims of conflict and those seeking refuge and protection. It is important that the international community squarely addresses the issue of bringing these non-state actors to respect the humanitarian framework and machinery. It is equally important that the determination of refugee status should conform strictly to UNHCR's mandate to ensure that those guilty of terrorist and criminal acts do not abuse the national asylum systems and the international protection regime.

Mr. Chairman,

The primary responsibility to look after the internally displaced populations (IDPs) lies with national authorities. It is, therefore, important that UNHCR's involvement in IDPs should only be with the concurrence of national authorities, and, only if the situation is one of a collapse of national authority then in conformity with the conditions approved by the UN General Assembly. Further, such involvement should be based on due consideration of UNHCR's mandate, modality of intervention, availability of resources and after a careful examination of all the implications.

Mr. Chairman,

India is not a signatory to the 1951 UN Convention on Refugees as we believe that the Convention is limited in scope and does not address issues related to massive migration and mixed refugee flows. However, we have always respected international principles pertaining to refugees and India is second to none in upholding non-refoulment. The Indian civilization and heritage has an underlying pluralist and tolerant character that has been receptive to and has hosted, diverse streams of migration over thousands of years. India shouldered two of the biggest exodus of populations in modern history - one related to the partition of India in 1947 and the other during the liberation struggle of Bangladesh in 1971. Even today we are host to some of the largest refugee populations in the world. And, we have cared for them from our own resources while affording these refugees full protection under our laws. We have also successfully managed repatriation of a large number of refugees to their countries of origin through bilateral arrangements without any multilateral assistance.

Mr. Chairman,

India remains committed to working in concert with UNHCR and the international community to address the present and emerging challenges to the international protection agenda in a spirit of solidarity. We respect the efforts of the UNHCR staff in their noble mission, often in dangerous situations, and assure them of our continuing cooperation.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman

804. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Khagen Das on the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 3, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, please allow me to express appreciation for the work of the Commissioner General and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA). We also thank the UNRWA Advisory Committee and the members of the working group on the Financing of UNRWA, for their efforts in support of this Agency. We felicitate UNRWA on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of its establishment. UNRWA's work in providing humanitarian assistance, including education, health care and social services is highly commendable.

2. India has consistently supported these efforts. We reiterate our appreciation for the difficult but essential service that UNRWA has rendered over the years, making assistance of the Palestinian refugees its highest priority.

Mr. Chairman,

The report, and other reports of the UN Secretary-General under this agenda item, clearly illustrate the severe challenges UNRWA continues to face. The Agency's budgetary shortfall continues to grow and it is finding difficult to maintain the existing level of services. This paucity of funds is paralleled by an increase in the demands upon the Agency for assistance and support, in particular in Gaza. We are concerned that the global financial crisis has adversely impacted UNRWA's operations. These funding challenges exacerbate existing pressures of caring for refugees in overcrowded camps leading inhuman lives that are in urgent need of up-gradation. Such challenges cannot be addressed by a reduced capacity to help. There is an urgent need for greater international effort to ease UNRWA's fiscal burden. Against this backdrop, India made a special contribution of US $ One million in January 2009 in response to the Gaza flash appeal made by UNRWA for extending assistance to Palestinian civilians. On the occasion of the 60th anniversary of UNRWA and given the financial constraints faced by the Agency, India has made a commitment to increase its contribution to the Agency to US $ One million this year. These are in addition to our financial assistance packages to the Palestinians National Authority and other humanitarian assistance efforts for the well-being of the Palestinian people.

Mr. Chairman,

We share Commissioner General's assessment that an open access regime and greater freedoms for Palestinians are essential for creating an atmosphere in which the forces of compromise, moderation and tolerance are encouraged. The insecurity bred by extreme levels of poverty among the Palestinian people in the Occupied Territories is heightened by the lack of definitive progress in the peace process.

This leads us to the larger point: the only lasting solution to the problem of the Palestinian refugees is a just, lasting and comprehensive solution to the long-standing conflict in the Middle East. We believe that the solution to the Palestine issue should be based on the relevant UN Resolutions, the Arab Peace Plan and the Quartet Roadmap resulting in a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine living within secure and recognized borders, side by side at peace with Israel. Till the day when a mutually-acceptable peace is in position, it is incumbent upon all of us to support UNRWA, as the primary source of humanitarian assistance to the Palestinian refugees. For this reason, we endorse efforts to support UNRWA by expanding its capacity to render assistance. India will, of course, continue to do all within its capacities to assist Palestine in its endeavours in capacity and institution-building. We salute the struggling people of Palestine. We express our solidarity with the Palestinian people.

Thank you Mr. Chairman

805. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Vijay Ramnikal Rupani on Agenda Item 54 - Implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements [Habitat II] and strengthening of the United Nations Human Settlements Programme [UN-Habitat] at the Second Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 4, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

We thank the Secretary General for the report on the agenda item under consideration today. We would like to associate ourselves with the statement made by the Chair of the Group of 77.

Mr. Chairman,

India attaches great importance to the issue of affordable housing. This topic is even more relevant now in the context of the ongoing global financial and economic crisis and the consequent crunch on the availability of finance for housing in developing countries. It is, therefore, satisfying that the special theme of the twenty second session of the Governing Council of UN-Habitat held earlier this year was related to affordable housing finance systems. We believe that many of the initiatives launched by UN-Habitat in this regard, particularly the experimental reimbursable seeding operations, have the potential to make real impact. It is important that the international community fully supports and provides financial resources to these efforts. We are also encouraged by the recognition in the report of the Secretary-General of the broader need for proactive Government policies in the housing sector, rather than leave this sector entirely to market forces. Public policy and regulatory frameworks can specifically cater to the needs of the poor. In this regard, permit me to highlight that the Government of India has taken several initiatives to improve housing and habitat for its population through numerous programmes, both in urban and rural areas. The goal of "Affordable housing for all" is the overarching objective of our National Urban Housing and Habitat Policy, while promoting sustainable habitat development. A special committee has recently been set up under this Policy to collect detailed data on low-income households. Another component of this Policy is the "Jawaharlal Nehru National Urban Renewal Mission", which seeks to provide seven basic services to the poor, namely, land tenure, affordable shelter, water, sanitation, education, health and social security.

In rural areas, where the vast majority of our population still lives, there are programmes like the "Indira Awaas Yojana", which help in the construction and upgradation of dwelling units for the poor by providing them a lump sum financial assistance. We are also developing and promoting cost-effective, environment friendly and disaster resistant housing technologies for both urban and rural areas. Mr. Chairman, Strengthening public-private partnerships is an integral element of our housing policies. Various types of public-private partnerships are being promoted under the scheme of "Affordable Housing in Partnership". This initiative also intends to provide economic stimulus through job creation, especially for the construction workers and other urban poor who are likely to be amongst the most vulnerable groups in recession. The initiative further targets the creation of demand for a large variety of industrial goods through the multiplier effect of housing on other economic activities. In this context of public-private partnerships, India was happy to host the first Habitat Business Forum in New Delhi earlier this year. This event also provided an opportunity to recognize successful initiatives in the private sector in the areas like affordable land and housing, water and sanitation, green technologies and disaster preparedness. Habitat policies can only be successful if they take a holistic approach. Promoting employment is a key element in this. In India, schemes like the Swarna Jayanti Shahari Rozgar Yojana (SJSRY) seeks to provide gainful employment to the urban unemployed or underemployed through the setting up of self-employment ventures or provision of wage employment. The Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act provides 100 days of employment of every rural household. Other habitat elements like sanitation are being addressed through schemes to construct low-cost sanitation units. Further, there is special emphasis on creation of economic infrastructure, and community and social assets. We are also conscious of the need to promote sustainable habitat development. We have adopted green building codes and energy efficient transport options, among other measures. We are also encouraging greater representation of all sections of society in local authorities and expanding their functional domain to focus on environment, developing sustainable habitation, local economic development, planning, and resource mobilization.

Mr. Chairman,

South-South cooperation can play an important role in housing development. We are happy that the Governing Council of UN-Habitat has requested UN-Habitat to make use of the experience, expertise and centres of excellence existing in several countries of the South to help in the implementation of its work programme. India has been active in sharing its experiences and know-how in the field of housing development with fellow developing countries, and we are committed to continue our efforts. We reiterate the need for the international community to provide financial resources to UN-Habitat to further facilitate South-South cooperation. In fact, Mr. Chairman, the issue of budgetary constraints continues to be recurring problem for UN-Habitat. It is of concern that regular budget funds represent only around seven per cent of the total UN-Habitat budget and there is a severe imbalance between earmarked and non-earmarked contributions. We agree with the report of the Secretary-General that adequate, stable and predictable funding, preferably through multi-year financing, would enable UN-Habitat to plan effectively for the delivery of its approved work programme and the implementation of the medium-term strategic and institutional plan for the period 2008-2013. It is imperative that there be concrete progress towards this goal.

Thank you.

806. Statement by the Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN B. K. Hariprasad on the Report of the Human Rights Council at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 4, 2009.

Mr. President,

India condemns in the strongest possible terms the violations of international humanitarian law and human rights law committed during the Gaza conflict in December 2008-January 2009.

We are convinced that the unqualified adherence by all the concerned parties to the relevant instruments of international humanitarian law and human rights law is imperative, and further that any refusal by the concerned parties to do so should rightly receive the strongest possible opprobrium of the international community.

Mr. President,

We note that the "Goldstone Report" has been discussed by the UN system a number of times prior to our meeting today. This Report which was prepared under the express mandate of the President of the Human Rights Council has been discussed at the Council in a special session in the middle of last month. Let us, therefore, be clear that what we are discussing is the report of the Human Rights Council at its 12th special session which was held in Geneva last month. While participating in the Special Session, we had noted that the Fact Finding Mission had produced a comprehensive report that merits careful consideration. It had documented violations of human rights and international humanitarian law by all the sides involved. This is a matter of serious concern. We also pointed out that it was important not to lose sight of the weaknesses of the Report, including the fact that the Report itself admits that its findings do not necessarily reach the standard of proof applicable in criminal trials and that the Mission should have addressed its recommendations to the Council and not to other institutions in the UN and multilateral system. The Report was also among the major issues discussed by the Security Council on 14 October. We had carefully watched this discussion in the Security Council as well as the events which led to its convening and followed it up with a serious analysis of the developments that have since unfolded.

Mr. President,

India's deep association with, and continuing commitment to, Palestine is rooted in our modern history that goes back to our struggle for independence.

We believe that the solution to the Palestine issue should be based on the relevant UN Resolutions, the Arab Peace Plan and the Quartet Roadmap resulting in a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine living within secure and recognized borders, side by side at peace with Israel. India will continue to do all within its capacities to assist Palestine in its endeavours in capacity and institution-building, as exemplified, among other things, by the recent enhancement in our contribution to UNRWA. Mr. President, The continuance of an atmosphere of distrust and refusal to talk is fast becoming a major obstacle to peace and security in the West Asia region. Terrorism and an escalating humanitarian crisis are adding obstacles to any resumption of the dialogue process.

We are convinced that all the concerned parties involved in the Gaza conflict nearly a year back need to introspect and take firm action against those responsible for violations of international humanitarian law and human rights law in a credible and speedy manner as has been recommended by the Goldstone Report. The international community, especially the countries in the region must play a positive role in creating an enabling atmosphere for such investigations and follow-up actions. In conclusion, Mr. President, I wish to emphasize that while we welcome the various efforts at documenting the injustices and atrocities committed during the Gaza conflict, we have reservations in making an unqualified endorsement of the various recommendations as well as of some of the procedures adopted by the Goldstone Report, including on involvement of the International Criminal Court and that of the Security Council. Thank you.

807. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Bhagat Singh Koshyari on Agenda Item 105 - International Drug Control Results of the High-level Segment of the fifty-second Session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 5, 2009.

Mr. President,

Let me at the outset welcome the Political Declaration and Plan of Action on International Cooperation towards an Integrated and Balanced Strategy to Counter the World Drug Problem which was adopted at the high-level meeting of the 52nd Session of the Commission on Narcotics Drugs in March this year. Let me assure India's commitment to the implementation of the declaration. Let me also express my appreciation for the work done by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime on the world drug problem through its various initiatives and reports, and in helping carry forward the drug control agenda through this important and timely review process. Over the last several decades, some measure of success has been achieved in putting in place an international framework on drug control, notably the three UN Conventions of 1961, 1971, and 1988 and the Political Declaration and Action Plan adopted at the 20th Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly in 1998. The World Drug Report for this year has significantly observed that there is evidence of reduction in the cultivation of crops for drugs and decline in the demand for illicit drugs globally. However, despite international efforts in this direction, illicit drug production, supply, consumption, and traffic remains a major global challenge that affects the entire international community. It is therefore important to not only reflect on the path traversed so far, but also to build on the gains, incremental as they may be, and translate it into an effective and coordinated international response while charting a future course of action.

Mr. President,

India's resolve to fight the menace of illicit drugs remains steadfast. We will continue to adhere to the commitments made in the three UN Conventions as well as in the Political Declaration and Plan of Action to overcome the world drug problem that was adopted at the June 1998 Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly. India is one of the world's principal producers of licit opium. We seek to ensure a balance in the demand and supply of licit opiates required for genuine medicinal and scientific purposes. The legal regime in India is defined by the Narcotics Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Act 1985 and Prevention of Money Laundering Act which brings drug-related offences within its ambit. Due to persistent efforts during the last two decades, the situation of illicit drugs in India has changed considerably. Significant success has been achieved by the Narcotics Control Bureau of India in recent years through seizure of various illicit narcotic drugs and also in combating trafficking, interdiction and investigation, and destroying illicit drug.

Mr. President,

India supports a balanced approach that relies on destruction of illicit drug crops while at the same time providing alternative means of livelihood to the farmers adversely affected by such destruction. Such an approach could be utilized in Afghanistan as well, which has to be the focus of the problem in the foreseeable future. There is also a need to control Amphetamine Type Stimulants (ATS) and its precursors, an area where significant gaps exist in the international control regime. We would urge the UNODC to bridge the asymmetry in the regulatory framework between different countries by helping expand precursor control regulation to cover all countries as a shared responsibility. We must raise social awareness about the adverse consequences of drug addiction, particularly amongst the younger generation, which is one of the most vulnerable groups. Apart from stringent legal measures, societies should strive to inculcate the highest moral values in our youth, including through the teachings of our great philosophers and religious thinkers. Incorporating practices like yoga and meditation in our daily lives is also helpful in weaning the youth away from toxic and destructive lifestyles that lead to problems like drug abuse. However, we are conscious that national efforts alone cannot effectively address this problem. Combating the menace of illicit drugs requires member states to develop a cohesive, balanced and integrated approach to the issue. In this context, India reaffirms its commitment to working closely with other countries, both bilaterally and through regional and international collaboration, to achieving our common goal of a world free of illicit drugs. Collective, coordinated, and concrete strategies should be devised to effectively combat illegal drug production, consumption, and trade so as to jointly address the challenges in the coming years.

Mr. President,

Drug trafficking is more often a transnational crime and one of the main sources for financing terrorist activities. It cannot be tackled individually or in isolation. Bilateral, regional, and multilateral cooperation has to be recognized as a key element of any strategy to effectively combat this problem. We cannot succeed in rooting out the threat posed by illicit drug supply and production without also addressing the destructive linkages to narco-terrorism, arms trade and money laundering. To make a real difference, the international community must break the pernicious nexus between drug trafficking, terrorism, money laundering, illegal arms trade, and trans-national organized crime. This is of particular concern to India which is painfully familiar with the issue having suffered from years of terrorism. The international community must come together to take a coordinated far-sighted global approach. Crucial in this context is the need to now adopt the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism, which has been under negotiation at the United Nations for years.

Mr. President,

I would like to reiterate India's unwavering commitment to working closely with the international community in eliminating the world drug and attendant problems including narco-terrorism and the financing of terrorism through drugs.

Thank You, Mr. President.

808. Statement of the Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Khagen Das on the situation in Afghanistan at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 9, 2009.

Mr. President,

Let me begin by expressing India's appreciation for scheduling this discussion on a subject of great significance for us, our region and the world. I commend the effort by the delegation of Germany in coordinating inter-governmental negotiations that have led us to this annual General Assembly resolution on the "Situation in Afghanistan". As we have been doing for the last several years, we are happy to co-sponsor this resolution, which is traditionally adopted by consensus.

Mr. President,

The successful conclusion of the first Afghan-led Presidential and Provincial Council's elections is a major milestone in Afghanistan's evolution as a democracy. We congratulate President Hamid Karzai on his re-election and express our appreciation to all democratic forces in Afghanistan. I would be remiss if I do not place on record our appreciation for the critical supportive role played by the UN and the international community towards organizing these elections. India appreciates the resoluteness and determination of the Afghan people who participated in this historic election process, notwithstanding threats and intimidation by the Taliban. Once a new government assumes office, this would provide us a fresh opportunity for a renewed commitment by the international community towards rebuilding Afghanistan. While determining the contours of a new compact, we need to assimilate and integrate the experiences drawn from the past compacts. The past compacts, such as those reached in London in January 2006 and Paris in June 2008 placed the responsibility for institution building and governance mainly on the shoulders of the Afghan people and government, without adequately resourcing that effort and eliminating the growing threat from terrorist groups destabilizing the country. This time we need to be mindful of these aspects. Mr. President, In the arduous journey for lasting peace and security in Afghanistan, significant challenges lie ahead. First and foremost is the imperative need for security. The challenge from a resurgent Taliban and Al Qaeda is real, and it is one that threatens us all. Asymmetric warfare and complex terrorist attacks are being mounted in Afghanistan and the well-springs that sustain such terror show no signs of being drained. Civilians, humanitarian personnel, international and UN staff and diplomatic personnel- including our Mission in Kabul have been targeted in terrorist attacks. There is an increasing recognition that the increase in terrorist actions in Afghanistan is linked to the support and sanctuaries available in the contiguous areas. That explains the particularly high-level of violence in the border areas of Afghanistan. Security and stabilization of Afghanistan will remain a distant goal unless we are able to root out the elements of Al Qaida, Taliban and other terrorist and extremist groups operating from within and outside Afghanistan's borders.

Therefore, in addition to the strengthening of the International Security Assistance Force, it is critical that the Afghan National Security Forces are enlarged and developed in a professional manner, at a much faster pace. They should be provided appropriate resources, combat equipment, and training. We welcome the expansion of their capacities as this is the only viable guarantee for a successful conclusion to military engagement in Afghanistan. We note with appreciation the efforts being made by third countries to strengthen the capacities of the Afghan National Security Forces. Indeed, there are no quick-fix solutions. In the battle for winning the hearts and minds of ordinary Afghans, we need to guard against the risk of pessimism and defeatisms pervading our thought processes. Perseverance and tenacity are critical to handle the challenge posed by Al Qaida, Taliban and other terrorists and extremist groups squarely and effectively. Mr. President, This brings us to reconciliation. It requires strategic clarity, unity of purpose, and due recognition of the nature of those with we seek to reconcile with. Without consensus amongst relevant parties over key issues, such as reconciliation with whom and how, we may well be dividing ourselves; not those we seek to "peel away" from terrorist groups. It is for this reason that we must go beyond unworkable divisions between "good" and "bad" Taliban. Terrorism cannot be compartmentalized. History suggests that facile attempts to strike Faustian bargains with terrorists often result in such forces turning on the very powers that sustained them in the past. Any effort which weakens the authority of the Central Government and its institutions would be counter-productive. We need to be extremely cautious while moving forward on this sensitive issue. We support the Afghan Government's determination to integrate those willing to abjure violence and live and work within the parameters of the Afghan Constitution, which provides the framework for a pluralistic and democratic society. This should, of course, go hand-in-hand with the shutting down of support and sanctuaries provided to terrorist groups across the border.

Mr. President

A sustainable strategy for stabilization of Afghanistan must be predicated upon short, medium and long-term strategies to address the development challenge. While the Afghan government should spell out its priorities, the international community should come forward to provide the resources for fulfilling them. The efforts on the international community in Afghanistan can only be sustained in the long-term if we invest in developing Afghan human resources. For this, a multi-pronged approach is required: at one level, we must invest in rebuilding the economic and social infrastructure of the nation, while generating jobs. At another, we must progressively transfer skills and authority to our Afghan friends, to enable them to take full ownership of the reconstruction of their country. Mr. President, In India's efforts towards stabilization of Afghanistan, the focus has been on development. Stabilizing Afghanistan is not only integrally connected with our own security; it is also connected to the civilizational legacy of our friendship. Our commitment to Afghanistan has now crossed US $ 1.2 billion. It includes the widest range of activities; from a cold storage plant in Kandahar, to 218 km long Zaranj-Delaram Highway to a power transmission line to Kabul, which has provided round-the-clock electricity supply for the first time since 1992. We are building the Parliament Building- the edifice of democracy while simultaneously targeting community based local projects that provide quick peace dividends, such as schools and hospitals. In all of this, capacity-building is a core element. It is in support of this core task that India has expanded the current allocation of 1000 seats in our institutions for capacity-building and scholarship programmes by 35%. Turning to the regional aspect, Mr. President, stabilization of Afghanistan must be a central part of regional processes, if it is to regain its role as the crossroads of South, West and Central Asia. This includes regional economic processes, such as SAARC and the Regional Economic Cooperation Conference on Afghanistan. These benefit the entire region. Hindering these processes affects Afghanistan and the region as well. We must expand, rather than hinder, trade, transit and transport ties, including overland transit and trade. That is the best way of bringing the regional dimension into play in a positive manner.

Mr. President,

Given the turbulence of the past eight years and the recent dramatic decline in security, there is need for an intensified focus on security, governance and development by the Afghan Government and here the international community should do what it can to assist. Failure in Afghanistan's stabilization will entail a heavy cost for both the Afghan people and the world at large. When we speak of recommitting ourselves to helping Afghanistan defeat the forces that seek to destroy all that has been achieved since 2001, it is important to recognize that all of us have an abiding interest in the success of this endeavour. What we believe Afghanistan needs is a long-term commitment, even while remaining mindful of the challenges. The Afghan people have displayed resilience and a survival instinct even against the greatest odds. We must do our utmost to support them. Thank you.

809. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Dr. Janardhan Waghmare on Agenda Item 11 - Support by the United Nations System of the Efforts of Governments to promote and consolidate newly restored Democracies at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 9, 2009.

Mr. President,

At the outset I would like to congratulate the delegation of Qatar for introducing the draft resolution on the important issue of "support by the United Nations system of the efforts of Governments to promote and consolidate new or restored democracies". We are happy to co-sponsor the resolution.

We would also like to take this opportunity to thank Qatar for their successfully stewardship of the Chair of the International Conference of New or Restored Democracies (ICNRD) during the last three years and would like to assure Venezuela of our support during their forthcoming chairing of this process.

Mr. President,

The ICNRD process has come a long way since its inception with only thirteen countries in Manila more than twenty-one years ago. Today, this process has the participation of more than a hundred countries in its activities and with membership open to all the Member States of the United Nations.

This underscores the importance of the principles and purposes of the Conference and the success of this initiative.

We are also happy to note that this process has helped countries to share experiences on democracy as well as identify means to promote pluralistic and participatory democracy. We look forward to institutionalization of ICNRD activities.

Mr. President,

India is the world's largest democracy and we are proud at upholding the highest traditions of democracy since our independence more than sixty years back.

We draw particular satisfaction from the manner in which we conduct our elections. Since the past few years, we have been using electronic voting machines (EVMs). This has allowed our Election Commission to declare results within hours of the start of the counting process even though, on an average, our constituencies comprise over a million voters. A few months back, we elected the 15th Lok Sabha, the Lower House of Parliament, in a mammoth process that involved more than 700 million voters exercising their franchise to elect 543 Members of Parliament.

Mr. President,

We are also proud of yet another democratic process at the grassroots level in India. We have an institutionalized system of local self-governance in rural India since 1993 through the system of Panchayati Raj. A unique feature of this grass-roots empowerment is the component of gender empowerment which involves one-third of the elected seats being reserved for women. As a result, we have over a million elected women representatives in the country.

Mr. President,

Our experience has also shown that democracy is a powerful tool in successfully involving people in meeting the challenges of development. It allows their active participation in and influencing of government actions in the direction of peoples aspirations. It also ensures a voice for the most vulnerable and weakest sections of society.

Our experience also corroborates that implementation of proactive development policies and economic reforms, when coupled with a liberal democratic polity, leads to overall stability and growth of the country.

Mr. President,

India, being a developing country itself, is in a unique position of understanding the problems that other developing countries face while embracing democracy.

We have been sharing our experience, institutional capabilities and training infrastructure with nations that share our democratic values and beliefs and would like to benefit from the experience of other democracies..

In this context, we are happy to be one of the major contributors to the United Nations Democracy Fund and serve on its Advisory Board. We have also been offering our expertise bilaterally and through other multilateral fora promoting democratic ideals and the Rule of Law. We have also been active supporters of activities of the UNDP in the field of good governance.

Mr. President,

India is strongly committed to the underlying values and principles inspiring of the ICNRD. We would continue to support this as well as to provide necessary assistance to further consolidate, strengthen and support it.

Thank you, Mr. President.

810. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Vijay Ramniklal Rupani on the Culture of Peace at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 10, 2009.

Mr. President,

I am deeply honoured and privileged to participate in today's discussions under the agenda item "Culture of Peace".

Please allow me to express our sincere thanks and appreciation to the Secretary General for his comprehensive report on inter-religious and inter-cultural dialogue, understanding and cooperation for peace that outlines the ongoing processes and future initiatives envisaged in this field. In this context, we are happy to co-sponsor the resolution on International Decade for a Culture of Peace and Non-violence for the Children of the World 2001-2010. We are also happy to co-sponsor another major initiative in this area of the Alliance of Civilizations. India is a member of the Group of Friends and we are pleased to note that this initiative has gained momentum.

Mr. President,

We are extremely satisfied to co-sponsor the resolution on the Nelson Mandela International Day, which was endorsed by the special declaration adopted at the XV NAM Summit at Sharm El-Sheikh. We express our rich tributes to Nelson Mandela, a visionary and great leader of our times, whose life has been deeply influenced by Mahatma Gandhi - the greatest apostle of peace and non-violence. The adoption of this resolution is a befitting compliment to the incessant struggle of this living legend in his dedication to the service of humanity, struggle against racial discrimination and promoting reconciliation and democracy internationally, and in the promotion of a culture of peace throughout the world.

Mr. President,

The Charter of the United Nations says that the peoples of the United Nations are determined to practice tolerance and live together in peace. Peace and tolerance, therefore, form the core set of values that the United Nations has painstakingly promoted ever since its inception. These values, attitudes and ways of life underscore freedom, justice, solidarity, and respect for diversity, dialogue and understanding. Much of the conflict in today's world is driven by the absence of tolerance. Forces that would like the language of violence to replace the language of dialogue and peace fuel and stoke this conflict. This violence is spreading its tentacles and threatening to destroy the moral values and the fabric of tolerance and composite culture that has propelled progress for humankind. The magnitude of these problems requires, more than ever before, for all human beings to work together in finding new solutions. Mr. President, We need to create an environment conducive for fostering dialogue between diverse cultures, faiths and religions that inculcates the values that promote transition from force to reason, from conflict and violence to dialogue and peace.

Global efforts towards peace and reconciliation can only succeed with a collective approach that is built on trust, dialogue and collaboration. Albert Einstein rightly noted, "Peace cannot be kept by force. It can only be achieved by understanding." Dialogue amongst different cultures and religions is also important because it is precisely in the absence of such dialogue and understanding, that intolerance, bigotry and violence flourish. This is the reason why extremist ideologies, violence and terrorism, have grown in a world in which we seem to be moving away from dialogue and understanding. There can be no disputing that terrorism, which is a manifestation of extremism, intolerance and violence, is the antithesis of all religions. All acts of extremism and intolerance run counter to the central teachings of any religion, as all faiths are based on the universal values of peace, goodness and humanity. No religion condones violence or the killing of human beings.

Mr. President,

The history of India is a story of conversations between different civilizations. We have a tradition of respect and give and take between faiths and cultures. India is today home to the most diverse mix of people professing different faiths having in our midst some of the largest populations of the great religions of the world. The interaction between India and the West goes back to the time of ancient Greece. Millennia ago, the interaction between these two civilizations produced the Milindapanha, a record of the conversations between the Greek King Menander and a Buddhist sage, Nagasena. It also produced the exquisite Gandhara art form. India's contact with Islam produced the great edifice of the Indo-Islamic culture, including the beautiful traditions of sufism. We in India understand the importance of building alliances among religions, cultures and ethnic groups. As a nation of unparalleled diversity, Indians would not have succeeded in holding together and strengthening a composite Indian identity unless Indians practiced tolerance and were determined to live together in peace.

Mr. President,

India supports all efforts to build bridges of understanding between nations, peoples, religions, and cultures across the many fault-lines that exist. In this context, India feels that the initiatives which further and expand on these objectives are timely and valuable. Mahatma Gandhi had rightly said, "Intolerance is itself a form of violence and an obstacle to the growth of a true democratic spirit". In India, we are disturbed by the rise of intolerance worldwide. We are troubled by the increase in resources, financial and otherwise, that are being made available to violent and intolerant groups that misuse religion to justify and propagate their extremist agendas. The effort to counter such tendencies diverts attention and much-needed resources from development efforts in the developing world, including India. Moreover, the destructive activities of such groups have potentially serious consequences to social stability, peace and tranquility. It is therefore imperative that the nations of the world come together to tackle the menace of terrorism and extremism, which are an anathema for modern societies. We need to be clear that abetting knowingly or even unknowingly the spread of fundamentalism and terrorism is like feeding a monster that will turn around and consume us. The dialogue also needs to send out a strong message about the responsibility of nation states to do all that they can do in their power to promote tolerance and respect. They must do so at all levels, within nations, within regions and within the broader international community.

Thank you

811. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Dhruva Narayana Rangaswamy on Protection of Civilians in Armed Conflict at the UN Security Council.

New York, November 12, 2009.

Mr. President,

India would like to thank the Austrian Presidency for organizing this thematic debate on the Protection of Civilians.

We take note of the concept paper that has been circulated on this topic. We also take note of the exhaustive report commissioned by the DPKO on Protecting Civilians in the context of UN Peacekeeping Operations. The primary responsibility of this Council, that of responding to threats to international peace and security, is exercised in an environment that has changed very substantially since 1945. Major threats to peace and security no longer arise from conventional wars between states. The preponderance of conflicts today are low-intensity and involve belligerents who are not necessarily combatants under international humanitarian law. The Council's attention is also devoted to post-conflict situations which require stabilizing and preventing recurrence of conflict.

Mr. President,

Civilians have always suffered in war. International humanitarian law, particularly those provisions that protect civilians, arose to deal with the terrible suffering of civilians in war. Unfortunately, notwithstanding the development of International humanitarian law and UN Security Council mandates, civilians continue to suffer today. Even more unfortunate is the fact that civilians or non-belligerents suffer a disproportionate share of the casualties as compared to belligerents. It is they who bear the brunt of violence in conflict and post-conflict situations.

Mr. President,

The operational reasons behind the UN's inability to fully translate the Security Council's intent to protect civilians on the ground have been spelt out with clarity and precision by the Independent Study commissioned by DPKO. It is clear that the major share of the blame lies with the Security Council itself which has been unable, over more than a decade, to develop a clear understanding of the nature and extent of the problem; has been unable to give clear directions to the DPKO about what it wants and what and how DPKO should operate; and has not taken into account the experience and inputs of countries whose troops are actually on the ground. As the report succinctly states, the "confusion over the Council's intent is evident in the lack of policy, guidance, planning and preparedness." Representing a country which has been an active participant in UN peacekeeping since 1956 and has contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers to 40 UN operations, my delegation cannot claim to be surprised by the findings.

The concept paper for this debate that has been helpfully circulated by the Austrian Presidency states that efforts to protect civilians are hampered inter alia by the unwillingness of parties to a conflict to abide by international humanitarian law; due to the lack of resources; and due to an information gap. It also reiterates the finding that there is a lack of understanding about what peacekeepers should do and can do to protect civilians.

Mr. President,

Why have these gaps arisen? What can be done to overcome these problems? My delegation believes that the primary gap is that of resources. To use an example, 17,000 peacekeepers are simply inadequate in MONUC. There is no way that this number of troops can provide meaningful support to national authorities in an area of responsibility of the size of Western Europe. We are informed that the presence and activities of high-quality troops acts as a significant and effective deterrent within their effective ranges of operation. It stands to logic that an increase in the number of troops is the first requirement. It also stands to logic that troops require proper equipment and enablers. India is one of the leading providers of air assets to MONUC and can attest to the efficacy of air assets as enablers. It is somewhat surprising that the UN and the Security Council is unable to generate the required air assets. In this regard, I would like to draw the attention to the need for accountability mentioned in the Austrian paper. My delegation believes that there should be an accountability of those who mandate. Their responsibility does not end with the generation of mandates. They should be held accountable if unachievable mandates are generated for political expediency or if adequate resources are not made available. I would also encourage those who concentrate on development of normative frameworks to ponder the question of accountability. They must appreciate the development of these frameworks requires to be accompanied by a willingness to develop mechanisms to enforce these norms. The deficit in the willingness and ability to enforce will inevitably lead to an erosion of credibility. There must also be accountability for this.

Mr. President,

The Security Council must make up its mind on what it means by protection of civilians. It must have clarity about who is to be protected and what constitutes at heart. It must also clarify what kind of response it expects and who is to respond. It must for example, be able to differentiate between threats that require a military response or a "Rule of Law" response. It should not ask Force Commanders or their soldiers to assume policing responsibilities. The Security Council must also be clear that its responsibility for protecting civilians does not end with a military or police response. Civilians require humanitarian wherewithal for survival. It requires a more integrated view. Multiple stake holders are involved, not just the military. The concept that is developed should be one that can be translated into ground targets. It must be able to quantify the problem and articulate actions that must be taken. Only then will we be able to measure progress or the lack of it. This would appear to be a simple measure but my delegation suspects that the Council will find it difficult to address this. Development of indicators and norms requires a uniform application of law. The UN Security Council cannot do justice to its role if it discusses protection of civilians in some operations, and not in others.

Mr. President,

The Council needs to get a clearer idea of operational realities. This information gap cannot be addressed without meaningful and substantive consultations with Troop and Police Contributing Countries. Even though there is a relative lack of appreciation on the part of the Council and many so-called humanitarian actors, of the initiative and dedication to humanitarian principles on the part of troops, it is a fact that there is progress on the ground. Many contingents have ideas and concepts that can be effective. An effort by the Indian Brigade in MONUC to distribute cell phone "hot line" numbers within their area of operation has led to a significant increase in the rise of reported incidents of violence and the consequent deployment of troops to preempt or deter attacks. This is also leading to creation of databases of malefactors and their movement patterns. It is the belief of my delegation that intelligence capabilities such as development of databases on individuals and groups, their movements and weaponry are key requirements to increase effectiveness. Countries and contingents have other inputs that can be brought to bear if there is a willingness to listen.

Mr. President,

National capacities need to be strengthened. The DPKO report eloquently states that peacekeepers cannot and should not "protect everyone from everything." The protection of civilians is a national responsibility and requires institutions and conditions where the institutions can function. Peacekeepers are there to aid in the development of these national capacities. My delegation believes that much more thought needs to go into the manner in which these capacities are developed. Capacities and institutions must be relevant to the realities of the area in which UN operations are deployed. The experiences and capabilities of developing countries, particularly those that have gone through successful nation-building exercises, are of great significance in this regard. The Security Council must find ways and means to harness these capacities. In conclusion, Mr President, let me thank you again for organizing this debate. India is committed to contribute, through its peacekeepers and its national capacities, to the promotion of peace and security and to the role of the United Nations.

812. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Bhagat Singh Koshyari on Agenda Item 164 - Report of the Committee on Relations with the Host Country at the Sixth Committee of the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 12, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

We thank the Chairperson of the 'Committee on Relations with the Host Country' for his Report. The Committee on Relations with the Host Country provides a useful forum for addressing issues relating to the functioning of Missions of Member States and for enabling their representatives to perform their functions without hindrance. This year the Committee examined a number of problems raised by interested delegations on 'security of missions and safety of their personnel', 'entry visas issued by host country', 'acceleration of immigration and customs procedures', 'exemption from taxes', 'question of privileges and immunities', 'transportation' and other matters. The open and transparent exchange of views in this forum helped in addressing the issues in question in a spirit of cooperation and in accordance with international law.

Mr. Chairman,

We are happy to note that the host country has taken steps by way of issuing a notification to exempt from property taxation real property owned by foreign governments, including those housing all diplomatic missions, including Missions to the UN, from local property taxes in the United States. We believe that international law and the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations enjoined the host country to exempt foreign governments, being a sovereign, from all property taxation. The need to grant UN Missions privileges and immunities similar to bilateral missions is also a requirement under the Headquarters Agreement between the UN and the United States. The City of New York has, however, challenged the notification and the case is pending before the Court. Given that we have a case pending in Court challenging the levying of property taxes by the City of New York on portions of the building owned by the Government of India that houses our UN Mission personnel, we hope that the Court will up-hold the notification.

Mr. Chairman,

We recognize that the host country has a right to monitor and control entry into its territory and to adopt the requisite security measures it deems necessary. This has to be balanced, one the one hand with the right of the delegations to participate in the work of the United Nations in a timely manner and on the other to ensure that the delegations do not misuse their privileges and immunities. As regards entry visas, we witness that in some cases entry visas are not issued in time causing delay in attending the UN Official Meetings. We support Committee's recommendation that host country enhance its efforts to ensure their issuance in a timely manner to enable representatives of Member States to attend official meetings in a timely manner.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman

813. Statement by Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN Manish Tewari during the joint debate on Agenda Items 9 - Report of the Security Council and 119 - Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and other Related Matters at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 12, 2009.

Mr. President,

I am honoured to address the General Assembly on behalf of my country on the Report of the Security Council and the Question of equitable representation on and increase in the membership of the Security Council and related matters.

Let me commence by congratulating Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Gabon, Nigeria and Lebanon for having been elected to non-permanent seats in the Council for the period 2010 to 2011. India looks forward to working with these countries in a constructive and positive manner. We thank the delegation of Austria for introducing the annual report of the Security Council for the period 1 August 2008 to 31 July 2009. In our view, the report of the Security Council is an important means for facilitating interaction between the most representative organ of the United Nations and its most empowered brethren. The UN Charter itself bestows on the report a profound gravitas as is evident from the fact that there exists a separate provision mandating such a report, rather than clubbing it with the provision for reports from other UN bodies. It is, therefore, imperative that the annual report of the Security Council inform, highlight and analyze the measures that it has decided upon or taken to maintain international peace and security during the reporting period. The membership of the General Assembly has repeatedly requested that this report be more analytical and incisive than becoming a mere narration of events. It is important the General Assembly be aware not only of what decisions were taken, but also the rationale, efficacy and impact of the Council's decisions, in terms of crystallized take-aways for the membership of the General Assembly.

Mr. President,

We must recognize that the lacunae in the report are a manifestation of the underlying problems of representation and working methods of the Council, which remain opaque and non-inclusive. The report, this year too, continues to be a statistical compilation of events, a bland summary and listing of meetings and outcome documents, as some of the eminent previous speakers also highlighted. There is no other option but to recognize that the real solution not only for a more credible, legitimate and representative Council, but even for a more thorough report lies in the comprehensive reform of the Council, including expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories, and its working methods. In this context, it is important to note that an overwhelming majority of member states have clearly expressed their preference for such a reform during the three rounds of intergovernmental negotiations held so far on the issue of reform of the Council.

Mr. President,

Let us recall that since the General Assembly deliberated on this agenda item last year, intergovernmental negotiations have finally commenced after years of going around in circles in the Open-Ended Working Group. This is a significant development, and the General Assembly must strongly support expediting the negotiations towards an early reform. The most obvious way to achieve such a result is to immediately convene the negotiations and build on the progress achieved during the negotiations thus far. This, in-fact, is precisely what the Assembly has unanimously agreed to do vide its decision on September 14, 2009. It would also be useful to recall that the preference of Member States for a Council reform involving expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent membership category was clearly reflected in the summaries issued by the Chair of the intergovernmental negotiations. We would also like to take this opportunity to thank you, Mr. President, for your leadership and wisdom in reappointing Ambassador Zahir Tanin, Permanent Representative of Afghanistan as the Chair of the negotiations during the 64th session. The need for continuity to ensure success can hardly be overemphasized. My delegation would also like to congratulate Ambassador Tanin on his appointment and we wish him all success in his continued efforts. He can be assured of my delegation's full support in this very important role. With a view to focusing the negotiations and moving in a result-oriented manner, a text from the Chair would be a critical enabler.

Mr. President,

It is imperative that we make genuine and rapid progress on the issue of UNSC reform, without which the whole process of UN reform would be incomplete. Our institutions of global governance cannot remain chained to the balance of power that existed in 1945. The economic meltdown of 2008 highlighted as to how urgent is the need for international institutions to reflect contemporary global reality. This strongly underscores the imperative of a reform of the Council once again. Some, though barely a handful amongst us, argue unconvincingly that an expansion in only the non-permanent category would fulfill these objectives. Unfortunately, this has not been borne out by history and the expansion of 1965 is but a testimony to this.

Among areas that require critical attention are proper implementation of Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter that deal with participation of non-members in the UNSC's deliberations, enhancing participation of Troop Contributing Countries in decision making on peacekeeping mandates, and increasing the transparency of the Council's work. We have also heard proposals for interim or intermediate solutions. However, such ideas raise more questions rather than provide answers. Let us be clear, pushing this decision into the future does not solve the problem, it merely enhances an erosion of the credibility and legitimacy of the Council. The luxury of no action or inaction is not an option available to the collective will of humanity represented in this august assembly. In conclusion, Mr. President, let me reiterate the imperative for intergovernmental negotiations to resume immediately and make genuine progress by focusing on expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent membership categories of the Council. Thank you.

814. Statement by the Deputy Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri at the open debate on the Agenda Item "Briefings by the Chairs of Subsidiary Bodies of the Security Council" in UN Security Council.

New York, November 13, 2009.

Mr. President,

Allow me at the outset to congratulate you on assuming the Presidency of the Security Council.

Mr. President,

We appreciate the approach you have taken till now in handling the business of the Council, including in interactions with non-members.

I would also like to thank the three distinguished Chairmen of the Committees established pursuant to Security Council Resolutions 1267, 1373 and 1540 for their briefings.

Mr. President,

I take the floor barely two weeks before the first anniversary of the horrific terrorist attacks in Mumbai in my country. The images of these heinous attacks remain etched deeply in the minds and hearts of the Indian people. They demand an early end to this scourge of terrorism which has plagued us for the last two decades.

Terrorism poses a grave threat to all states and all societies. It undermines peace, democracy and freedom thus endangering the very foundations of the continued existence of democratic societies. Terrorism is a global threat and requires a coordinated and concerted global response.

India is a party to all 13 sectoral conventions on terrorism that have been adopted under the auspices of the United Nations. India participated constructively in discussions leading to the adoption of the Global Counter Terrorism Strategy [GCTS] in September 2006.

Mr. President,

We at the UN have been negotiating a comprehensive convention on international terrorism for over a decade. Nearly all the elements of the proposed convention have met with the agreement of the member states.

It is important that we all put our heads and minds together with a common resolve of ensuring the early adoption of the convention. Its time has really arrived and we all need to act with the necessary political will to ensure the adoption of the Convention.

Mr. President,

India supports the anti-terrorism mechanisms established by the United Nations, including United Nations Security Council Resolution 1267, related to sanctions against Al-Qaeda/ Taliban; United Nations Security Council Resolution 1373, which led to the establishment of the Counter Terrorism Committee; and United Nations Security Council Resolution 1540, which addressed the issue of non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. India also supports the subsequent resolutions that renewed, strengthened or amended these three original resolutions. We are fully committed to implementing our obligations under these resolutions.

India has been accorded "observer" status by the Financial Action Task Force. We are working towards full membership. We are reviewing our legislative, regulatory and institutional framework with a view to becoming fully compliant with the FATF recommendations on combating money laundering and terrorist financing.

Regarding our participation in the regime created by the UN Security Council Resolution 1267 and subsequent associated resolutions, it may be recalled that in January 2004, Government of India enacted an order - Prevention and Suppression of Terrorism (Implementation of Security Council Resolutions) Order 2004, revised in March 2006, 2007 and July 2009, which enables the concerned Central and State authorities to take necessary action as required under UNSCR 1267 in respect of the individuals and entities listed under the 1267 list. In December 2008, the Government of India amended the Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act, 1967 to effectively implement the UNSCR 1267 and 1373. At the same time, however, Mr. President, we are concerned that the processes of listing and de-listing on the Consolidated List is subject to political will and pressure- a scenario that we can ill-afford in our united fight against terrorism.

We received the first visit of the 1267 Monitoring team from 1 to 3 September 2009. From our perspective the visit was very useful as it provided us an opportunity to closely interact with the Head of the Monitoring Team. We look forward to cooperating with the team and the regime in the future.

Regarding our cooperation with the Counter Terrorism Committee, it is pertinent to note that India has submitted five national reports to the Counter Terrorism Committee (CTC) of the UN Security Council on measures taken to implement the UNSCR 1373. Further, we also hosted a visit by the Counter-Terrorism Committee Executive Directorate in November 2006. We encourage the on-going stocktaking exercise with a view to fully implementing the provisions of UNSCR 1373.

Mr. President,

Since the adoption of the 1540 resolution, India has taken additional steps to further strengthen the existing legislative and regulatory mechanisms for exercising controls over WMDs. A major step was the enactment of the WMD Act in June 2005. The Act provides for an integrated and over-arching legislation on prohibiting unlawful activities in relation to WMDs, their delivery systems and related materials, equipment and technologies. The Act criminalizes a range of unlawful activities in relation to WMDs and their means of delivery. Separately, industry outreach activities and training programmes are organized to highlight various aspects of the 1540 resolution.

We support efforts to prepare guidelines for handling assistance requests by countries and to find means to address the most commonly found gaps in the implementation of 1540. It is important that these activities are performed only at the request of a country and keeping in mind the varying national capacities, procedures and systems. Based on specific requests by countries, India remains ready to assist them bilaterally in capacity building and fulfilling their obligations under UNSCR 1540. In so far as the involvement of regional organizations, this may need to be carefully considered since this subject is rather specialized in nature, and capability and expertise at the level of regional or sub-regional organizations may not be often available.

In conclusion, Mr. President let me reiterate that we will continue to work closely with the counter-terrorism mechanisms established by the Security Council Resolutions 1267, 1373 and 1540. The scourge of terrorism requires the international community to act in concert and in a comprehensive manner, including termination of sources of its financing and stamping out its networks. The necessary political will and resolve needs to be constantly on demonstration for the international community to give a truly strong and unambiguous signal in our resolve to fight terrorism.

Thank you.

815. Statement by the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on the Revitalization of the Work of the General Assembly at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 19, 2009.

Mr. President,

I am happy to participate in today's debate on the 'Revitalization of the work of the General Assembly'. My delegation associates itself broadly with the position of the Non-Aligned Movement as expressed by the delegation of Algeria.

Mr. President,

We are guided by the desire to have a more effective United Nations. India wants the United Nations to be an organization that is truly responsive to the priorities and aspirations of the Member States, particularly for the developing countries, who constitute the vast majority of the membership. Its working methods must also embody efficiency and transparency. The role of the General Assembly as the chief deliberative, legislative, policy-making and representative body of the international community must be strengthened and respected in both letter and spirit. Indeed, the strengthening of procedures, working methods, documentation and ensuring due follow up are important steps in that direction. Enhanced visibility and outreach of the General Assembly are equally important.

However, more important is the need to continue the focus on substantive measures to restore and enhance the role and authority of the General Assembly including in exercising control over legislation, material and manpower, and its role as the chief oversight organ of the United Nations.

Mr. President,

Being the voice of the international community, the General Assembly must have a greater say in the process of selection of the Secretary General. The mandate for the appointment of the UN Secretary-General flows from Article 97 of the UN Charter, which envisages a role for both the General Assembly as well as the Security Council. The modalities of the appointment process have, however, come to be governed by para 4(d) of General Assembly resolution 11(1) of 24 January 1946. It would appear strange today that while we all promote the principles of transparency and an inclusive selection process, the General Assembly willingly agreed to impose such restrictions on its own Charter mandate. However, it is important to recall that the reason for resolution 11(1) was the context of the post-1945 world. More than sixty years since the adoption of resolution 11(1), we live in a different world. While the Security Council itself must change to reflect contemporary realities and expand its membership in both permanent and non-permanent categories, the General Assembly cannot remain bound by self-imposed restrictions reflecting an era gone by. The General Assembly's role cannot be merely to rubber-stamp the recommendation of the Security Council. The need for changes in the process of appointment of the Secretary-General has been recognized by all Member States. General Assembly resolutions 51/241 of 22 August 1997 and 60/286 of 9 October 2006 outline in detail proposals on improving this process. These proposals include making full use of the Charter provisions on the General Assembly's power of appointment; due regard to regional rotation and gender equality; the possibility of the President of the General Assembly consulting with Member States to identify potential candidates endorsed by a Member State; encouraging formal presentation of candidatures for the position of Secretary-General in a manner that allows sufficient time for interaction with Member States; and requesting candidates to present their views to all States members of the General Assembly. Clearly, what is required is the necessary political will to comprehensively consider and implement these changes. A more inclusive and interactive selection process would also enhance the authority and effectiveness of the Secretary-General, as well as increase the confidence of all Member States in the Secretary-General.

Mr. President,

The revitalization process also implies that the General Assembly should take a lead in setting the global agenda and restore the centrality of the United Nations. The convening power of the United Nations must be used more decisively in this regard. There has been an increasing tendency to undermine the prerogatives and authority of the General Assembly by encroachment of its agenda by the Security Council. It is important that the balance between the principal organs of the United Nations, envisaged in the Charter, must be maintained and respected. Of special concern is the encroachment by the Security Council on issues that traditionally fall within the General Assembly's competence, such as the process of standard-setting and codification of international law. Of concern also is the holding of thematic debates in the Security Council on issues that frequently fall within the purview of the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council. The resolution 60/286 reiterated that in addition to the Security Council making its annual report more analytical, it should submit special reports to the General Assembly. It is important to fulfill this provision to the satisfaction of Member States while the Security Council considers ways to further improve the quality of its reports to the General Assembly. And, it is important that a truly representative body such as the General Assembly have a much greater say in the international economic and financial matters. The UN Conference on the 'World Financial and Economic Crisis and Its Impact on Development' has successfully demonstrated the convening power that the General Assembly can exercise on such global issues. Our expectation is that the Member States will continue their constructive engagement in the ad hoc open-ended working group of the General Assembly that has been set up in pursuant to the outcome of this Conference.

Mr. President,

Before I conclude, I would like to felicitate the distinguished Permanent Representatives of Norway and Ecuador for their significant efforts in this direction as Co-Chairs of the Ad-Hoc Working Group on the Revitalization of the General Assembly for the 63rd session. My delegation looks forward to working with distinguished Permanent Representatives of Slovenia and Argentina, co-Chairs for the present session of the Ad-Hoc Working Group, and assured them of our fullest cooperation and support. I would also like to re-emphasise the need for undertaking comprehensive discussions on substantive issues that are critical for the revitalization of the work of the General Assembly.

Thank you.

816. Statement by the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on Agenda Item 10 - Report of the Peace-building Commission and Agenda Item 1088 - Report of the Secretary General on the Peace-building Fund at the 84th Session of the UNGA.

New York, November 20, 2009.

Mr. President,

We welcome the joint debate on today's agenda items, all of which have an underlying substantive connection. The work of the Peacebuilding commission over the last three years has sought to draw on the synergies of three principal organs of the United Nations, namely the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council when they are handling post-conflict situations. Let me begin by placing on record our appreciation for the good work done by Ambassador Yukio Takasu as the Chair of the Peacebuilding Commission. His leadership of this important responsibility contributed in large measure to building up the institution. We are happy that he has been succeeded by Ambassador Heraldo Munoz, who brings to the Commission his rich experience of dealing with complex issues at the UN. We will be happy to cooperate with him in his efforts. I would also like to congratulate the new Chairs of the country-specific configurations as well as the chair of the Working Group on the Lessons Learned for their work. Furthermore, I would also like to extend congratulations to Ms Judy Cheng Hopkins on her appointment as the Head of the Peacebuilding Support Office. My delegation will work constructively and in a spirit of positive cooperation with all of them.

Mr. President,

India is a member of the Peacebuilding Commission and has contributed to the Peacebuilding Fund. We will continue our active association with both the Commission and the Peacebuilding Fund with a view to enable these institutions to fulfill in their entirety the tasks as assigned to them by the General Assembly and the Security Council. We have always held the view that the setting up of the PBC filled an important institutional gap and that the Commission can and should make an important contribution to the recovery, reconstruction and development of countries emerging from conflict, wherever it agrees to act upon a request for advice and assistance by any such member state. Mr. President, India has a unique experience of nation-building in a large, complex and most diverse setting as we have strived to give our people a better life. This has allowed us to develop multifaceted capacities relevant to peacebuilding and development. We have shared this experience and expertise in a number of countries transiting from conflict to peace. We are very happy to continue to make available our capabilities in nation building to countries in post-conflict situations and cooperate with the United Nations' in its peacebuilding activities, including for development, social sector reform and rule of law and security. Mr. President, We welcome the three reports under consideration, in particular the new one on peacebuilding in the aftermath of conflict. The Report of the Secretary General on peacebuilding in the aftermath of conflict had as its central theme the imperative of national ownership and rightly notes that peacebuilding efforts must be anchored at the country level. We are hopeful that a sincere effort will follow during the implementation phase so that the advisory function of the Peacebuilding Commission can be thoroughly exploited for the benefit of the countries and regions concerned and for the cause of international peace and security in general.

Mr. President,

India had co-sponsored the resolution on the Peacebuilding Fund in May this year. This reflects our determination to ensure that the Fund is so structured as to enable it to serve as a flexible, responsive and focused recourse for peacebuilding support. In this context, we are happy to note that the Report on the Peacebuilding Fund observes that the revised terms of reference which essentially transformed its three-window architecture into two facilities, namely the Immediate Response Facility and the Peacebuilding and Recovery Facility has enabled the Fund, "to serve as a fast-disbursing, agile, responsive and risk-taking peacebuilding instrument." Equally heartening is the fact that these improvements have been effected as a result, amongst other things, of self-introspection within the Commission on its working.

Mr. President,

We are also happy to note that the Commission is taking a comprehensive approach to handling its tasks. Quite notable is the fact that it is trying to cooperate and coordinate with other UN agencies as well as other international institutions such as the World Bank. Equally praiseworthy are the efforts to expand the web of stakeholders as well as their involvement in the process of peacebuilding. At the same time, Mr. President, I would be remiss if I do not stress on two very important imperatives. First, we must always strive to ensure that there is effective two-way dialogue between countries on the Agenda of the PBC and the Commission itself through all stages. This dialogue should help bring the requisite assistance at the appropriate time, and should be flexible enough to allow for mid-course corrections where necessary. This dialogue will also ensure that relevant information is constantly relayed and absorbed within the peacebuilding architecture for the best results. Second, we need to constantly improve the governance structures of the peacebuilding architecture. In our view, such improvements must seek to ensure that all the available resources that are geared towards peacebuilding in post-conflict situations are properly harnessed in the shortest possible time. This we believe is the sine qua non of peacebuilding. Mr. President, In conclusion, I would like to reiterate India's commitment to the peacebuilding architecture. India will continue to be constructively engaged in the process of perfecting this architecture to the benefit of the country concerned.

Thank you.

817. Statement by the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on the Report of the Peace-building Commission at the UN Security Council.

New York, November 25, 2009.

Mr. President,

We appreciate the timely scheduling of today's debate on the Annual Report of the Peacebuilding Commission. Let me begin by placing on record our appreciation for the good work being done by Ambassador Heraldo Munoz, the Chair of the Commission, who brings a wealth of experience to this assignment, the new Chairs of the country-specific configurations, the Chair of the Working Group on the Lessons Learned, and congratulate Ms Judy Cheng Hopkins on her appointment as the Head of the Peacebuilding Support Office. My delegation will remain constructively engaged in the process and assure them of our fullest cooperation and support.

Mr. President,

The report of the Secretary General on peacebuilding in the aftermath of conflict rightly acknowledges the imperatives of national ownership and for anchoring peacebuilding efforts at the country level. Equally significant is the fact that the Peacebuilding Commission is trying to cooperate and coordinate with other UN agencies as well as other international institutions, and is trying to expand the web of stakeholders as well as their involvement in the process of peacebuilding.

Mr. President,

As a contributor to the Peacebuilding Fund and as a member of the Peacebuilding Commission, India has remained actively engaged in the critical task of peacebuilding. We will continue our active association with both the Commission and the Fund with a view to enabling these institutions to fulfill in their entirety the tasks as assigned to them by the General Assembly and the Security Council.

India has always held the view that the setting up of the Peacebuilding Commission filled an important institutional gap and that the Commission can and should make an important contribution to the recovery, reconstruction and development of countries emerging from conflict, wherever it agrees to act upon a request for advice and assistance by any such Member State.

It is with this conviction India was proactively engaged in revising the terms of reference for the Peacebuilding Fund and had co-sponsored a resolution in this regard in May this year. We are happy to note that the Secretary General's Annual Report on the Peacebuilding Fund observes that its revised terms of reference have enabled the Fund, "to serve as a fast-disbursing, agile, responsive and risk-taking peacebuilding instrument."

In all our endeavours, it is important that the relationship with the Peacebuilding Commission and all donors is managed creatively, so as to utilize synergies in existing peacebuilding strategies.

Mr. President,

In its own unique experience of nation-building, India has developed multifaceted capacities relevant to peacebuilding and development. We have shared this experience and expertise in a number of countries transiting from conflict to peace. We are very happy to continue to make available our capabilities in nation building to countries in post-conflict situations and cooperate with the United Nations in its peacebuilding activities, including for development, social sector reform and rule of law and security.

Mr. President,

Let me conclude by stressing two important imperatives.

First, we must always strive to ensure that there is an effective two-way dialogue between countries on the Agenda of the Peacebuilding Commission and the Commission itself through all stages.

Second, we need to constantly improve the governance structures of the peacebuilding architecture. It should be in a position to respond swiftly and with greater efficiency so that all available resources that are geared towards peacebuilding in post-conflict situations are properly harnessed in the shortest possible time.

Thank you.

818. Statement by the Acting Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri on the Question of Palestine at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, December 1, 2009.

Mr. President,

At the outset, please allow me to express our appreciation for convening the discussion on the Question of Palestine at the General Assembly as we mark the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People. Let me also express our appreciation for Ambassador Paul Badji, Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People.

Mr. President,

India has long civilizational ties with the entire region of the Middle-East and a strong tradition of support for the Palestinian cause. We voted in support of the Resolution on the United Nations Fact-Finding Mission on the Gaza Conflict at the United Nations Human Rights Council and also at the United Nations General Assembly. India believes that the conflict in West Asia is essentially political. It cannot be resolved by force. We favour a negotiated solution wherein a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine can live within secure and recognized borders, side by side at peace with Israel as endorsed in the Quartet Roadmap and UNSC Resolutions 1397 & 1515. This is also in line with our support for UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. We also participated at the Annapolis conference in 2007. The Arab Peace Plan calls for withdrawal of Israel to pre-1967 borders, the recognition of Israel and the establishment of the State of Palestine with East Jerusalem as its capital. We have supported this plan. India has also called for an end to Israeli settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory and major improvements at an early date on easing restrictions within Palestine of free movement of goods and persons.

Mr. President,

India has always stood by the Palestinian people in pursuit of their legitimate goals and their efforts aimed at economic and social development with dignity and self-reliance. Towards this end, India has been doing what it can in extending development support to Palestine. In New Delhi, we have completed the Palestinian Chancery building as a gift from the Government of India and an enduring symbol of our solidarity with the people of Palestine. Mindful of the deteriorating humanitarian situation, India contributed $1 million in response to United Nations Relief and Works Agency's (UNRWA) Flash Appeals in the context of the conflict in Gaza in late 2008-early 2009. In this 60th anniversary year of the establishment of UNRWA, we have increased our contributions to the UNRWA. We have furthermore contributed US$ 10 million as budget support to the Palestinian National Authority after the International Conference to Support the Palestinian Economy for the Reconstruction of Gaza held in Sharm El-Sheikh in March 2009. India has also participated at various donors conferences, including in Paris, Jakarta and Sharm El-Sheikh and has expeditiously implemented its pledges.

Mr. President,

Instability and violence coupled with humanitarian issues in Palestine have impacted upon the wider situation in the Middle East and beyond. There can be little doubt that the situation in Palestine remains a matter of grave concern to the international community and there is a need for all stakeholders to come together and create an environment for the earliest possible resumption of dialogue in the Middle East Peace Process.

Mr. President,

Our Prime Minister in his message on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People has reiterated that concerted and all round action is necessary to invigorate the peace process with the objective of achieving a durable, comprehensive and just settlement. We remain convinced that lasting peace in the region will contribute to global stability and prosperity. Thank You.

819. Statement by Acting Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri on the Situation in the Middle East at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, December 1, 2009.

Mr. President,

At the outset, please allow me to express our sincere appreciation for scheduling this discussion on an important subject that demands our collective attention - The situation in the Middle East. Today's discussions that follow the commemoration of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian people are timely and appropriate.

Mr. President,

As a nation with age-old historic and cultural ties with the Middle East, India has an abiding interest in the early resolution of the unresolved issues that have troubled the region since the inception of the United Nations.

The West Asian region is of vital importance to India. The region is home to nearly 5 million Indians and is an important source for India's energy needs.

India's commitment to the Palestinian cause, as well as its solidarity with the Palestinian people, are well-known. Our ties with the friendly people of Palestine are rooted in our common history and dates back to our struggle for independence. India remains unwavering in its support to the Palestinian people in their struggle for their legitimate rights.

Mr. President,

The conflict in West Asia being essentially political in nature, it cannot be resolved by force. We have consistently supported the Middle East Peace Process in all its tracks and wish to see the creation of an environment for the earliest possible resumption of dialogue in the Middle East Peace Process.

We favour a negotiated solution wherein a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine can live within secure and recognized borders, side by side at peace with Israel as endorsed in the Quartet Roadmap and UNSC Resolutions 1397 & 1515.

We are also supportive of the Arab Peace Plan and have called for an end to Israeli settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory along with early easing of restrictions within Palestine of free movement of persons and goods.

Mr. President,

India is aware that genuine peace in the region also requires resolution of other issues on the remaining tracks of the Middle East Peace Process, including restoration of other Arab lands that remain under occupation. Progress in the Lebanese and Syrian tracks of the peace process is important for achieving comprehensive and durable peace in the region. Our leadership is in touch with our interlocutors in the region at the highest level.

Mr. President,

India remains steadfast in its commitment in rendering assistance to the Palestinian people, including in capacity building and national reconstruction.

We have also contributed to United Nations peacekeeping efforts in the region.

Mr. President,

Given the complexity of the task, unprecedented determination, goodwill and capacity to offer and accept compromises and concessions are needed on all sides. It is here that the members of the international community have a collective duty to help in creating a favourable environment within which the negotiations can move forward. Concerted and all round action is necessary to invigorate the peace process with the objective of achieving a durable, comprehensive and just settlement. We remain convinced that lasting peace in the region will contribute to global stability and prosperity.

Thank you, Mr. President.

820. Statement by Minister of State in the Ministry of External Affairs and Head of the Indian Delegation Mrs. Preneet Kaur to the High Level Conference on South - South Cooperation.

821. Statement by Acting Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri on Agenda Item 76 - [A] and [B] - Oceans and the Law of the Sea and Sustainable Fishing at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, December 4, 2009.

Mr. President,

I would like to take this opportunity to thank you for convening this debate. We would also like to thank the Secretary General for his excellent Reports on issues relating to the oceans and the law of the sea. We appreciate the presentation of the report on the work of the Ad Hoc Working Group of the Whole, established pursuant to the General Assembly Resolution 63/111, on the regular process for the global reporting and assessment of the state of marine environment, including socio economic aspects. We are happy to note that the regular process would be guided by international law, including UNCLOS and other applicable international instruments and capacity building, sharing of data, information and transfer of technology would be crucial elements of the framework for the regular process. The United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS) provides the basic framework for carrying out any activity in the oceans and seas, for the use of its resources and for national, regional and international action and cooperation to counter threats and challenges to the marine environment. We need to take concerted action and to adopt integrated approaches to preserve oceans for future generations. The draft Omnibus resolution rightly recognizes that the problems of ocean space are closely interrelated and need to be considered as a whole as an integrated, interdisciplinary and intersectoral approach. We thank the coordinator Ambassador Henrique Valle for his efforts in coordinating this year's draft Omnibus Resolution.

Mr. President,

India attaches high priority to the effective functioning of the institutions established under the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea namely the International Sea-bed Authority, the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea and the Commission on the Limits of the Continental Shelf. These institutions have made considerable progress in their respective areas of work over the past year. We follow closely the work of all these subsidiary institutions. We congratulate the Chairman of the Commission on the Limits of Continental Shelf for the considerable progress made by the Commission in undertaking the considerations of the submissions. However we note that since a considerable number of States have made their submissions, it would take a long time for the Commission to consider those submissions. We fully share the concerns expressed in the draft Omnibus resolution regarding the projected timetable of the work of the Commission on the submissions already received by it and those yet to be received and the significant inequities and difficulties for states that may arise out of the projected timetable, including with respect to retaining expertise, where there is a considerable delay between the preparation of a submission and its consideration by the Commission. We hope that the informal working group engaged in examining this issue would consider and suggest short, medium and long term measures to address this problem with a view to shorten this time frame in a practical and realistic manner. This would enable the forthcoming Meeting of the States Parties to consider this issue in a holistic manner and suggest practical solutions to address this important issue. We support the efforts made by Secretariat to strengthen the capacity of the DOALAS that serves as the secretariat of the Commission, to ensure enhanced support and assistance to the Commission in its consideration of submissions.

Mr. President,

We are committed to the goal of protection and preservation of marine biodiversity, in particular in areas beyond national jurisdiction. Marine biodiversity in areas beyond national jurisdiction is threatened by a number of causes such as destructive fishing activities, over exploitation in vulnerable marine environments, open unregulated access to fisheries, bottom trawling, bio-prospecting, geo-engineering activities, and pollution of marine environment from various sources, to name a few. Coordinated and combined efforts are required to minimize the harmful effects of these activities on the marine environment. We recognize the need to consider new approaches within the overall framework of UNCLOS to promote international cooperation aiming at conservation and sustainable use of living resources of the high seas and benefit sharing of seabed resources located in areas beyond national jurisdiction. However the participation of developing countries in devising and adopting such approaches greatly depends on the scientific information and technical knowhow available with them. The promotion of flow of scientific data and information and transfer of technology resulting from marine scientific research, especially to developing States, is therefore essential to achieve this objective. Marine scientific research can lead to a better understanding and utilization of all most all aspects of the oceans and its resources. The marine scientific research which aims at exploration of biodiversity of deep seabed for commercially valuable genetic and biochemical resources should be carried out in accordance with the general principles of marine scientific research, namely, those contained in Articles 140(1) and 241 of UNCLOS.

Mr. President,

In the area of maritime navigation, we would like to express our serious concern over piracy and armed robbery at sea, particularly off the coast of Somalia. Piracy is not only a threat to the freedom of the seas, maritime trade, or to the security of maritime shipping, but it also endangers lives of sea seafarers, affects national security, territorial integrity and hampers economic development of the countries in the region. India is actively cooperating in international efforts to combat piracy and armed robbery at sea. We support joint and concerted efforts taken by the international community in this regard. As the past incidents have shown there is a persistence of this menace especially off the coast of Somalia. There is a growing need for well considered, coordinated course of action in accordance with international law. There is also a continuous need to assist developing coastal States, through capacity building, including by training of law enforcement officials, transfer of equipment etc., to enhance their capacity and enable them take effective measures against the threats of maritime security. We would also like to emphasize the importance of the principle of freedom of navigation including the right of innocent passage as well as transit passage through straits used for international navigation. In this regard we reaffirm our view that the States bordering straits may adopt laws or regulations relating to transit passage through straits but such laws should be enforced in a manner that is non-discriminatory and fully consistent with Article 42 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

Mr. President,

Speaking of fisheries, we would like to take this opportunity to thank Ms. Holly Koehler of the United States of America for coordinating in a skillful and professional manner the informal consultations on the draft resolution on sustainable fisheries. The fisheries sector occupies an important place in the socio-economic development of India. We support increased adherence to the 1995 UN Fish Stock Agreement and to strengthen its implementation.

The effective implementation of measures proposed to combat the adverse impact of bottom fishing on vulnerable marine ecosystems in Resolution 61/105 was an area of particular interest during the negotiation of this year's Fisheries Resolution. We hope that additional measures agreed to that end which include, inter-alia, identification of vulnerable ecosystems, assessment of impact of bottom fishing on such ecosystems, exchange of best scientific information and adoption of conservation and management measures to prevent adverse impact on such ecosystems, would help towards regulating bottom fishing in areas beyond national jurisdiction. We are pleased to note that draft sustainable fisheries resolution duly recognizes the special circumstances and requirements of the developing States and specific challenges they may face in giving full effect to their obligations under this resolution. The most important task before the developing countries in the development of their fisheries sector is to develop and enhance their capacity building. For this purpose they require access to and sharing of the scientific knowledge, resources, technology transfer, as well as development of skills. In this context we particularly support OP 27 of the Sustainable fisheries resolution that invites States and international financial institutions and organizations to, inter-alia, provide assistance to developing States to enable them to develop their national capacity to exploit fisheries resources, including developing their domestically flagged fishing fleet, value added processing and the expansion of their economic base in the fishing industry.

Thank you, Mr. President.

822. Intervention by the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri during the informal plenary meeting: Exchange 1 of the Fourth Round of Negotiations on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council Reform and Related Matters at the 64th Session of the UNGA.

New York, December 8, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Allow me to begin by congratulating you on your reappointment as Chair of the intergovernmental negotiations on UNSC reform.

These negotiations have benefited immensely from your leadership and guidance. We look forward to your continued efforts in expediting the negotiations towards achieving, at the earliest, a genuine reform of the UNSC.

One persistent problem in the OEWG process that preceded the current intergovernmental negotiations, apart from it being an unending series of statements, was that there was very little continuity in each UNGA session. Each session essentially restarted the reform process.

We believe your reappointment will provide the much needed continuity in the process of intergovernmental negotiations, allowing us to build upon the progress achieved in the first three rounds of negotiations held earlier this year.

In this context, let us recall that during these three rounds, an overwhelming majority of member states unambiguously expressed their preference for a reform that involves an expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent membership categories.

The Chair's summaries, compiled in document A/63/960, clearly acknowledged this fact when stating that the model with expansion in both categories had commanded the most support. The somewhat understated manner of presenting the level of support in the Chair's summaries is perhaps natural given your impartial position as Chair.

It is essential that we now build on this widespread demand for expansion in both categories.

Let us also be clear that genuine reform cannot be achieved without an expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent membership.

The current structure of the UNSC continues to reflect 1945 and is no longer tenable.

The Charter itself envisaged a review after 10 years. But it took 20 years for a minimum movement, when in 1965 a limited expansion in the non-permanent category was implemented.

It has since been 44 years with no further movement, even though the world has changed significantly.

Contemporary reality demands new inclusions in the permanent membership.

Working methods also need improvement, and it would be unrealistic to hope to achieve this without an expansion in the permanent membership.

Any expansion that is limited to adding more non-permanent members, either directly, or indirectly through convoluted proposals, will merely perpetuate the current problems that are clamouring for reform.

Mr. Chairman,

For today's meeting, you had asked us to reflect on our own positions and proposals and that of our peers.

Our reflection has only served to strengthen our view that the overwhelming majority shares our position for the need for an expansion in both categories. We believe that it is, therefore, natural to build on this.

We hope the handful that do not share our perspective will truly reflect on their position and acknowledge that the interest of the membership at large, and that of the organization itself, is best served by supporting the views that the vast majority espouses.

We remain convinced that this is where convergence of ideas can and will happen.

Over the last few months, delegations have repeatedly elaborated on their preferred proposals and options. These are now available in oral or written form.

It is imperative that you, Mr. Chairman, now provide a text or a document on which actual negotiations can proceed.

The time for making statements reiterating our positions is now past. Instead, decisive progress needs to be made through detailed and textual negotiations.

In this effort, Mr. Chairman, you can count on our full support. There are some delegations that attempt to question your authority to present such documents, despite clear precedence and practice in your support.

The reality is that these delegations are attempting to disguise their real desire of ensuring no progress. They are worried that any text will serve to make genuine movement in the reform process.

We must not let such views of a small minority block our path. We call upon you, Mr. Chairman, to present a text that you believe captures the views of the membership and can lead us down the path of genuine reform.

We are at the cusp of history and our actions will determine the evolution of international governance structures.

We must bring about real change in the UNSC, both in its composition and in its working methods.

We count on your wisdom, courage and initiative in presenting a Chair's document or text, a document that must necessarily include the core demand of the overwhelming majority for an expansion in both permanent and non-permanent membership.

Thank you.

823. Statement by the Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri at the Annual High-level Conference on the Central Emergency Response Fund.

New York, December 9, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

India accords the highest importance to the role of the United Nations in coordinating emergency humanitarian assistance and of providing support to national authorities in responding to humanitarian emergencies. India also values the multilateral setting, voluntary and impartial nature of United Nations humanitarian assistance.

My delegation reiterates that humanitarian principles and international humanitarian law only must provide the basis for humanitarian assistance. The letter and spirit of these principles needs to be scrupulously respected.

India believes that the capabilities and role of the United Nations in coordination and delivery of international humanitarian assistance need to be strengthened. We are in favour of strengthening OCHA and CERF.

India has made a commitment of contributing US$1.5 million to CERF over a three-year period from 2009. In accordance with this we had had contributed US$500,000 in 2009. I am happy to announce that we will contribute US$500,000 in 2010.

Thank you.
